INTRODUCTION.

Now-a-days people have so many things to claim their attention and occupy their time, that they seldom read prefaces and introductions, since these are supposed to contain little of importance or interest. We have felt inclined, on this account, to commence the present volume of the Banner without the usual formality, but there are some things in reference to the reasons which induce the continuance of the publication, and the manner in which we desire to conduct it, which may be presented to the attention of our readers now, and here, more appropriately than at any other time, or in any other place. We have concluded, therefore, to embody them in a brief introduction.

The church of the LORD JESUS CHRIST is presented in the Scriptures as the Light of the World: it is her duty to diffuse all around her an illuminating, a sanctifying, an invigorating influence. From Zion must proceed the living waters, which will not only make glad the city of our God, but will also cause the moral wilderness to rejoice and blossom as the rose. All expedients to benefit mankind, which do not rest upon the immutable principles of truth and virtue, of which the church is the depository and guardian, must fail, and no where out of her sacred enclosure can be found the enlightened zeal, the sound judgment, the expanded benevolence, necessary to overcome the opposition which may be encountered, and to secure final triumph. It is our simple desire in the management of this periodical to unite our exertions with those of all others like-minded, to bring the influence of the church to operate for the promotion of good to man, and glory to God in the highest.

The Reformed Presbyterian church, under whose auspices this publication is issued, is but a small portion of the one, true, universal church of Christ. The doctrines of grace, which she, in common with other evangelical churches, exhibits, are calculated to heal the noxious and troubled waters of human society, to promote the present happiness of men, and prepare saints for glory. We are united with others in the essential points of religion, but besides, we assert and cherish certain doctrines which lead to our existence as a distinct denomination. These, we consider, of course, as eminently true, and of great importance, and we naturally wish all men to believe them and to be influenced by them. Regarding them as highly salutary, we wish them to be well understood, and faithfully and consistently advocated and illustrated by our own members, and we also desire to make their influence felt in the Christian community and the world at large, as far as accessible to our efforts. Especially in our own country, and at this particular epoch of time do we think that they should be known and applied. It must be evident to the most careless observer that the times of shaking foretold by inspired prophets, have commenced, and since fabrics of superstition and error of every kind will fall, the wise will expend their labour on the erection of such things as will remain. The principles which as a church, we maintain, while they doubtless are, in their exhibition and practice, mixed with much which is defective and sinful, and which, therefore, will be removed, we believe to be in the main, the immutable truths of God,—things which cannot be shaken, and which, therefore, in times of convulsion and trouble, will prove a sure refuge to all who embrace them.

In expressing these views we do not consider that we are giving utterance to feelings of bigotry or sectarianism, both of which we consider at variance with the very first elements of Christian truth and subversive to the prosperity of Zion, and the welfare of the world. We concede to others the honour, to which the truths they maintain and the active exertions which they make, entitle them. It would be far from our desire to excite any feelings which would prevent those whom we influence from seeing the excellencies of those who may not follow with ourselves, or from co-operating with such brethren, cordially and energetically, in every good work. But a fictitious and morbid liberality should not displace a candid, and Christian, and charitable, attachment to valuable truth.

In maintaining these sentiments, we feel great satisfaction in the conviction that we are occupying substantially the very same position as that which was so nobly maintained by our covenanting forefathers in days that tried men's souls. It was their object, and it is ours, to diffuse the knowledge of holy truth, by which the SPIRIT of GOD regenerates and sanctifies the soul. It was their object, and it is ours, to apply the requisitions of the divine law to all classes and conditions of society, in all their relations, and, particularly, to bring the body politic in its constitution and administration, into complete subjection to the will of Him who is the Governor among the nations. It was their object, and it is ours, to assert the rights of man as well as the rights of GOD, and to secure for men the religious, civil, and social freedom to which they are entitled. It was their object, and it is ours, to promote the peace of the civil community, by the influence of sound morality, just laws, and equitable government. It was their object, and it is ours, "to endeavour to bring the churches of GOD to the nearest conjunction and uniformity in religion, that we and our posterity may as brethren live in faith and love, and the Lord may delight to dwell in the midst of us." "CHRIST'S CROWN AND COVENANT," is the inscription which we, like them, would emblazon on our banners: "the common cause of religion, liberty, and peace," is the sum and substance of the solemn covenant to which we, like them, would be pledged.

In endeavouring to present and advocate the objects to which we have alluded, we desire to bear in mind that the disciples of the meek and lowly Saviour must "speak the truth in love." Hasty and partial judgments we will endeavour to avoid, and watchfully will we seek to exclude from our pages all which would wound the sensitive and refined feelings of the heart which has been renewed by the Spirit of GOD, and is under the sanctifying operations of his grace. As in time past, efforts will be made to present to our readers interesting and valuable discussions, and such information as will be consistent with our objects, and compatible with our restricted limits. We hope that we may be able to keep them acquainted with the condition and prospects of our own church and the proceedings of her respective judicatories, and the various societies of a benevolent character with which her members may be directly or indirectly connected. Looking for support and success to Him, without whose aid we can do nothing, we commence the new year, with the hope that by the feeble instrumentality employed, GOD may be glorified, and men may be edified.

JANUARY, 1848.

ADDRESS OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF THE BOARD OF FOREIGN MISSIONS OF THE REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, TO THE MEMBERS OF THAT CHURCH, AND TO ALL OTHERS WHO MAY FEEL INCLINED TO UNITE WITH THEM IN MISSIONARY EXERTIONS.

BRETHREN BELOVED IN THE LORD:

At the last meeting of the General Synod of the Reformed Presbyterian church, we had the pleasure of reporting, that two young men of high promise had offered themselves, to labour in India, for the conversion of the perishing heathen. While we did not doubt that their consecration of their services to this holy enterprise, would meet with cordial approbation, and while we felt confident that the same divine influence, which, we had reason to believe, had led them to devote themselves to this object, would dispose those who were able, to furnish the means which might be necessary for their support, we yet thought it proper to present the whole matter to the consideration of Synod, that we might thus bring it into view more definitely and prominently, and that we might be sustained by the explicit and official sanction of the Supreme Judicatory of our church. The following extract from the minutes, will show the action of Synod in regard to it. "Whereas, it appears that two young men, at present connected with the Theological Seminary, have offered themselves to the Board of Foreign Missions to be sent to the heathen world, and whereas Synod highly approve of the spirit which this consecration of themselves to so great and good a work evinces: RESOLVED, That the Board of Foreign Missions be instructed to ascertain if the church is able and willing to sustain these young men, and if so, that they be authorized to send them out to India." Having waited till our beloved missionary brother, Rev. J. R. Campbell, at that time on his way to this country, should have arrived, that we might be able to avail ourselves of his counsel, we have at length resolved to commence measures to carry out the instructions of Synod, endeavouring to ascertain the willingness and ability of the church to sustain these candidates for missionary service, with the view of sending them far hence unto the gentiles, should the result prove favourable.

In calling your attention to this subject, beloved brethren, we are aware that we are soliciting you to engage in an undertaking which may require the exercise of some self-denial and much liberality. The smallness of our numbers, the fact that there are not many of the rich in this world among them, the claims made for the support of the ordinances, and the extension of the church at home—all these considerations have been present to our minds. In proportion to her numbers, our branch of the church contributes very liberally to the cause of CHRIST, and while we have not yet, by any means, attained the just measure of religious benevolence, statistical tables show that other denominations cannot justly charge us with inferiority. We know, too, that we have much work to do at home, for those who are our own brethren by the ties of a common faith and a common country, and we do not desire you to abate one particle of your interest in domestic missions, or to take one cent from the support of the gospel in our own land. We feel that it would be a suicidal course, and that it would defeat our own designs to recommend or urge any measures which would cause the church at home to languish. The contributions, heretofore made for Foreign missions, have not been abstracted from the resources of the Domestic enterprise, but each call made for the aid of the destitute at home, has been fully answered whenever presented. We have, in time past, given to Domestic missions, whenever and whatever Providence called for, and if our contributions to support the gospel at home have been less than those made for its diffusion abroad, this has arisen neither from a want of interest in the former object, nor from a destitution of ability, but because the amount of aid needed did not require greater liberality. At home, we have most needed the men who would go forth to labour in the vineyard, not the means to sustain them. We have yet to learn of any case in which pecuniary assistance has been asked, and it was not furnished. In time to come, as in time past, let us be guided by Divine Providence, and we will find that He who makes the demand upon us, will enable us to meet it. We ask you not to take the funds which would be expended for domestic missions, and give them to the Foreign field, but to contribute as God has prospered you, and as in his providence he directs you, for the support of the latter, as well as the former. Let the money which, if appropriated to domestic missions, would remain uncalled for in your own purses, be contributed to promote the spiritual welfare of the heathen, and let your sympathies, and your contributions, and your prayers, have no object more limited than the Saviour has presented, when he directed his disciples to "Go into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature."

We feel, brethren, that we are merely your agents: we can do nothing, unless you furnish the means, and these means can be expended only as you may prescribe. It is our part to represent you in the Foreign missionary field, and to act in your behalf. It is your part to give us ability to act, by making your contributions, and at the same time to indicate in what manner you wish them to be expended. We depend on you for our efficiency, and while we may suggest and recommend such objects as we may consider best, we assume not to control your judgments, or dispose of your funds in any way not authorized by your directions. In regard to the subject at present submitted to your consideration, you are called upon to decide conscientiously for yourselves, and to give or withhold your assistance as you may judge most proper. Our wish is to present it fully and fairly to your minds, so that the enlightened understandings, and the sanctified affections of true followers of CHRIST, may discern the things which are excellent, and may choose the good and refuse the evil.

You are aware, brethren, that the Foreign Missionary efforts of our church have been directed to distant India. Three missionaries in our ecclesiastical connexion, with their wives, were sent out to that country about twelve years ago. Assiduously they laboured to make known to its perishing millions the way of peace. Year after year they toiled amidst many discouragements, and feeling that the work was too great for them, they often entreated for additional labourers. But their cries were unheeded. At length one of them was cut off by death, and another compelled by the sickness of his wife to return to this country, leaving, thus, a single individual to bear alone the burden of a work far too great for three. These circumstances seemed to arouse the slumbering interest of the church, and led to fear lest the mission should fail entirely, and the heathen be left to perish in their sins. Prayers ascended from many hearts, and earnest appeals were made to the churches to furnish right-hearted men who would go out to the high-places of the field, and take up the work which others had been compelled to relinquish. The result was that two young men in our Theological Seminary, of superior mental endowments, of indefatigable zeal and industry in doing good, and, as far as man can judge, "born again," were induced to offer themselves to this perilous and difficult work. Their offer was approved, and it is now, brethren, for you to determine whether they shall be sent out to labour for the salvation of the heathen, or be rejected. The Almighty, in answer to our prayers, has given them, the work requires them:—Should we refuse their proffered services, or should we send them? There can be but one answer:—We should send them.

In this matter, brethren, we hope you will act under the influence of principle,—enlightened and sanctified, Christian principle. Let us endeavour to ascertain what is our duty—let us ask ourselves, "What doth the LORD require of us," by the precepts of his word, and the indications of his providence. In this instance, the case is simple and plain. Our ascending Saviour commanded his disciples to "Teach all nations:" unable, ourselves, to engage personally in the work, here are individuals who offer to act in our stead: they are qualified for the duties they propose to perform: will their offer be accepted, or rejected? Unless we can honestly say, in the sight of God, that we are not able to do any thing to send them, can we refuse our aid? If we decline their proposal, may we not have reason to fear lest haply we be found fighting against God?

We have already engaged in this work, and have laboured in it for years, shall we now relinquish it? To refuse to accept this offer, might be doing this, since, in the ordinary course of Divine Providence, it can be but a short time till those who are in the field are called away, and should we wait till then, the new labourers would be, for a considerable time, comparatively of little use, so that even if sent out immediately after the removal of the others, the work would sustain serious interruption. It is necessary to have persons on the spot, who are in progress of preparation to take the places of those who may be called away. Besides, we very much fear that the refusal to send out these candidates, would chill the zeal and crush the desires of others, who might hereafter aspire to this holy work, and when the men were most needed, we might seek for them in vain. If, when Providence offers them, we refuse them, can we hope to obtain them hereafter? Think of it, and you will probably agree with us, that the rejection of these proposed missionaries, might be, in effect, an abandonment of the work entirely.

But it is now more than ever before, that we may expect to obtain the results of past efforts. Much time was necessarily occupied in preparatory work, but now the ground has been broken up, the seed has been sown, the tender plants carefully nurtured, and shall we abandon the field when the fruits begin to ripen, when the full corn appears in the ear? All accounts give us reason to believe that India is on the eve of a great moral revolution, and doubtless the results of years of toil heretofore unrequited, and apparently useless, will soon be made manifest. We can almost hear the voice of the great Husbandman exclaiming now, as once he did while on earth, "Lift up your eyes, for the fields are even now white unto the harvest." Will we lay down our weapons at the moment when victory is about to alight upon our banners? Will we cast away the sickle when we see the harvest of the earth is almost fully ripe? Now, more than ever, should the mission be sustained and strengthened. If we wish not to lose what has been done in time past, we must persevere. Let us "take heed that we lose not the things which we have wrought, but that we receive a full reward."

But in all that we have yet said, we have made no special reference to the condition of those for whom we appeal to your sympathies. Destitute of the comforts of civilized life, deprived in a great measure of the blessings of liberty, deeply degraded by the most impure and cruel superstitions, they loudly call upon us to come over and help them. Immortal beings, where must their eternity be spent? They know not God, they obey not his gospel. What then can their doom be but a place in everlasting burnings? If we value salvation, our own salvation, or the salvation of those dear to us by natural relationship or other bonds, can we be indifferent to the condition of those who have no vision, who are perishing, who are going down every day in myriads to the pit of unending, unutterable, woe?

In this undertaking we might be called upon to make the greatest sacrifices. Apostolic men counted not their lives dear unto them that they might promote it. In times of old the people of God contributed so liberally for his cause, that it became necessary to restrain them from giving, since much more than could be used was offered. Why should it now be otherwise? The claims made upon us are neither less numerous nor less urgent. The spirit of true benevolence is always the same. Let us imitate the examples of those who have gone before us; who counted no sacrifice too great to lay upon the altar of our Lord.

Yet why should we talk of sacrifices? What yields a richer and a surer return than any thing which is done for Christ's sake and the gospel? "Give," says the Saviour, "and it shall be given unto you. Good measure, pressed down, and shaken together, and running over, shall be given into your bosom. For with the same measure that ye mete withal it shall be measured to you again." All which has ever been expended for such an object has been most liberally returned. He who controls the elements of nature, who administers all the dispensations of Providence, who gives us life, and breath, and health, and all things, is able to render a full recompense to all who labour for Him. We have often seen "riches kept for the owners thereof to their hurt," but we have yet to know of one who was really the poorer, even in this world's treasures, in consequence of judicious, disinterested, truly Christian benevolence. If we "withhold more than is meet," we will find that "it tendeth to poverty," while the one who "scattereth is the one who increaseth." "This, I say, brethren," is the language of an Apostle, "he which soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly, but he that soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully. And God is able to make all grace abound toward you, that ye always, having a sufficiency in all things, may abound to every good work."

There is something in the present state of our church, which calls upon us to be zealous, and liberal, and active in every good enterprise. The discussion which a diversity of views in regard to union with other churches had occasioned, has terminated, and the agitation it produced has almost wholly subsided. Our older congregations are flourishing, new organizations are frequent and numerous, and earnest calls are made from all parts of the country for the labours of our ministers. The school of the prophets to which the church looks with so much hope for the supply of her future teachers, is larger than at any former period. In common with our countrymen, we share in the blessings of abundant harvests, general health, and internal peace. These mercies should excite in us sincere gratitude, and lead us to form the firm and earnest resolution to live for God. To Him who has given us all, let us consecrate our all. As Christians let us live for Christ. A great and noble work is assigned to us. Let us endeavour to perform it. With harmony among ourselves, with resources certainly equal to the effort required, with a zeal which aims at great things, with a love which conquers all things, with a hope which will acknowledge no desponding fears, "if the Lord be with us, we are well able to do this." Let us then "go on in the strength of the Lord God," and "God, even our own God, will bless us, and all the ends of the earth shall fear him."

In order to present this subject more prominently to our own churches and to the community at large, the committee has appointed Rev. J. R. Campbell its agent. It is expected that he will be able to visit the Eastern section of our country during the winter, and in the spring and summer he will traverse the West. Already his efforts have been greatly successful, not only in awakening an increased interest in the cause, but in raising large and numerous contributions for its support. We commend him to the kind attentions of all with whom he may meet, as "a brother beloved, and especially by us." His visit to this country although entirely contrary to his own plans and wishes, and occasioned by the uncontrollable arrangements of Providence, will, we trust, be the means of refreshing his own soul, and re-invigorating him for further and greater labours among the heathen, while it will also tend greatly to promote the interests of the missionary cause in our land. He proposes to return to India in July next, and before that time, it is hoped, the means necessary to send out the two brethren for whom we make this appeal, will have been obtained.

In behalf of the Executive Com. of Board of For. Missions of Ref. Presb. Church.

PRACTICAL ESSAYS.

[For the Banner of the Covenant.]

"THE INWARD MAN IS RENEWED DAY BY DAY."

The inward man is the soul; its being renewed implies a change in the feelings and disposition, and that change, one which is made in conformity with some previously existing model of excellence. Man was originally made in the image of his God. By his fall he defaced that image, and became unholy and sinful. When divine grace operates upon him, he is "renewed in righteousness after the image of him who created him."

Three different things may be mentioned, which are produced in the soul by the influence of the HOLY SPIRIT when "the inward man is renewed."

1. Deadness to the world; its pleasures as well as its pains. The Christian is elevated above them, he is superior to their influence. He "considers not the things seen, which are temporal, but the things not seen, which are eternal." "If ye then," says the apostle, "be risen with CHRIST, seek those things which are above, where CHRIST sitteth at the right hand of God. Set your affections on things above, and not on things on the earth, for ye are dead, and your life is hid with CHRIST in God." Col. iii. 1—3.

This deadness to the world does not arise from that melancholy temper, which makes a person see every thing in an unpleasant light; nor is it that which is based on a self-righteous spirit, as if by denying ourselves all the pleasures of this world, we were entitling ourselves to happiness in the other, nor is it that which is sometimes manifested by persons who from various causes have become unable any longer to indulge in the luxuries of sensual life, and think they have ceased to regard that which they can no longer enjoy—but, it is that which arises from a genuine faith, which produces the thorough conviction that neither the joys nor the sufferings of this present life are "worthy to be compared with the far more exceeding, even the eternal weight of glory which shall follow." A deadness which leads a person to use the world as not abusing it, and while in it, to be not of it: to resist its fascinations, to overcome its opposition, to be uninjured by its temptations.

2. Another thing in which the inward man is renewed is hatred of sin. Sin is a thing inexpressibly evil in itself independently of its consequences. If we think of God as he existed before any of his works had been formed, a most holy, just, and good being, possessed of every glorious perfection, how wicked would appear any thought derogatory to his character, and would it not excite misery in the soul to think that the being towards whom such thoughts were entertained was God? God and holy angels hate sin, although their happiness never has been, nor can be, diminished thereby. And when we look over the wide world and see what misery sin has caused, and when we learn from the Scriptures its inexpressibly awful consequences in the world to come—how dreadful does it appear. The Christian seeing sin to be exceeding sinful, hates it: he views it as God views it. He is, therefore, in this respect renewed after the divine image.

3. Longing for heaven is another thing in which the inward man is renewed. Recognising the superiority of heaven to earth, feeling that this world is not his home, he has a desire to depart and to be with CHRIST, which is far better. "We know," says the apostle, "that if the earthly house of this tabernacle be dissolved, we have a building with God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens, for in this we groan being burdened: not that we would be unclothed, but that we would be clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up in life." The Christian desires heaven, not merely in order to be set free from the trials and sufferings of earth, but because he longs for its holiness, its employments, its society. He desires happiness, and he desires that kind of happiness which he knows by faith is to be found in heaven, and in heaven alone.

We have now entered on a new year. Is it not desirable that the renewal of our inward man may correspond with the renewal of the division of time? Let this year, while it will witness the gradual perishing of the outward man, also behold the renewal of our inward man. Thus, as time carries us onward, will we be approaching nearer and nearer to our heavenly home. The feeling of melancholy which may be experienced by the reflection that we are becoming older in years, will be relieved and dispelled by the hope that we, in the same proportion, are becoming riper for glory.

THE PERFORMANCE OF OUR DUTY TO THE WORLD A TEST OF CHRISTIAN CHARACTER.

"Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" This inquiry was the first visible effect of the saving operation of the Spirit upon the renowned apostle of the Gentiles. There are few, perhaps, who have had any serious thoughts about the matter of personal religion, who have not searched more or less for some definite criterion, by which to determine whether the emotions they may have experienced, have been the fruit of the Spirit, or a mere delusion of the enemy. This is a most important inquiry, and, when conducted upon proper principles, a means which God will bless, not only for the edification of his people, but also for bringing about the conversion of those who are yet strangers to the covenants of promise. This investigation, however, is sometimes prosecuted in a manner calculated to retard the progress of the believer, rather than facilitate his journey; to divert the sinner away from the Saviour, rather than lead him to the Lamb of God. The inquirer is led into this mistaken course by employing all his exertions in the review of his past life, to the entire neglect of the duties of the present, forgetting that the fruits of the Spirit are not transient but continuous, and that if a person has been regenerated, he need not go back to any particular period for evidences of the fact, since the testimony will constantly be accumulating, as his sanctification proceeds. Much has been written on this subject; but minds differently constituted, are differently affected, and it has been considered by some that a general and uniform standard cannot be given. This conclusion, however, we think is at variance with experience and revelation, and among other common developments of the new principles of nature communicated in regeneration, the inquiry of the converted persecutor is one item in that standard, by the use of which we may most accurately determine whether we have been "born of water and of the Spirit," or whether we are yet in "the gall of bitterness and the bond of iniquity." There was never a truly converted soul who did not in the spirit of the apostle cry out, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" And none ever made this prayer, in its true sense, but by the Spirit of Christ. But there is still a difficulty. We may be mistaken as to the true import of this brief ejaculation. Do we ask what meritorious action am I to perform, that I may purchase the favour of God? what am I to give as a price for my justification? what am I to give for the sin of my soul? "Will the Lord be pleased with thousands of rams or ten thousands of rivers of oil?" If such be our inquiries, instead of receiving an answer of peace, we shall be met only with the withering rebuke, "Who hath required this at your hand?" "By the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified." But if we, convinced that our salvation is all of grace, and that after we have done all, we are still unprofitable servants, make this inquiry because we prefer the service of God, on account of its character, independently of its consequences, to the service of the devil, then may we appropriate the answer which the apostle received, and hear the farther direction of the Redeemer, "Go, work to-day in my vineyard."—And if we have made this inquiry in the proper spirit, we will not be less ready to obey than to ask, to act than to pray. It is by the nature of our obedience, and by our willingness to obey that we may decide the character of the inquiry. What is the work that the Christian finds to do in the vineyard of the Lord? In the first place he is to cultivate the garden of his own soul. He is to use all the means God has appointed to promote his personal sanctification. He is to be found walking in all the ordinances of the Lord blameless. But his labours are not to terminate upon the advancement of the glory of God in his own personal salvation. The spirit of Christianity is a spirit of universal philanthropy. "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature." It is an utter impossibility for a person to be a Christian, and not to labour for the conversion of others, for such labour is the very means which God has appointed to promote our personal sanctification. But what is the work that is to be done? In the first place, we may observe, that seven hundred millions of human beings in heathendom, are dying, without the gospel. They constitute a part of this vineyard, and if God demands from the church any exertion for their conversion, which none can deny, then does he demand not only a definite amount of that exertion to be made by each branch of the visible church, but also a due proportion of that amount by each individual member in the several departments of Zion. And if some Christians think that there is a more urgent call from the destitution that prevails at home, than from those habitations of horrid cruelty where darkness covers the earth, and gross darkness the people, we shall not dispute with such about the particular sphere of their operations, hoping that when the offering is made, God will bless the object for the benefit of which it is appropriated. The most important inquiry is, How much does God demand from me in the extension of the kingdom of the Redeemer, either at home or abroad? Let no one consider this an unimportant question, for as certainly as their Head demands for this cause a certain amount of labour from the church as a body, so certainly does he demand a proportionate amount of that labour to be performed by each individual member. And if we should mistake in this particular, and through that mistake some of those to whom we were bound to send the gospel, should perish without it, how shall we answer the inquiry, "Where is thy brother?"

The parts of labour which we are to perform severally, must be determined by the word of God, and the circumstances in which we in his providence are placed. The direction of the sacred volume on the subject is—"Ye are not your own, ye are bought with a price, therefore glorify God in your bodies and your spirits which are His." Among other circumstances which are to regulate us in this matter, wealth and influence in society, are the most important. The silver and the gold belong to God. He does not bestow wealth for the purpose merely of rendering the outward condition of those who possess it more comfortable, even though they be his own people. He designs that they shall use it for his glory in promoting the spiritual interests of those whom he designs to save. It is his, it is not their own, he has given it, and he claims the right of directing to the manner in which it shall be appropriated. The wants of nature are to be satisfied, indeed, but even here erring mortals are liable to mistake, therefore no man, rich or poor, has a right to expend a single farthing, either of his accumulated gains or of his scanty earnings, until he shall have prayed in the spirit of the apostle, respecting this which God has given him, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" And after he shall have returned from his closet, we shall not be likely to dispute whether the proportion of his earnings or his gain which he may have resolved to put into the treasury of the Lord, shall be appropriated to home missions, or to the labours of the foreign field. Under these circumstances the matter will be settled by the wise Disposer of all things, and we are willing to abide by his decision. And if zealous Christians, instead of wasting their time in discussions about the relative claims of the home and foreign missions, which are indeed but parts of the same great work, would pursue the course we have mentioned, we think the interests of the gospel, both at home and abroad, would be more rapidly advanced.

Christians will of course disagree in their opinions respecting the subject of missions as well as other subjects, but why should this difference of sentiment be suffered to retard the work either at home or abroad? All believe that we are bound to contribute something to both purposes. But the difficulty is not so much respecting the object as the amount. If all would contribute as liberally as they ought, there would be no more want either at home or abroad. Those who feel interested in the foreign field more than others, need not ask their home missionary friends to give any more than they are giving now to send the gospel to the heathen, but let them be requested to increase their home missionary donations in the same proportion in which their foreign missionary friends propose to increase their contributions to the cause abroad. Suppose, for instance, a poor man is contributing $10 yearly to foreign missions, and $5 to home operations. The call from both becomes more pressing and urgent. He wishes to increase his subscription to foreign missions, but he is not able, so long as $5 and a proportionate increase are demanded from him to relieve the destitution at home. Now will not his neighbour who feels ardent in the cause at home, bring his actions to correspond with his feelings, and by a liberal contribution to that cause in which his feelings are enlisted, relieve his neighbour from some of his responsibilities at home, that he may be able to give to the foreign missions in proportion as he feels on that subject? If a person in one city feels disposed to encourage the foreign missions by an increase of $500 to the very liberal contributions and subscriptions he may already have made, let his rich neighbours of another city feel provoked to good works by his liberality, and in the first place resolve to contribute ac-according to the same proportion as the Lord may have prospered them, and when they come forward with their hundreds or their five hundreds, accompanied with their prayers for the divine blessing, none will feel disposed to dispute with them whether their contribution shall be expended at home or abroad, since if spent at home it will strengthen the cause abroad. The difficulty is not the manner in which the contributions of our friends shall be applied, but about the amount that shall be given. Let us all, therefore, on this subject pray, "Lord, what wilt thou have us to do?"

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSIONS.

THE PERSONALITY AND DIVINITY OF THE HOLY GHOST.

Among nearly all heathen nations there are traces of a belief of a great God, who, though existing in several persons, was yet in some unknown and wonderful manner united in one. Thus, the Hindoo Brahm, consisting of the three divinities, Brahma, Veeshnu, and Sheeva, and represented by three faces and six hands united in one body. Thus, the Persian triad, Ormusd, Mithra, and Orusman, and the legends told by the barbarians of the North about their deities. But yet it is to the Bible that we must look for any certain knowledge, respecting this plurality of persons in one Godhead, to be guided by the sacred light which it throws upon our path.

No one who reads the Bible can deny that it clearly teaches that there is a HOLY SPIRIT. But some say that not a being, but an attribute is meant by the term. The point then to be established is, that the HOLY SPIRIT is a distinct person: and this is done by the following considerations.

1. The personal pronoun of the masculine gender is used with regard to him. "The Spirit of truth, he shall bear witness of me." John xv. 25. "Ye were sealed with the Spirit of promise, who is the earnest of our inheritance." Eph. i. 13, 14.

2. He is joined with the Father and the Son as equally a distinct person. "The grace of our LORD JESUS CHRIST, the love of God, and the communion of the HOLY GHOST be with you." 2 Cor. xiii. 14. "Baptizing them in the name of the FATHER, and of the SON, and of the HOLY GHOST." Matt. xxviii. 19. "Grace be unto you from him which is, which was, and which is to come, and from the seven spirits which are before his throne, and from JESUS CHRIST who is the faithful witness, and the first-begotten of the dead, and the Prince of the kings of the earth." Rev. i. 4, 5.

3. Personal offices are ascribed to HIM. He is a comforter: "The Comforter—the SPIRIT OF TRUTH." John xv. 26. An intercessor, "The SPIRIT himself maketh intercession." Rom. viii. 26, 27. A witness, "The HOLY GHOST is a witness." Heb. x. 15.

4. He is represented as performing personal acts. He strives. Gen. vi. 3. He is sent forth. Ps. civ. 30. He searches. 1 Cor. ii. 10. He speaks. Acts x. 19. He leads. Rom. viii. 14.

It is evident that the HOLY SPIRIT is a distinct person in the adorable TRINITY, and he is also divine.

This is almost deducible from what has just been said, for he is never spoken of but as performing divine acts. But to prove it systematically:

(1.) He receives the names of God. He is called JEHOVAH. 2 Pet. i. 21, "Holy men of old spake as they were moved by the HOLY GHOST," compared with Numb. xii. 6, "If there be a prophet among you, I, the LORD, (Jehovah,) will make myself known unto him." Is. lxiii. 10, "They rebelled and vexed his HOLY SPIRIT;" compared with Ex. xvii. 7, "The children of Israel tempted the LORD." Is. vi. 9, "The LORD of hosts said, Go and tell this people! Hear ye indeed, but understand not, and see ye indeed, but do not perceive," compared with Acts xxviii. 25, "Well spake the HOLY GHOST by Isaiah the prophet unto our Fathers, saying, Hearing ye shall hear and not understand." JEHOVAH is the incommunicable name of Deity. He is also called God. Acts v. 3, When Ananias had lied unto the HOLY GHOST, Peter says, "Thou hast not lied unto man but unto God." 1 Cor. iii. 16, "Ye are the temple of God, and the SPIRIT of God dwelleth in you." He is called the LORD. "The LORD is that SPIRIT," 2 Cor. iii. 18; and again, 2 Thess. iii. 5, "The LORD direct your hearts into the love of God, and into the patient waiting for CHRIST."

(2.) He possesses divine attributes. He is eternal; in Heb. ix. 14, He is called the eternal SPIRIT. He is omnipresent. Ps. cxxxix. 7, "Whither shall I go from thy Spirit?" and, moreover, he dwells in all believers, though scattered in all parts of the earth. He is omniscient, "The SPIRIT searcheth all things."

(3.) He performs divine acts. He creates, "The Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters." Gen. i. 2. "Thou sendest forth thy SPIRIT—they are created." Ps. civ. 30. He sanctifies and regenerates. He works miracles, he is the source of inspiration. 1 Cor. xii. 8, 9, "To one is given by the SPIRIT the word of wisdom; to another, the word of knowledge by the same Spirit; to another, faith by the same Spirit; to another, the gifts of healing by the same Spirit; to another, the working of miracles; to another, discerning of spirits; to another, divers kinds of tongues; to another, the interpretation of tongues."

(4.) Divine worship is paid to him. He is the subject of prayer, as in the passage from 2 Thess. iii. 5, above cited, and he is united with the FATHER and the SON in the baptismal sacrament, and in the apostolic benediction.

REDEMPTION BY CHRIST JESUS.

It is a fact established more conclusively than any other fact recorded in history, that about two thousand years ago, there came into the world a person, who, after a life of spotless purity, and the most active and unwearied benevolence, and superhuman manifestations of power and wisdom, was put to death by the Roman governor of Judea. Against this personage not the least real crime could be alleged by his most infuriate enemies, so that it was manifest to the heathen magistrate that it was only through envy he had been delivered up. This personage claimed to have come to make atonement for sinners by his own death. His words were, "I lay down my life for the sheep." "I give my flesh for the life of the world." Unless, then, we are ready to say that Jesus was an impostor, that he claimed to be what he was not, and to do what he did not, we must acknowledge that he came to make an atonement for sin.

JESUS CHRIST is the only being who could make this atonement. No other being could say that he had power to lay down his life of himself. A creature can discharge only creature obligations; he can at most do no more than love the "LORD his GOD with all his heart, with all his soul, strength and mind," and any failure even for one instant to perform this duty he could never atone for. But JESUS being GOD was able not only to discharge completely all creature obligations, but also to make that expiation for sin which was necessary to reconcile GOD to man. The atonement which JESUS made was complete and perfect. Man could do nothing, and it leaves nothing for him to do. "When we were without strength in due time Christ died for the ungodly." "What the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, GOD sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin, condemned sin in the flesh." Rom. viii. 3.

In making an atonement, JESUS stands as the representative of sinners. Having never offended GOD, he needed not an atonement on his own behalf to be reconciled to him. Being perfectly pure and holy he needed no additional righteousness to make him acceptable in GOD's sight. It would be utterly inexplicable and contrary to all GOD's attributes, that Christ a holy being should have suffered, if he did not suffer for others. Could it be just in GOD to punish the innocent? Could it be wise to exhibit such sufferings as connected with perfect purity? Could it be good thus to reward virtue? Could it be true thus to falsify his own promises of happiness to the righteous? Could it be a manifestation of his power thus to suffer the enemies of his character and person, the violators of his laws, (for such undoubtedly the murderers of JESUS were) to triumph? No! Unless JESUS suffered for others, GOD could not be GOD.

But JESUS not only expiated the guilt of man. To have done this alone would have indeed freed him from punishment, but it would have given him no ground to look for happiness. At any moment GOD might with perfect justice have destroyed him: he would have had no right to expect eternal happiness. To give him this is a part of covenant stipulation. CHRIST therefore has procured a righteousness for his people which makes them acceptable in GOD's sight. They are "perfect through his comeliness put upon them." Ezek. xvi. 14.

GOD having in his sovereignty determined that the righteousness of Adam would avail to procure happiness for all his descendants, in the same way has also determined that the righteousness of CHRIST shall procure salvation for all whom he represented. GOD had a right to give righteous persons happiness on whatever conditions he chose. Now he has chosen to give it for the righteousness of Christ, hence he is called "the LORD our Righteousness." "He is made of GOD unto us wisdom and righteousness and sanctification and redemption." 1 Cor. i. 30. Every one who is saved must say, "In the LORD have I righteousness and strength." Is. xlv. 24.

It is owing to CHRIST's atonement that we escape the punishment due to us for sin; it is owing to his righteousness imputed to us that we find favour in the sight of GOD; but both these might be done and yet man remain unholy, since, although accepted in the sight of GOD, it is not from any holiness of his own, from any thing he possesses in his own character. But JESUS CHRIST died that he might remove sin. "He was manifested that he might destroy the works of the devil."

1 John, iii. 8. "He gave himself for us that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works." Titus ii. 14. Christ therefore procured for his people a holy nature. This is produced in them when they are born again of the Spirit, for the coming of the Spirit is a consequence of the death of Christ. "It is expedient for you," says the Saviour to his disciples, "that I go away, for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you, but if I depart, I will send him unto you." John xvi. 7. "The HOLY GHOST is shed on us abundantly through JESUS CHRIST our Saviour." Titus iii. 6.

We do not mean to say that the death of CHRIST is the cause of the coming of the SPIRIT. Its cause is his own divine love. But the SPIRIT of GOD could not dwell in beings who were enemies to GOD, and it is by the death of CHRIST that the door is opened, as it were, and the SPIRIT in the exercise of this previous love enters into the soul of man. When he comes, he enlightens the mind, renews the will, sanctifies the affections, and makes man more and more holy, until at length, sin being eradicated from his soul, he is prepared for heaven and eternal glory. CHRIST's righteousness and atonement entitle the sinner to everlasting happiness, but the Spirit prepares him for its enjoyment. "Ye are washed, ye are sanctified, ye are justified, in the name of the LORD JESUS and by THE SPIRIT OF OUR GOD." 1 Cor. vi. 11. "According to his mercy hath he saved us by the washing of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Ghost." Tit. iii. 5.

GLEANINGS.—NO. 7.

The Happy Man.—A pious divine had prayed earnestly many years that God would be pleased to send him a man to teach him the perfect way of truth. One morning he was told in a dream to go to the church, where he would find an instructor in the way of truth. When he came to the church-door, he found a man in rags, to whom he wished a good morning. "I never had a bad morning; for every morning, I praise God. If I am pinched with hunger, if it is rain, or snow, or hail, whether the day is serene or tempestuous, I praise God, and therefore I never have a joyless morning. If I am miserable in outward circumstances, and despised, I still praise God. You wished me to be fortunate; but I cannot be unfortunate, because nothing befalls me but according to the will of God; and I believe His will is always good in whatever He does or promises to do. You wished me always happy; but I cannot be unhappy, because my will is always resigned to the will of God." "But what would you say if God should thrust you down to hell?" "I have two arms, humility and love, with which I would hold fast my incarnate God and Saviour, and not let him go; and I would rather be in hell with God, than in heaven without Him."

The divine, astonished at the poor man's answers, asked him from whence he came. "I came from God." "Where did you find Him?" "Where I left the world." "Where did you leave Him?" "With the pure in heart." "What are you?" "I am a king." "Where is your kingdom?" "In my own heart; I have learned to rule my appetites and passions, and that is better than to rule any kingdom in the world." "How were you brought into this happy condition?" "By prayer, spiritual meditation, and union with God. Nothing below God could satisfy my desires. I have now found Him, and in Him I have found peace and rest."

Loss of Thirdly.—The Rev. Mr. —, minister of —, had a custom of writing the heads of his discourse on small slips of paper, which he laid on the Bible before him, to be used in succession. One day, while explaining the second head, he became a little warm in the harness, and came down with such a thump upon the Bible with his hand, that the ensuing slip fell over the edge of the pulpit, though unperceived by himself. On reaching the end of the second head, he looked down for his third slip, but alas! it was not to be found. "Thirdly," he cried, looking round him with great anxiety. After a little pause, "Thirdly," again he exclaimed, but still no thirdly appeared. "Thirdly I say, my brethren," pursued the bewildered clergyman; but not another word could he utter. At this point, while the congregation were partly sympathizing in his distress, and partly rejoicing in such a decisive instance of the impropriety of using notes in preaching, which has always been an unpopular thing in the Scotch clergy, an old woman rose up and addressed the preacher:—"If I am no mista'en, sir, I saw thirdly flee out at the east window a quarter of an hour syne." It is impossible for any but a Scotchman to conceive how much this account of thirdly was relished by that part of the congregation which condemned the use of notes.

Universality of Discontent.—A gentleman had a board put up on a part of his land, on which was written, "I will give this field to any one who is really contented;" and when an applicant came, he said, "Are you contented?" The general reply was, "I am." "Then," rejoined the gentleman, "what do you want with my field?"

Suicide.—Dr. Johnson having expressed a decided opinion against suicide, Mr. Boswell said, "Suppose a man is absolutely sure that if he lives a few days longer he shall be detected in a fraud, the consequences of which would be utter disgrace and expulsion from society." "Then," said Johnson, "let him go to some place where he is not known; don't let him go to the devil, where he is known." A.

HISTORICAL SKETCHES.

PRINCIPLES OF THE SCOTTISH MARTYRS.

BY DR. A. SYMINGTON.

They held the grand protestant doctrine of the perfection and supreme authority of the Holy Scriptures, and claimed a right to read, and think, and believe for themselves. They embraced the system of doctrine usually known in this country by the name of Calvinistic; but which we would rather call apostolic, or evangelical, for they called no man master, and would submit their consciences in this matter to no authority, excepting that of God speaking in the scriptures. The doctrines of human guilt and depravity, salvation by the cross of Christ, and by the grace of God, and influences of the Holy Spirit, formed their creed, and were the basis of that pious and holy character by which they were distinguished.

They claimed a right to worship God in the institutions which he has ordained, without the interference or authority of man. They contended for true liberty of conscience, and would not bow to receive from any human authority, ecclesiastical or civil, rites that had no sanction in the word of God. And when they had no alternative but to wrong their consciences or sacrifice their lives, they loved not their lives unto the death.

They held the exclusive supremacy of Jesus Christ in the church, and contended for the blood-chartered liberty of the church, and her independence of human authority. In the early establishment of the Reformation this was a prominent feature. The pope had assumed and exercised an authority over the church; Henry VIII., in his contentions with Rome, transferred this authority to himself, and in all the contentions with the house of Stuart, this was a main point. The independence of the church was boldly asserted by Henderson in the Assembly in Glasgow, 1638. The reformers and sufferers contended for the liberty of the ministers, the courts, and the members of the church, and would not bow to prelatie more than to popish authority, nor to a civil ecclesiastic supremacy. They were persuaded of the scriptural authority of the Presbyterian polity, but held it in its unfettered freedom and independence; and viewed with jealousy every encroachment of human authority, as not only opposed to their liberty, but as reflecting dishonour upon their Saviour. Fidelity to this truth, as interfering with the taking of oaths, in which a supremacy over the church was recognised, formed one chief ground of the sufferings of those troublous times.

The martyrs held the divine institution of magistracy, and the obligation of the scripture precepts in the erection of civil government and in the appointment of governors. They held that persons invested with authority should not only be persons of ability and moral character, but fearers of God, and professors of the true religion. No class of men were more jealous of the liberty of the church than they were; yet they held that an obligation lay upon a nation, by their rulers, to favour and support religion; viewing this as due, in the first place, to the Prince of the kings of the earth, whom all nations are to serve, and as, in the second place, forming the only sure basis of national virtue, union, peace, and prosperity. They would not submit to an Erastian supremacy, placing the church in subjection to the state; nor did they assume an authority over the state, requiring its subjection to the church. They drew the distinction between civil and ecclesiastical authority, with judicious exactness; and, without confounding these two things, required their co-operation, each in its own sphere, as co-ordinate powers under one Supreme Divine authority. They did not confound the constitutional exercise of civil authority, in giving facilities and protection to true religion, with the base prostitution of it to state or personal purposes. They found things civil and religious recognised in the same divine law, connected in the complex nature and relations of man, related also in the necessary connexions of things, and combined in the corruptions against which they testified; and be it right or wrong, such is the fact, that the reformers did not exclude religion from national concerns.

But it is due to them to say, that nothing was more remote from their minds than the idea of propagating religion with the sword. Called, as they were, in their perilous circumstances, to assume the attitude of defence, they disavowed and abhorred the propagation of religion by other than the weapons of scripture, argument, prayer, and example. In language as strong as could be employed by those who accuse them of sanguinary principles, they declared,—“We positively disavow, as horrid murder, the killing of any, because of a different persuasion and opinion from us, albeit some have invidiously cast this odious calumny upon us.”

Besides, the martyrs held the great desirableness of union and uniformity in the profession of religion. They testified against sectarianism, or the violation of the unity of the church, by cutting or dividing it into isolated sections. God is one; religion, as a principle in the heart, is one; the word of God is one; Christ is one, and his law is one. The law of Christ is not an indeterminate thing; it is definite, and is distinguished by a universality and simplicity adapted to the situation of the church in every circumstance, and providing for its visible unity. The reformers were unionists upon principle, and on the largest scale too. They sought union upon the basis of truth. They held the doctrine of the unity of the church, and endeavoured its exemplification. They wished, also, by good laws, and scripturally qualified rulers, the union and prosperity of the kingdom. And it is not to be denied that, without making any compromise of the authority and freedom of either, they sought a harmonious co-operation and reciprocation between church and state, in subserviency to godliness and honesty. Nor were their pious wishes confined to their own loved country. They looked abroad. They sought the enlargement of the kingdom of Jesus Christ, and the peace and tranquillity of all Christian kingdoms and commonwealths; the Christianization and union of all the nations of the earth. But they would not sacrifice truth for union; nor did they stumble at the impossibility of obtaining uniformity in the profession of religion. The event showed that they were premature in their expectations. Their aim, however, was excellent; and predictions assure us that the evil of division will be healed in the arrival of a day in which “there shall be one Lord and his name One.”

The martyrs also held covenanting to be a fit and divinely authorized means of consolidating union in a church and a nation, and of giving security to the interests of religion in both. They found confederation in the transactions of mankind; they viewed it to be based on the moral law; they saw it largely exemplified in the history of the Jews; they read prophetic intimations of the practice; and they had before them the example of the reformed churches. Besides, they were, in a measure, driven into covenanting by the plottings of their enemies. At the period of the first reformation, the National Covenant of Scotland had been prepared and gone into, when the jealousy of the nation had been awakened by the interception of letters from Rome, granting a dispensation to the Roman Catholics to profess the reformed tenets for a time; with a view, no doubt, to the ultimate overthrow of the reformed cause. The covenant united the country, and proved a means of preserving the reformed religion from the perils to which it was exposed from the machinations of enemies.

At a subsequent period, this covenant was again sworn, as applying to prelacy as well as popery, and a solemn league and covenant was subsequently framed to preserve the reformed religion in Scotland, and extend it in England and Ireland. These deeds formed in those days the magna charta of civil and religious liberty; and were held in the highest veneration by those who contended against the overthrow of the reformation. The offence in which these deeds were held by the enemies of the reformation, may be learned from the public odium attempted to be thrown upon them by their condemnation and burning. But the martyrs held fast their obligation, because of that scriptural reformation which they embraced, and which they had been the means, so seasonably and efficiently under God, of preserving.

The martyrs also held the duty of resisting authority when it violated divine and constitutional rights, and set at naught all attempts at reformation. No race of men regarded superiors with greater respect than they did; and this too from a conscientious principle. They were not rash to resist authority, even when it was abused. They exercised patience, remonstrated, and employed every means of reformation. But authority may be abused, and power may be turned to oppression and persecution; and abuse may reach a point when resistance becomes a duty; and if ever it reached this point in any case, it was in the days of the late martyrs. Then, after setting, with much patience and long-suffering, the example of obedience for conscience sake, they taught by their example the awful but necessary lesson of resistance for conscience sake; giving the doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance to the winds.

Such are some of the leading principles of the martyrs. In contending for these principles, they viewed them in a three-fold connexion, as will appear from their writings and testimonies. They held them, first, because founded on the Bible, to which they made their appeal as the alone supreme authority. They were attached to these principles, in the second place, as entering into the ecclesiastical and civil constitutions of the country, after it had, in the goodness of God, obtained reformation; which will account for their frequent reference to acts of Assembly, and of parliament, to vindicate themselves from the charge of sedition and rebellion. And they adhered to these principles again, as having been embraced in the covenants, of whose obligation they had a strong sense in their conscience.

MISCELLANEOUS COMMUNICATIONS.

NOTES BY A TRAVELLER IN THE SOUTH OF IRELAND.

The traveller in the south of Ireland must be forcibly struck with the little respect paid to the day of rest. The very first Sabbath I spent in Kerry, troops of boys were all day at their sports, and in the afternoon, I observed immense crowds returning from cock-fights in the country. In the summer season, after Mass, the lower order sassembles in a field for dancing: while, over the whole south, the first day of the week is the day on which the temperance bands meet to practise. Holidays are exalted above the Sabbath. A devoted friend to the Home mission, met a poor woman with whom he was acquainted, a distance of fourteen miles from the village in which she lived. He asked her what had brought her so long away from home; "Why, sir," said she, "some of the neighbours gathered in on the last holiday, to dig my grain of potatoes, and when the priest heard it, he asked why I let them do it on a holiday, could they not have done it after the Mass on Sunday? for that, you must go to Castlersland for a ticket," or, in other words, this poor widow had to travel twenty-eight miles for a ticket of absolution, for having her potatoes dug on a holiday, when she might have them dug upon the Sabbath. Within four miles of Tralee, there is a celebrated holy well, called Thubbernaml, or the blessed fountain; when I last visited it, I beheld several mothers bathing their diseased children in its waters. Within a few yards of it, in a solid mass of mason work, there are three idols of stone, one represents St. Patrick, another our Saviour, and the third St. John. Before these idols, on particular days, immense multitudes bow down in lowliest adoration. While I remained here, an aged man and woman were on their knees before them, and when the poor old woman from exhaustion was ceasing from her prayers, the person who has charge of the well, ordered her to continue. When the venerable-looking man had done with his paternosters, he kissed the idols, giving the first kiss to St. Patrick. Indeed, from this cause, the faces of the idols are worn smooth as the most polished marble.

Near the well is the holy mound, in which the saint is buried, and from which each worshipper takes away a little earth as a preservative from all evil. To such scenes, the labours of the Missionary and Scripture Reader are directed, and under the blessing of Providence, their efforts have been crowned with success. I may refer to one or two conversions, at such places. One of these was that of a young girl, whom the priest, calculating, perhaps, on the weakness of her sex, wished to frighten back into the errors of old mother Rome. For this purpose, he, amongst other threats from the altar on Sabbath, declared, that if she continued obstinate, he would put a pair of goat's horns upon her head. This awful threat, however, failed to intimidate her, and she remained steadfast in the faith.

Another convert, whose case is somewhat peculiar, was a priest's clerk in a neighbouring village. This man, on leaving the church, brought with him, as trophies, the instruments with which the host or sacramental wafer is made. They consist of a saucepan, spoon, and baking-tongs. The tongs, the only thing requiring description, resembled much a pair of nut-crackers. The tongs consist of two plates, a few inches in breadth, on the inner side of which are inscribed in large capital letters, I. H. S., that is, Iesus hominum Salvator: Jesus the Saviour of men. By pressing the plates together, on a piece of boiled flour, the wonder-working wafer is produced. Thus prepared, it is ready for the altar, and at the fiat of the priest, though it had once been wheat, it is now changed into the body, blood, soul, and divinity of Christ. A visitor, attracted by the noise of this reformation, made his appearance to the man. This was his grace, or, as they style him, his holy reverence, The R. C. Bishop, but he was too late, the day of his power had passed.

The only incident connected with this visit which appears worth mentioning, is his interview with a convert on Ventry strand. "Paddy, said the Bishop, addressing him by his name, "did not you turn a Sassannagh or heretic?" "I am a protestant," answered Paddy. "And what induced you to turn?" said the Bishop. "Wait," said Paddy, "and I will tell your reverence:" saying these words, he put his hand into his pocket to get the Irish Testament. But the moment the Bishop saw the formidable volume, he betrayed symptoms of uneasiness, and away he rode. Paddy, however, followed after him, still repeating aloud,—“Wait, and I will tell your reverence.” But in vain.

Such are the errors and superstitions which fetter down the minds of the deluded Romanist in every land, and nothing save Christianity, can ever remove them. To how great an extent do we see these errors prevailing over this growing republic, and will not Christians arouse to a sense of their duty towards these poor people? There are in the pale of this church, many whom the Lord intends to be heirs of immortality, else the command, “Come out of her, my people,” would not be given.

A FATAL ERROR.

In an appeal in behalf of Home Destitutions, for which the Free Church of Scotland are making an effort to provide, it is said: Fatal would be the error should the church be permitted to fall into the mistake of supposing that demands for the cause of God, after certain pressures are over, will gradually become less. No, as the pressure of great efforts is yet in its infancy, so the call for the gold of Christians is as yet but a feeble cry.

The church of Christ must not, dare not, shrink from going on with her work, on account of the vulgar and cunning objection as to her constant outcry for money. It has been set up by the father of lies, who, as to the motives of God’s servants, as in every other thing, has been a liar from the beginning; but that does not prevent any particular lie, such as this, from being re-echoed by the world, and stereotyped against every true church of the Lord Jesus, engaged to any large extent in carrying forward his cause. After all, the answer of the servants of Christ, in dealing with God’s children, must just resolve itself into this—Ye know the grace of the Lord Jesus, how that for our sakes, when he was rich he became poor. In this matter we have but little to do with the world—our objects are not secular, our warrant is not secular; and as to the artillery of motives that we bring to bear upon the household of faith, the world, alas! cannot comprehend them.

Often has a church withheld more than meet, and it tended to poverty. The less it gave, the less it was able to give. But never was there a church that became poorer by giving in the spirit of Christ, and for the promotion of his cause. On the contrary, whenever a church has manifested the riches of its liberality, it has proved fruit which has abounded to its account.

ECCLESIASTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

LETTER FROM THE EASTERN REF. PRES. SYNOD.

The following letter from our brethren in Ireland, will be read with much interest. The noble position which they have assumed, and the enlightened Christian zeal and activity which they display, are worthy of the highest commendation. We had hoped to have presented to our readers an abstract of their proceedings at their last meeting in Derry, but the paper which contained it has been unfortunately lost. We hope soon to procure another copy.

To the Reverend, the Moderator and remanent members of the General Synod of the Reformed Presbyterian Church in the United States of America.

REVEREND AND DEARLY BELOVED FATHERS AND BRETHREN,

Although a strictly official correspondence has not been carried on between you and us, yet we were not altogether unacquainted with your trials, your struggles, your triumphs and your present honourable position, as witnesses for the sacred cause of truth. Our sentiments and our feelings in reference to you and your cause were sometimes communicated through the medium of our venerable and highly esteemed friend, Dr. Wylie. Lest from our omitting to address you formally, an apprehension should arise that there is coldness, or indifference on our part, two of the brethren were appointed at the late meeting in Londonderry to convey to you the assurance of our fraternal regard, and our earnest wish for the maintenance of frequent mutual correspondence.

We observed with intense interest the progress and the termination of the controversy which issued in the disruption of the Ref. Pres. Church in America; and we recognise in the treatment which you experienced from your former brethren, a striking similarity to the misrepresentation, calumnies and abuse to which we ourselves have been subjected. We would not recall, however, the unhappy circumstances which led to the breach in the United States, and in Ireland. We would rather desire to have our minds consoled by the truth that Messiah reigns, and that in his own time "the divisions of Reuben," which are now to be deplored, will be healed. We believe that one of the reasons why the followers of the Lamb should love one another, is that they are fellow-sufferers.

From your Minutes of Synod and the Banner of the Covenant we have received from time to time, much gratifying information respecting your ecclesiastical affairs at home, and your Missionary operations in India. These publications were kindly transmitted to several of us, by some of your Ministers, and by Geo. H. Stuart, Esq., who is very favourably known to some of us. Although we did not enjoy the privilege of synodical correspondence, we were favoured with friendly and fraternal communications from respected members of your body. By these means we were made acquainted with some of the most interesting occurrences in your department of the church: and in a similar way, we apprehend, you obtained some knowledge of our circumstances. In the increase, fidelity and zeal of your ministers and licentiates, and the generally prosperous state of your congregations, and in all the evidences that the pleasure of the Lord is prospering in your hands, we sincerely rejoice.

The visit and short sojourn of Dr. Wylie among us, afforded us gratification in a very high degree. In our intercourse with him, we found abundant evidence that he is well deserving of the high reputation in which he is held, wherever he is known; and his appearance in our pulpits was hailed, and much esteemed, by our people, as well as by ourselves.

We have been recently favoured with a visit from your worthy Missionary from Northern India, the Rev. J. R. Campbell. He attended our late meeting of Synod in Derry, co-operated in the dispensation of the Sacrament of the Supper in two of our vacancies, and visited most of our congregations, giving, in judicious lectures, important information respecting the progress of missions generally, and especially concerning the state of the Mission under the auspices of your Synod at Saharanpur. We were greatly delighted to see and to hear him, and to enjoy his society: and we sincerely congratulate you on your having secured the services of a Missionary distinguished for intelligence, zeal and piety. In Mr. Campbell happily meet the manners of a Gentleman, the attainments of a Scholar, and the graces of a Christian. On motion, the unanimous and cordial thanks of the Synod were given to him for his admirable missionary lectures, and for his kindness in consenting to visit our several congregations for the purpose of laying before them such important information as he might be pleased to communicate.

The judgments of God, you are aware, have been abroad in our land. By famine and pestilence, many thousands of its inhabitants have been removed to the invisible world. The loud cry of Irish distress was wafted across the Atlantic, and reached the shores and the interior of your Continent, and the hearts of its inhabitants. American sympathy and beneficence were efficiently manifested towards the suffering Irish. Very little evidence, alas! has been afforded that the inhabitants have learned righteousness.

We have little of importance to communicate at present, respecting the state of our small community. Our organized congregations are maintaining their ground amidst the difficulties occasioned by the awful calamity with which our country was visited; and our vacancies have a promising aspect. The greatest peace and harmony prevail in all our meetings, and in this respect there is to us an important and pleasing contrast between our present state and that in which we were placed for many years before the disruption.

A few noble-minded persons in our church, are using exertions to raise funds for the support and extension of the gospel, that are deserving of the highest praise, and which called forth a vote of thanks from our Synod at the last meeting.

We apprehend that your views and ours harmonize with regard to legislative enactments and endowments for the support of religion:—and we take the liberty of submitting the resolutions on this subject, which we thought it reasonable to adopt at our late meeting.

“Resolved, That we, the members of the Eastern Reformed Presbyterian Synod, believe that to force men to support the religion of Jesus Christ, is a gross insult offered to our blessed Redeemer.

“That we consider this insult greatly aggravated, when solemnly sanctioned by Act of Parliament. It is iniquity established by law.

“That to force one denomination of Christians to support the religion of another denomination of Christians, we regard as religious persecution.

“That to force men to support a religion which they conscientiously believe to be Antichristian, we regard as most unreasonable and intolerant.

“That to force men to support our religion under the pretext that we are more orthodox than they—we regard as a great absurdity: for if we are more orthodox, we ought to be more honest.

“That to force men of the most opposite and contradictory sentiments into a confederacy to support each others’ opinions, we regard as an insult to reason and common sense, as well as to the God of truth, and Saviour of the world.

"That whilst we are most decidedly opposed to all such absurd and Antichristian measures, we believe that the love of Christ is a principle sufficiently powerful to support our holy religion.

"We rejoice that this divine principle is manifesting itself in the Missionary exertions of pious men of various churches. We rejoice that among pious Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Independents, Methodists, Moravians, Baptists, &c., there is a holy emulation. The contest now is, who shall do most for the evangelization of the world. We have reason to thank God, that in our own small community, a missionary spirit is reviving and exertions are being made, worthy of the highest praise."

The foregoing resolutions express what were always our sentiments but we consider the aspect of the times, as rendering it dutiful to give to them our judicial sanction.

In conclusion, dear Fathers and Brethren, repeating our wish for frequent correspondence, rejoicing in your prosperity, and praying for the success of the Redeemer's cause in your hands, we are yours in the bonds of the gospel.

By order of the Eastern Reformed Presbyterian Synod in Ireland.

THE THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

The welfare of the Theological Seminary is a subject in which all must feel a deep interest who are attached to the principles of our church, and who desire to see her stakes strengthened, and her cords lengthened. The church looks with peculiar anxiety to the source from which she is to derive her future teachers; she is solicitous to know what is the nature and character of the instructions they receive, and what the prospect of her obtaining a supply adequate to her need. The Seminary is a reservoir from which must proceed the streams which will irrigate the garden of the LORD, and whether its waters are wholesome and abundant, are questions of no small interest.

It gives us great pleasure to be able to state that the condition of the Seminary has never before been so prosperous. The Professors are untiring in their attention to the duties of their respective chairs, and the instructions which they communicate are calculated, with the blessing of God, and the influence of the HOLY SPIRIT, to make those whom they instruct, "Men of God, perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works." Lectures are delivered by both Professors, recitations made in Hebrew, Greek, and Church History, and essays read on prescribed subjects. Besides their own private meetings for mutual improvement, the afternoons of five days in the week are spent with the Professors in attention to their appropriate branches of study. The number of students of various stages of progress, is thirteen, of whom four are in the first class, and may be expected to receive licensure in the spring. All these young men appear to have consecrated themselves wholly to the work of the ministry, and to be in earnest in preparing to engage in it. In connexion with the studies of the Seminary, they are actively engaged in Sabbath school instruction, in assisting in meetings of prayer and Christian fellowship, and in other efforts to do good. There is reason to hope that they will go forth from the Seminary not only well instructed in doctrinal truth, and able to teach others also, but that, in addition, they will be prepared to take an active part in the various benevolent enterprises of the age, and to lead the church onward in aggressive movements against the kingdom of Satan. We may expect in them the ministry which our age, our country, our church, requires. Men of genuine religion, sound knowledge, liberal and comprehensive views, firm and intelligent attachment to the truth, with zeal, enterprise, activity, industry, and perseverance, who will be instant in season and out of season, and count it their honour and happiness to spend and be spent in the service of their LORD.

The importance and excellence of the Seminary, and its present flourishing condition will lead every one to give a ready answer to the question, Shall it be sustained? Will not prayer be made for it continually, that GOD by his SPIRIT would bless the instructions delivered, and would make all its ministers truly converted persons, lest while they preach Christ to others, they may be themselves cast-aways. And who is there that will not contribute his or her mite, (for no more is needed from each person, if all would give,) to furnish the pecuniary resources required. It is hoped that the contributions which will be received this year will be liberal, since, in addition to the object to which they have hitherto been appropriated, it is desirable to be able to give some assistance to such persons as may have abandoned other sources of support, that they might devote themselves to preparation for the service of the church. Will not this be thought of? How many of the richer members of our churches singly? how many of the less affluent, by uniting together, might be the means of bringing out to the gospel-field some young man who would reap a large harvest of redeemed souls? Who will aid in this? Reader, will you?

MISSIONARY INTELLIGENCE.

EXTRACT OF A LETTER OF REV. J. CALDWELL, DATED SAHARANPUR,
SEPTEMBER 17, 1847.

DEAR MR. STUART.—I should be much gratified in replying to your long and kind letter of the 26th of February last, to be able to write you in detail of the affairs of the station, since the date of my last to you. But as I obtained the intelligence of the departure of the next steamer from this country only to-day, it is quite out of my power to do so. I did hope that I should be able to communicate with my Philadelphia friends every month or two, but have hitherto been, from some cause or other, foiled in every attempt.

Ere this reaches you, I suppose Mr. Campbell will have arrived in America. If so, kindly mention that I wrote to him last April, and directed my letter to the care of your brethren in Manchester, as he wished me to do, and that I am very sorry to learn that my letter never reached him. It may have been sent to America by mistake. I wrote at the same time to Mr. Wylie, and hope he has received my letter.

The enclosed is, as you will perceive, another of my scraps on India. I am really afraid it is not worth publishing.* I hope the next will be a little more interesting, as the subject will certainly be so.

* This interesting article will appear in our next No.

I have merely time to state, that every department of our labour is going on as usual. The orphan boys, thus far, promise well, but what shall be the result of their training, is known only to God. Four of them have been employed daily since they came, about three hours at manual labour. As I mentioned in my letter to Mr. Wylie, last April, they have been set to learn the Cabinet business, and one or two of them learn rapidly. Their education in the meantime has not been neglected. At least four of them are able to read short sentences in Persian characters. They are to be set at writing in that character, also, in a few days.

Since I last wrote, I have commenced a Bible class with our native brethren, and find it both interesting and useful. I use the Sabbath School Union's Questions, which I translate into Hindu, for the use of my class. Some of them, it is true, understand English, but others of them do not know a syllable of it, and on their account it is necessary to have the service all in Hindu. If some kind friend in America should make a donation of a hundred dollars or so to our mission, and allow me to apply it as I thought proper, I should have a volume or two of the Union Questions printed in Hindu for the special use of our native brethren.

J. CALDWELL.

REV. MR. CAMPBELL'S LECTURES.

The Rev. Mr. Campbell has been engaged in delivering a very instructive and interesting course of lectures on India as a field of Missionary labour. These lectures were illustrated by numerous idols, images of men of different castes and occupations, drawings on paper and mica, with various other articles connected with domestic life and prevalent customs in India. After the regular series of lectures was completed, a meeting was held at which Mr. Campbell gave answers to questions which all were at liberty to propose to him. At this meeting addresses were delivered by Rev. Drs. Crawford, and Lord and Messrs. Dales, Cooper, and Bowers. The audiences throughout were very large, and exceedingly attentive. Mr. Campbell expects to repeat these lectures in other places as he may have opportunity.

THE SABBATH SCHOOL.

TEMPER IN TEACHING.

Few persons seem to have proper apprehensions of the sacredness which attaches to the instruction of youth. Hence many of the errors of teachers; and hence, consequently, many of the mishaps and catastrophes of pupils.

You have, I will suppose, under your tuition, a little boy, eight or nine years of age. It is a most interesting period of life, and the charge is one of the most momentous nature. I can conceive of few employments more delightful than the training of such a child, and there is certainly none which is more responsible. Every touch you give makes its mark, as the fingers on a mass of ductile wax. You scarcely say, or do, or omit any thing, without contributing in some way or other, to form the character of your pupil. He finds an example, for good or for evil, in every thing about you.

Let me direct attention to a single particular, in which we are all apt to go wrong; I mean the temper which we manifest in the company of our pupils. Almost every child has some trait which tries the temper of the teacher. He is stubborn or forgetful, idle or hasty: these are great faults, but that of the teacher who loses his temper is greater. Patience is a virtue which is especially demanded in the work of instruction; but for this reason, above others, that all impatience on the teacher's part disturbs, in a high degree, the process of communicating moral truth. If the teacher grows warm, especially if he use reproachful words, the child will suffer pain: some children will suffer great pain. If this be often repeated, an association will be formed in the mind of the child which may render the peculiar topic of instruction hateful for life. I could mention, if it were proper, a very striking instance of this. When the child is scolded, or boxed, or laughed at, a scar is sometimes left in his memory; and to my mind this is a very serious thing. We are dealing with a material more precious than the diamond, and more lasting than the sun. We are forming the tablet, on which may be, on one day impressed the image of the glorious God. We are handling that which is delicate as the rose-leaf, yielding as clay, and yet more mighty, when trained, than all engines of power. We are conversing with those whose angels do always behold the face of God. Let us treat them with sacred awe. Let no word or tone betray any thing sinful for them to imitate. Remember the word of the Roman:—Reverentia magna debetur pueris—Great reverence is due to the young. Remember the higher words of Christ: "Take heed lest ye offend (or cause to stumble) one of these little ones."

I am persuaded that much of our instruction goes for nothing, just for want of temper. The motto of the teacher should be, LOVE IS POWER. A loving teacher will communicate twice as much as another.—And this is compatible with a high measure of authority. There are some who never rebuke a child, even for a slight breach of decorum, but in the language and tone of bitter sneer or sarcasm. This is like burning the tendrils with a hot iron. It is an unlovely weapon with any age; but when applied to shrinking, sensitive childhood, it is barbarous and cruel.

To make a child angry during his lesson, is to give him his food scalding hot. Let the operation be repeated a number of times, and he will contract a dislike for the teacher and the teachings. Every unkind feeling thus engendered in his little bosom, will go a certain length towards fixing an evil habit upon him. From such causes human character receives its impress. O how holier a race would grow up, if teachers in all their dealings with little ones, would bear in mind that the Christian love of the heart should be operative, even in their earliest and slightest teaching.

FAMILY CIRCLE.

THREE FAULTS OF NURSES.

1. To lisp in a baby style, when the same words in an endearing tone would please as well; the reverse should be the case—the voice clear, emphatic, and each syllable distinctly articulated for imitation.

2. To tell of witches, ghosts, and goblins; such superstitions, impressed upon young minds, are rarely got rid of.

3. To direct a child to act like a man; whereas, it is not often becoming for a little boy to ape the man, but only to conform his demeanour to his age; every age has its own peculiar decorousness.

INTELLECTUAL PRECOCITY.

It once happened that an anxious mother asked Mrs. Barbault at what age she should begin to teach her child to read?

"I should much prefer that a child should not be able to read before five years of age," was the reply.

"Why, then, have you written books for children at three?"

"Because, if young mammas will be very busy, they had better teach in a good way than a bad one."

I have known clever precocious children at 3 years, dunces at 12; and dunces at 6, particularly clever at 16. One of the most popular authoresses of the present day could not read when she was seven. Her mother was rather uncomfortable about it, but said that as every body did learn to read with opportunity, she supposed that her child would do so at last. By eighteen, this apparently slow genius paid the heavy but inevitable debts of her father, from the profits of her own works; and before she was thirty, had published thirty volumes!

STARTING CHILDREN IN THE WORLD.

"Many an unwise parent labours hard and lives sparingly, all his life, to give his children a start in the world. Setting a young man afloat, with money left by his relatives, is like tying bladders under the arms of one who cannot swim; ten chances to one, he will lose his bladders, and go to the bottom. Teach him to swim, and he will never need the bladders."

Is it not frequent, very frequent, for parents to toil and labour, drag out a miserable slavish life with miserly parsimoniousness, refusing to contribute to objects of real benevolence? And for what? to give their children a start! enable them to make a dash! What has been the result? This same wealth, hoarded by cringing parsimony, has proved a curse to body and soul! God has testified his disapprobation of this course most fearfully!

"There is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty." "There is that scattereth, and yet increaseth." Lay up treasure in heaven; be rich toward God. Cultivate the mind. Train your children to habits of industry and virtue; give them a sound, thorough education, on Bible principles. These will be of more value to them, than the wealth of the Indies, the gold of Peru.

FOR THE YOUNG.

WILLIAM HERBERT.

"O, dear Martha," said William Herbert, in a tone of despondency, to his older sister, "I don't believe I shall ever be good."

"Why, my dear," said his sister, raising her eyes from the print she was examining, "what has happened to discourage your attempt to-day?"

"Nothing more to-day than any other day; but somehow it seems as if I don't know how to be good; I can do my work and get my lessons, and mind what you tell me pretty well, but," as he continued, he came close to his sister's side, and spake in a more subdued tone of voice, "I don't love to think about God, Martha. I can't be good, as you, and father, and Aunt Hannah are, and as dear mother was good. There is a strange feeling, when I think of the words which she said to me when she was dying. I don't want to forget them, but sometimes they make me feel afraid."

Martha put her arm around her brother's waist, and kissed the cheek which was glowing with excitement of unwonted feeling. She felt a Christian sister's strong sympathy for the motherless boy, who, it was evident, had just begun to seek for true light, amid darkness by corruption within, and by bad influence without. With a silent prayer for the Divine Spirit's aid, she said—

"I know what you mean, William. There are times when all around must look dark and cheerless to those who do not love God. And even a loving mother's dying counsel, when it has been neglected, is recalled with a mysterious dread. But, my dear, there is one who is both ready and willing to remove all your gloomy fears. If you will only be persuaded to give your heart to him, you will find a peace and joy in believing, of which you cannot now conceive. You say you can't be good—you don't know how, and that is very true. It is true of every person in the world. No one can change his own heart. But God has promised to do this great work for all who will wait upon him. If you will only sincerely and perseveringly seek his favour, pray for the influences of his Spirit, regard its teachings, and trust in the Saviour, you will be a child of God, and then you will wonder how it could be that you did not love him before."

William listened with much attention to his sister's words, and when she had stopped speaking, he said with an appearance of much feeling:

"I sometimes wonder I don't love God now. He has done so much for me, I will try and seek him, I am resolved."

And this resolution was kept, and William soon realized the truth of the promise, "I love them that love me, and they that seek me early shall find me."

THE POOR SHEPHERD BOY.

The Rev. John Brown, when a poor shepherd boy, conceived the idea of learning Latin and Greek, and having procured a few old books, accomplished the task while tending his cattle on the hills. So successful was he, that some of the old and superstitious people in the neighborhood concluded that he must have been assisted by the "evil spirit." On one occasion he went to Edinburgh, plaided and barefoot, walked into a bookseller's store and asked for a Greek Testament. "What are you going to do with a Greek Testament?" said the bookseller. "Read it," was the prompt reply. "Read it!" exclaimed the skeptical bookseller, with a smile: "ye may have it for nothing if ye'll read it." Taking the book, he quietly read off a few verses, and gave the translation; on which he was permitted to carry off the Greek Testament in triumph.—Turnbull's Genius of Scotland.

[We are indebted for the wood cut at the commencement of this No. to the Pres. Board of Foreign Missions. The following description is taken from the Foreign Missionary:]

THE INDIANS OF NORTH AMERICA.

This picture will be interesting to our young readers. It describes a visit made by the Rev. Mr. West, an English missionary, to some Indians living between 500 and 600 miles from his station, which was at the Red River Settlement, near Lake Winnipeg, in the north-western part of Upper Canada. Mr. West had to travel in a sledge or sleigh drawn over the snow by a team of dogs. It is said that each dog is so strong, that over the smooth and almost glassy surface of the frozen snow he can haul a weight of about two hundred pounds, and can travel sometimes as much as sixty miles in a day.

The missionary must have felt a great degree of interest in the salvation of the Indians, to be willing to make so long a journey in the midst of the winter, to preach the gospel unto them. But if his heart was moved by love to the Saviour, and by pity for the Indians, then no doubt he felt very happy while making this journey, and afterwards while telling them all about Jesus—who he was—why he died for sinners—where he is now—what he is willing still to do for them that trust in him—and how he will make his friends happy in heaven. Would not many of our little readers feel it to be a privilege to speak of these things to the poor heathen, and especially to the little Indian children who are looking with wonder at the missionary?

A great many Indians are poorly clad, live in bark huts, and depend for their food on the wild animals and birds which they can kill with their guns, or catch with their snares; and thus they lead a miserable life in this world. What makes their condition far worse, however, is that they have no knowledge of a better life in the next world, because they know nothing about our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ. Let us hope that the Indians represented in the above Engraving, though as poor as any others when Mr. West went to see them, may have paid good attention to the sermons which he preached unto them, and learned to trust in Christ for salvation. If they did, then no doubt their temporal lot has become much better than it was when this picture was taken. They have built themselves warmer houses, and learned to plough the ground and raise potatoes, and wheat, and Indian corn. Their children have been sent to school, and both parents and children have gone regularly to church on the Sabbath. And by this time, they may have become as civilized and intelligent and pious as some of the Indians, among whom missionaries have been, now are. "Godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come." This has been seen in many Indian tribes. The gospel is the great means of their civilization, and it is the only means of their salvation. Many Indians have received the gospel, and are now living happily under its influence. And some of them have died in its faith, cheered by its hopes; and they are now in heaven. There is an excellent little Sabbath School book, called a Memoir of Catharine Brown, which shows what the gospel can do for Indian children. It enabled her to become an eminent Christian, and to leave this world in peace and hope. May all the children and young persons who read this article, become the true friends of Christ! They will then have the same peace and hope which she enjoyed. And they will be anxious to send the gospel unto all who do not possess it.

PRACTICAL ESSAYS.

SABBATH SICKNESS.

The following article, describing a disease no less common than dangerous, and showing its cure, is worth reading, and we hope will be found profitable.

Not long since, on hearing it related that a certain minister was accustomed in the stated exercises of the sanctuary to pray for the ungodly sick, who were able to labour hard through the week, but too ill to attend public worship on the Sabbath, our attention was especially directed to this suffering class of fellow-beings. And as the disease is far more prevalent than is generally imagined, and it is thought to be contagious, as whole families usually have it when the head is materially affected—and frightfully dangerous—it seems but an act of common humanity to give the alarm. From the development of its symptoms, for the sake of convenience, we have named it “Sabbath Sickness,” or if any should prefer the term, they may call it Sabbath ague.

The seat of the disease is said to be the heart, and through that organ the head and other parts of the system become affected. It is not, however, an enlargement of the heart, but rather an extreme contraction of that organ. Moreover, it is found that persons who naturally have small hearts, are predisposed to the disease, and on such remedial agents have less effect. Like other internal diseases, its approaches are insidious and stealthy; and although the subject constantly bears with him the elements of the malady, which may be seen by the careful observer, yet as the symptoms are remittent, and only develop themselves strongly on the return of the Sabbath, the patient has little or no apprehension of evil from this seventh-day ague.

But his apathy increases his danger. The most intelligent authors who have written upon it, are all agreed, without a remedy applied, it invariably terminates in death. And what may seem singular, it is said that on the dawn of a future Sabbath, of which the present is only a figure or prelude, each and all of these subjects of Sabbath sickness will be found incurably sick—the whole head sick, and the whole heart faint—and totally unfit for the services of the true tabernacle—and on that memorable Sabbath they will all die.

The premonitory symptoms of this disease are, during the week, inordinate love of the world, extreme devotion to the pursuit of its honours, its pleasures, and its profits, accompanied with a disrelish for secret prayer or pious meditation, and an apprehension of the want of time for reading the scriptures, and for family devotion. As the Sabbath morning dawns, the subject manifests great lassitude and debility; sighs, groans, complains of divers pains, becomes nervous, dreads especially a Sabbath fog, or a little rain, rises late, breakfasts on the greatest luxury the house affords, eats voraciously, and then begins to think about the services of the day.

If the attack is light, the weather fair, and all things favourable, he drags himself to the house of worship. But here the symptoms of Sabbath sickness in its mildest forms are often seen. The subject is seen to seat himself or herself in a convenient place—say in the corner of a pew, as he or she feels the premonitory symptoms coming on. The eyes look heavy, the eyelids drop, the muscles of the neck give way, his respiration appears asthmatic, and he drops into a death-like stupor. Towards the close of the exercises, the patient gives signs of life, gradually raises the head, and the red forehead and blinking eyes, as they gradually salute the light, plainly say that animal life is not extinct. By the time the benediction is pronounced, the paroxysm appears over, the subject has the hat or parasol ready, and with a countenance bright and beaming starts for home, rejoicing in the prospect of six more happy days before the return of the day of evil.

But if the Sabbath morning attack be severe, the sufferer is far too ill to attend church, and lounges away the whole forenoon. In the afternoon the symptoms abate, and the person is often seen about his fields salting his sheep or cattle, or otherwise devoting himself to the worship of mammon. As the evening comes on, he appears quite well. The plans of operation for the coming week are all made. The wagon is loaded for the mill or market, and the gloom and sorrows of the past are all forgotten in the prospect of to-morrow.

But the worst form in which this disease manifests itself, is that in which it so affects the head as to derange the judgment. The heart at first dreads the prescribed duties of the Sabbath, until through sympathy the judgment is perverted, and the subject is left to say and half believe that there are no duties peculiar to the Sabbath. In this state of delirium, the subject of Sabbath sickness seeks to drive off the disorder by sweating at hard labour, or by dissipation at the place of vain recreation. We sometimes see this class with their cradle, sickle, scythe, rake, or pitchfork, tugging and toiling to cure this troublesome disease, and to secure such blessings to themselves as Infinite Wisdom has overlooked, and Divine Providence cannot provide. They must work on the Sabbath or die of want!

But there is a remedy for this wide-spread contagious epidemic. Let the sufferer take daily a proper dose of godly sorrow, combined with self-denial, mixed with precious faith, and exercise himself unto godliness; and in severe cases double the dose and take it, fasting on Sabbath morning, and the cure is sure. The seventh-day ague will disappear, and the Sabbath-dread no more trouble the poor invalid. The Sabbath will become his delight, and its duties his meat and his drink. And soon, very soon, for ever cured of Sabbath sickness, he shall enjoy that Sabbath of rest which remains only to the people of God. The prescription is safe for all, within the reach of all, and the author advertises, "No cure, no pay." May all soon apply and be healed. In the meantime we entreat the prayers of the whole church, with those of the ministers, in behalf of the ungodly sick.—Baptist Register.

EMOTION AND FAITH.

There are two classes of Christians—those who live chiefly by emotion, and those who live chiefly by faith. The first class, those who live chiefly by emotion, remind one of ships that move by the onward impulses of the wind operating upon sail. They are often at a dead calm, often out of their course, and sometimes driven back; and it is only when the winds are fair and powerful that they move onward with rapidity. The other class, those who live chiefly by faith, remind one of the magnificent steamers which cross the Atlantic, which are moved by an interior and permanent principle, and which, setting at defiance all obstacles, advance steadily and swiftly to their destination, through calm and storm, through cold and sunshine.—Upham.

THE SUPPORT OF GOSPEL ORDINANCES.

Although not accustomed to write for the public press, yet feeling an interest in the subject above named, I have concluded to write something. And if I am wrong, I hope some one from whom I may differ, will also furnish an article, that we may at least become better acquainted with the subject. I learn from the numerous "reports" and "acknowledgments" given in the columns of the Preacher, of which I have been for some time a constant reader, that our church is doing something for church extension. We have our mission to Damascus; we have our mission appointed for Oregon to go out next spring; we have our home missionary operations for seeking out and at least partially supplying the destitute in our own country; and we have our two theological Seminaries for the education of young men for supplying those fields of labour. And I am gratified to find that so much is done for sustaining those operations. For some of them we have done tolerably well; for some we have done too little; and for none of them have we done too much.

I wish to notice another branch of that same subject, and which ought to be to all of us at least a matter of equal importance. I mean the support of the ordinances of divine grace at home. I do think that in the church generally, there is much that is wrong on this subject. It is necessary to the profitable and comfortable worship of God, that we have houses of worship. It is necessary that we have men to minister to us whose business it shall be to preach the word, not caring themselves too much about the affairs of this life. None of us like to see a minister, both a minister and a farmer or a mechanic. It is equally necessary that suitable provision be made for those whose business it is to be wholly employed about the affairs of the church. Such provision was made under the former dispensation. Whilst the tribe of Levi had no inheritance among their brethren, yet the tenth of all was holy unto the Lord; and in this abundant provision was made for the priests, the ministers of the Lord of hosts. And in so far as the divine appointment is concerned, provision has also been made for the ministers of the gospel under the present dispensation. "Even so hath the Lord ordained, that they that preach the gospel should live of the gospel." 1 Cor. ix. 14. It is an appointment which is recognised by our people in the settlement of ministers among them. "We promise you all due support and encouragement," etc., is the language of an ordinary call. And most generally an amount is specified, which, according to their own mind, they judge to be necessary to his due support. Now, in this paper, I am not about to reprove the practice of specifying too small an amount. I know very well that oftentimes it is small, too small; but I assume that by their conduct in naming that amount to him in their call, and his in accepting, it is mutually agreed that the amount specified would be "due support." But how is this engagement met? Why, in many, many cases, it is not met at all. Some congregations may discharge their duties to their pastors with the same fidelity with which they expect him to discharge his towards them; but it is by far the fewest. He must be punctual in his ministerial duties, preaching Sabbath days and week days; must visit all the sick in the neighbourhood, whether his own people or not. And sometimes he is censured for not visiting them, when a knowledge of the censure is the first intimation that he receives of their sickness. But how are their engagements to him fulfilled? Not with the same degree of punctuality that they expect and require him to fulfil his. One man has made a subscription, which at the close of the second or third year he cuts down to suit himself; another never did promise as much as he should have done, and as he was able to do, labouring more for the bodies than the souls of his children; another does not promise any thing. Another takes the whole of a front pew by securing the first half to himself, and as no one is willing to take the other half, he gets the whole on his own terms, and there is another who has taken some offence, no matter what, and he withdraws his support, but still holds his pew, because he paid for it, and no other one can get in. But what is the worst of all, scarcely one of the above observes due punctuality. Six months run out, and the time of making our offerings to the support of the ordinances comes, and few payments. The year runs out, and about one-half do what they ought to have done sooner. In the mean time, the preacher must provide a home for his family, by renting or otherwise. He must furnish food and clothing for his household; he must keep himself decently clothed, and keep a horse always ready to attend to all calls. He must keep an open house and a free table, no matter what the expense to him. As a member of civil society, he must pay his taxes, etc., give as much as any other for any charitable purpose he may recommend, and discharge other duties of the kind as best he can. But how are all these claims to be met? Generally by leaning on some ten or fifteen punctual men in his charge, who do in reality keep their minister from beggary and the church from disgrace.

I am clearly of the opinion that many of our "demission of charges," arise from this cause—a neglect on the part of the people to observe punctuality. Does one say mine is a small amount, and I will attend to it when convenient? I remark, that it is by those small amounts that ministers live, and for the want of them they are sometimes much embarrassed. In punctuality there is a twofold satisfaction;—first, to the church member, when he has duly done what he knows to be his duty,—and second, to the minister, in his having this additional evidence that his people really love him and desire his ministrations.

I think the scriptures universally convey the idea that such contributions are free-will offerings, and one essential element in a free-will offering is, that it be presented by, not begged from, the offerer. And hence I entirely discard the office of collector in the church, when by that office, as the name imports, it is his business to call on church members and ask and beg such offerings to the church. Are such, offerings at all? One admitted evidence that these are, or should be, free-will offerings, is, that the minister must not ask or dun for such contributions privately; and it is shocking to the Christian sensibilities of some Christian professors that he should even allude to them in public, much more if he ask or demand them.

Now, all this is wrong. Offerings for the support of God's ordinances are free-will offerings, and they should never be hunted up and begged. Let every man be his own collector, and he will know when it is done. Let him do it punctually.

In conclusion, I recommend that where there is a designing and contriving how little men can give to the support of the ordinances, and how long they can withhold that little, they also contrive how little preaching will do them, and how long they can do without it.

EUSEBIUS.

HISTORICAL SKETCHES.

HISTORY OF THE WESTMINSTER CONFESSION OF FAITH.

At the commencement of the Reformation in Scotland in 1560, when the Protestants were seeking the condemnation of Popery, and the establishment of the Reformed doctrine and worship, they were required to draw up a summary of the articles of their faith. This they did in the short space of four days, and having read it before the Parliament, it received their official sanction, and in the year 1567 was published as the confession of the church of Scotland. Prior to this, it appears that the "Confession of Faith used by the English congregation in Geneva," had been extensively received in Scotland, but it was superseded by the one now adopted. Its authors were Winram, Spotswood, Willock, Douglass, Row, and Knox. (Hetherington's History, p. 50.) This confession continued the authorized standard of faith in Scotland until superseded by the Westminster Confession, to which we now direct our attention.

When the authority of the See of Rome was renounced in England, the king claimed for himself the power in religious matters which the Pontiff had formerly possessed. The Reformation in its purity was not palatable to monarchs of ambitious minds and worldly views, and hence much of the mummary of Rome was retained in the church of England. There were some, however, who desired further and better reformation. These were called Puritans, and though often subjected to severe persecution, their numbers gradually increased, and their influence too became greater. When the house of Stuart ascended the English throne, the attempt was made to rivet the chains of bondage on the minds as well as the bodies of their subjects. But the craft of a James, and the treachery of a Charles, met with a stronger opposition, and were in themselves less likely to succeed, than the undisguised, though unrelenting, and unyielding severity of a Henry or an Elizabeth. Acting on his favourite maxim, "No bishop, no king," James I. endeavoured to maintain and advance the power of the prelates as the means of his own. In the contest which ensued, and which, in the reign of his successor Charles, broke out into the great rebellion, the clergy of the established church were generally found on the side of despotism and the monarch, while those who maintained the doctrines of the Puritans were the advocates of the rights of the people. Opposition to the civil power was thus connected with opposition to the ecclesiastical system which it supported, and with which it was so intimately allied. The desire for redress of grievances inflicted by the one, was connected with the same desire in regard to the other. While, therefore, the Parliament were examining civil abuses, they determined to investigate the evils of the church. For this purpose an assembly was called to meet at Westminster, to consist of "the most pious, learned, and judicious divines in the country." This assembly was attended by five ministers and three elders as delegates from the church of Scotland, which had been invited to give its assistance. In Scotland the reformation had been established without the aid, and even against the opposition of the civil power. It was, therefore, propagated in that country in far greater purity than in the sister kingdom. The efforts made by the Stuart dynasty to establish the yoke of prelacy and civil tyranny, had been earlier and more successfully resisted, and Scotland was appealed to for aid in regard to both, by those in England who desired to be free from the same intolerable bondage. Nor were the Scotch unwilling to give their assistance. The English, however, were more anxious for the removal of the civil than the ecclesiastical oppression, while in the case of the Scotch it was the reverse. In forming the alliance between the two nations, both objects, however, were presented, and while the Scotch united in the field with the soldiers of England, they also sent their delegates to the Westminster Assembly. The names of their commissioners were, Henderson, Baillie, Rutherford, Douglas, and Gillespie, ministers; and the Earl of Cassilis, Lord Maitland, Arch. Johnston of Warristoun, Ruling Elders. Douglas and the Earl of Cassilis, however, never attended.

The first meeting of the Assembly was held on Saturday, July 1, 1643, in Henry VII.'s chapel at Westminster. It continued in session till Feb. 22, 1649, a period of more than five and a half years, during which it held 1163 meetings. Its appearance is thus described by Baillie.

"The likes of that Assembly I did never see, and as we hear say, the likes was never in England, nor anywhere is shortly like to be. They did sit in Henry the VII.'s Chapel, in the place of the Convocation; but since the weather grew cold, they did go to the Jerusalem Chamber, a fair room in the Abbey of Westminster, about the size of the College front-hall, but wider. At the one end nearest the door, and along both sides, are stages of seats, as in the new Assembly House at Edinburgh, but not so high; for there will be room but for five or six score. At the uppermost end, there is a chair set on a frame, a foot from the earth, for the Mr. Prolocutor, Dr. Twisse. Before it, on the ground, stand two chairs for the two Mr. Assessors, Dr. Burgess and Mr. White. Before these two chairs, through the length of the room, stands a table, at which sit the two scribes, Mr. Byfield and Mr. Roborough. The house is all well hung (with tapestry), and has a good fire, which is some dainties at London. Opposite the table, upon the prolocutor's right hand, there are three or four ranks of benches. On the lowest, we five do sit. Upon the other, at our backs, the members of the Parliament deputed to the Assembly. On the benches opposite us, on the prolocutor's left hand, going from the upper end of the house to the chimney, and at the other end of the house and back of the table, till it come about to our seats, are four or five stages of benches, upon which their divines sit as they please; albeit commonly they keep the same place. From the chimney to the door there are no seats, but a void space for passage. The Lords of the Parliament use to sit on chairs, in that void, about the fire.

We meet every day of the week but Saturday. We sit commonly from nine till one or two afternoon. The prolocutor, at the beginning and end, has a short prayer.

The man, as the world knows, is very learned in the questions he has studied, and very good, beloved of all, and highly esteemed; but merely bookish, not much, as it seems, acquainted with conceived prayer, and among the unfittest of all the company for any action; so, after the prayer he sits mute. It was the canny convoyance (skillful management) of those who guide most matters for their own interest to plant such a man of purpose in the chair. The one assessor, our good friend, Mr. White, has kepted in of the gout since our coming; the other, Dr. Burgess, a very active and sharp man, supplies, so far as is decent, the prolocutor's place. Ordinarily there will be present above threescore of their divines. These are divided into three committees, in one of which every man is a member. No man is excluded who pleases to come to any of the three. Every committee, as the Parliament gives orders in writing to take any purpose to consideration, takes a portion, and in their afternoon meeting prepares matters for the Assembly, sets down their minds in distinct propositions, backing their propositions with texts of Scripture. After the prayer, Mr. Byfield, the scribe, reads the proposition and Scriptures, whereupon the Assembly debates in a most grave and orderly way.

"No man is called up to speak; but whosoever stands up of his own accord, speaks so long as he will, without interruption. If two or three stand up at once, then the divines confusedly call on his name whom they desire to hear first: on whom the loudest and maniest voices call, he speaks. No man speaks to any but to the prolocutor. They harangue long and very learnedly. They study the questions well beforehand, and prepare their speeches; but withal the men are exceedingly prompt and well spoken. I do marvel at the very accurate and extemporal replies that many of them usually make. When, upon every proposition by itself, and on every text of Scripture that is brought to confirm it, every man who will, has said his whole mind, and the replies, duplies, and triplies are heard, then the most part call, 'To the question.' Byfield, the scribe, rises from the table and comes to the prolocutor's chair, who, from the scribe's book, reads the proposition, and says, 'As many as are of opinion that the question is well stated in the proposition, let them say, Ay;' when ay is heard, he says, 'As many as think otherwise, say No.' If the difference of 'Ayes' and 'Nos' be clear, as usually it is, then the question is ordered by the scribes, and they go on to debate the first Scripture alleged for proof of the proposition. If the sound of Ay and No be near equal, then says the prolocutor, 'As many as say Ay, stand up; while they stand, the scribe and others number them in their minds; when they sit down, the No's are bidden stand, and they likewise are numbered. This way is clear enough, and saves a great deal of time, which we spend in reading our catalogue. When a question is once ordered, there is no more debate on that matter; but if a man will wander from the subject, he is quickly taken up by Mr. Assessor, or many others, confusedly crying, 'Speak to order, to order.' No man contradicts another expressly by name, but most discreetly speaks to the prolocutor, and at most, holds to general terms: 'The reverend brother who lately, or last, spoke on this hand, on that side, above, or below.'—I thought meet once for all to give you a taste of the outward form of their Assembly. They follow the way of their Parliament. Much of their way is good, and worthy of our imitation; only their longsomeness is woful at this time, when their Church and kingdom lie under a most lamentable anarchy and confusion. They see the hurt of their length, but cannot get it helped; for being to establish a new platform of worship and discipline to their nation for all time to come, they think they cannot be answerable, if solidly, and at leisure, they do not examine every point thereof."—Baillie, vol. ii. pp. 108, 109.

The subjects for its consideration were proposed by Parliament. At first the members directed their attention to the formation of a book of Discipline, and when this was completed, they proceeded to the Confession of Faith. The Parliament had directed the Assembly merely to revise the thirty-nine articles of the Church of England, but after fifteen articles had been considered, it was thought proper to proceed to the composition of a new confession, according to the agreement in the solemn league and covenant. In forming the Confession of Faith, the plan pursued was the following: The titles of the chapters were first prepared by a committee consisting of Dr. Hoyle, Dr. Gouge, Mr. Herle, Mr. Gataker, Mr. Tuckney, Mr. Reynolds, and Mr. Vines, with the Scottish commissioners. These were then distributed among sub-committees, which sat two days every week, and then reported to the general committee, by which they were presented to the Assembly, where each chapter was debated paragraph by paragraph. A year and a half was occupied in this work, and while there was much discussion on some points, in general great harmony prevailed. (See Heth. Hist. West. Assem., p. 242.)

When the assembly had completed the confession, it was presented to the Parliament under the title of "the humble advice of the Assembly of Divines, now, by authority of Parliament, sitting at Westminster, concerning a Confession of Faith." (The original edition may be seen in Philada. Library, Q. 925.)

The Parliament having had it under consideration for more than a year, (Neal, 3, 377,) at length gave orders that it should be published for the satisfaction of foreign churches, under the title of "Articles of Religion, approved and passed by both houses of Parliament, after advice had with an assembly of divines called together by them for that purpose." The parts of it relating to discipline were laid aside, as the whole of the 30th chapter, the 31st, a great part of the 24th, and the 4th section of the 20th, which refers to the power of the civil magistrate to punish for opinions contrary to the light of nature, and the known principles of Christianity. These parts of the confession were never approved by the English Parliament, but the whole Confession, as issued by the Westminster Assembly, was adopted by the church and Parliament of Scotland. Neal, 3, 378.

Such is a brief history of the Westminster Confession of Faith. It has received many modifications, but yet remains the basis and chief substance of the creeds of the whole Presbyterian family. It was adopted by the congregationalists in their conference at the Savoy Palace, in London, in 1658, with the omission of the chapters relating to discipline, and with the addition of a chapter in which they give an account of the main points of difference between them and the Presbyterians. (Heth., W. Assem. 271.) This confession never acquired any importance, and never received the public sanction of the government of England, owing, perhaps, to the death of Cromwell, who was the chief supporter of the Independents.

At the restoration of the house of Stuart to the British throne, the attempts made by that ill-fated family to establish uniformity in prelacy throughout their dominions, were renewed. The Confession of Faith was disowned, and all who adhered to it exposed to bitter persecution. On the revolution in 1688, its authority was restored by the civil sanction, and at the union of the two kingdoms in 1707, it was again ratified as part of the Scottish Ecclesiastical Establishment, and such it remains at the present time. It has been altered by the United Secession Church of Scotland, but as far as we are aware, all other bodies of the Presbyterian name in that country, retain it in its original form. It is also held in the same way in the Presbyterian church of Ireland, and we believe by other Presbyterian churches in that country. In the U. States, it has been altered, more or less, by the Presbyterian and Cumberland Presbyterian churches, and the Associate Reformed Church. By the Reformed Presbyterian, and the Associate churches, it has been left untouched. It is a venerable and valuable relic of by-gone times. The hoar of centuries has gathered upon it, but, like some ancient obelisk, it remains unshaken. It has stood the test of trying times, and the scrutiny of eminent men, and still continues an ever-enduring monument of the prudence, the piety, and the knowledge of its authors, and a valuable exponent of the faith of the church of CHRIST.

ROMANISM.

ROMANISM A NOVELTY IN IRELAND.

That "Romanism is a novelty in Ireland" may appear to some a strange and hazardous expression. Let us therefore define what we mean. By Romanism we intend "that system of religion against which the reformers of the sixteenth century protested, and which was afterwards confirmed and ratified by the decrees of the council of Trent." And if in the course of our observations we use the word pope or popery, or any similar expression, we do not employ it with feelings of personal unkindness, nor do we wish to excite such feelings in others; but we would remind all that while one bishop of Christendom is exalted as pope or papa over all the rest, the system of popery is his, and as long as any call him master, they should not be offended if they bear his name.

When the word "novelty" is used, we mean that which, however long continued, is comparatively new—that is, new in relation to things more ancient; for example, when our Lord is treating of divorce, (Matt. xix.,) he says, "from the beginning it was not so," though the custom alluded to had continued for a period of fifteen hundred years: yet it was a "novelty," for "from the beginning it was not so:" and so we are prepared to maintain that Romanism, as its adherents are pledged to it, as its priests are sworn to it, and as ratified by the council of Trent, was not the religion originally prevalent in Ireland—that Christianity was received and taught there centuries before the authority of the pope was fully acknowledged, and long before he sent any missionaries thither to preach that authority, and that the religion of (Saint) Patrick, Columba, and other faithful servants of God at that day, was a different religion from that now taught by the Romish priests: and these points we shall endeavour to establish by two lines of argument, the first drawn from history, the second from doctrinal evidence.

I. The first position that we shall adopt is, that "Rome did not appoint the earliest missionaries, and therefore that there was no original link binding the country to her dominion." We shall produce the evidence of Saint Patrick himself, who all must allow should be a competent judge of the matter, and who thus writes in his confession: "I went every where to promote your cause, even to remote districts, where no one had ever arrived who could baptize or ordain clergy, or complete the people," a testimony which implies that the gospel had been preached and practised there before his coming, and which Moore confirms thus in the 22d page of his history of Ireland: "It is supposed that to these western regions the Saint alludes in his confession, when he stated that he had visited remote districts where no missionary had been before; an assertion important as plainly implying that in the more accessible parts of the country Christianity had before his time been preached and practised."

And in giving an account of the efforts of Pope Celestine to relieve the wants of Irish Christians, the same author states in a previous part of his work (page 209) that "Already in Britain, where, at the period of which we are treating, Christianity had for more than a century flourished, the tenets of Pelagius had been rapidly gaining ground, and the mission of St. German and Lupus to that country in the year 429, was for the express purpose of freeing it from the infection of that heresy. Among the persons who accompanied that mission was the future apostle of Ireland, Patrick, then in his forty-second year. While thus occupied, the attention of those missionaries would naturally be turned to the state of Christianity in Ireland; and it was doubtless the accounts which they gave of the increasing number of Christians in that country, as well as of the inroads already made on them by the Pelagian doctrines, that induced Pope Celestine to turn his attention to the wants of the Irish, and to appoint a bishop for the superintendence of their infant church. The person chosen for the mission "to the Scots believing in Christ," (for so it is specified by the chronicler,) was Palladius, a deacon of the Roman church, at whose instance St. German had been sent by the pope, to reclaim the erring Britons; and whatever preachers of the faith, foreign or native, might have appeared previously in Ireland, it seems certain that before this period no hierarchy had been there instituted; but that in Palladius the Irish Christians saw their first bishop.

THE POPE AND HIS PARLIAMENT.

The Pope opened his Parliament in person, on the morning of the 15th ult., by a speech from the throne. The speech is rather a curiosity in its way. By big words his Holiness strives to give the greatest importance to the little acts by which he has signalized himself since his accession. The press still groans under fetters; the Bible is still an interdicted book; not one comprehensive measure, tending to the real emancipation of his subjects, has distinguished his administration; and yet the Pope speaks as if neither Liberty nor Reform has been known in the world till he arose. It appears plain from the speech, that the Pope feels that he has nearly reached the limits of his reforms; for he indicates that, though still willing to do all he can for his subjects, his policy henceforward must be of a conservative kind. He takes care to tell the deputies composing his Parliament or consulta, that they are to possess no real powers; that their duty is to give his Holiness their opinion when necessary, and not to aid him in his sovereign resolutions, in which he would consult his own conscience. And, speaking with "some vivacity and some heat," he added, "any body who would take any other view of the functions you are called to fulfil would mistake materially, as well as he that would see in the Council of State I have created, the realization of their own utopias, and the germ of an institution incompatible with the Pontifical authority." On the sovereignty of the Pontificate his Holiness is fully resolved not to trench. In short, this Council of State is a mere sham: the Pope tells them plainly that he will take their advice only when it suits his purpose. This consulta consists of a President and Vice-President, with twenty-four provincial deputies. Its assembling was celebrated at Rome with fetes and processions during the day, and balls and illuminations in the evening.

By the latest intelligence, (Dec. 11th,) we learn that difficulties are augmenting on account of the retrograding movements of the government. Cardinal Ferretti has withdrawn, and it is said that his place will be supplied by Cardinal Bernetti, secretary of state under Gregory XVI. Count Ferretti has left Rome for Naples; it is said he will not return. The Council saw the evil, but could suggest no remedy; they were only able to give advice upon projects of law presented to them. No laws of importance have been passed.

ANTI-SLAVERY.

PRO-SLAVERY ARGUMENTS.

It is interesting to hear the oppressed plead their own cause, especially when endowed with such talents as may enable them to address the understanding, as well as to affect the feelings. The following letter possesses this character, and is interesting from the fact that the eminent statesman to whom it is addressed has the reputation of being unusually humane in the treatment of his slaves. Probably, no person in our country could, at this moment, exert a more powerful influence in the cause of emancipation, than the person to whom this letter was written. Were he to devote his remaining years to this object, he would weave for himself a wreath of glory, compared with which, all the honours he has ever yet attained would be wholly insignificant. Omitting several passages which have a particular personal allusion, we extract the following, which refer to the arguments advanced so frequently in favour of retaining the coloured race in bondage.

‘Collisions and conflicts between the two races would be inevitable, and after shocking scenes of rapine and carnage, the extinction or expulsion of the blacks would certainly take place.’

‘How do you know that any such results would be inevitable? Where, on the page of history do you find any thing to warrant even such a conjecture? You will probably point me to the Revolution in St. Domingo, the old and threadbare falsehood under which democratic tyrants have sought refuge for the last forty years. But the facts in that direction are all against you. It has been clearly proven that the revolution was not the result of emancipation, but of a cruel attempt to re-enslave an already emancipated people. I am not aware that you have a single fact to support your truly terrible assertion, while on the other hand I have many, all going to show what is equally taught by the voice of reason and God, that it is always safe to do right. The promise of God is—‘that thy light shall break forth as the morning, and thy health shall spring forth speedily, and thy righteousness shall go before thee, the glory of the Lord shall be thy rereward: then shalt thou call and the Lord will answer; thou shalt cry and he will say, Here I am.’

‘The history of the world is in conformity with the words of inspired wisdom. Look, for instance, at the history of emancipation in the British West Indies. There the blacks were, and still are, an overwhelming majority. Have there been any ‘shocking scenes of rapine and carnage, extinction or expulsion.’ You know there have not. Why then do you make use of this unfounded and irrational conjecture to frighten your fellow-countrymen from the righteous performance of a simple act of justice to millions now groaning in almost helpless bondage.

"I now give your argument in support of the morality of your position. You say,

'It may be argued, that in admitting the injustice of slavery, I admit the necessity of an instantaneous reparation of that injustice. Unfortunately, however, it is not always safe, practicable or possible in the great movements of states or public affairs of nations, to remedy or repair the infliction of previous injustice. In the inception of it, we may oppose and denounce it by our most strenuous exertions, but, after its consummation, there is often no other alternative left us but to deplore its perpetration, and to acquiesce as the only alternative, in its existence, as a less evil than the frightful consequences which might ensue from the vain endeavour to repair it. Slavery is one of these unfortunate instances.'

"The cases which you put in support of the foregoing propositions, are only wanting in one thing, and that is analogy. The plundering of the Indians of their territory, is a crime to which no honest man can look with any degree of satisfaction. It was a wrong to the Indians then living, and how muchsoever we might seek to repair that wrong, the victims are far beyond any benefit by it; but with reference to the slave, the wrong to be repaired is a present one, the slave-holder is the every day robber of the slave, of his birthright to liberty, property, and the pursuits of happiness—his right to be free is unquestionable—the wrong to enslave him is self-evident—the duty to emancipate him is imperative. Are you aware to what your argument on this point leads? do you not plainly see that the greatest crimes that ever cursed our common earth, may take shelter under your reasoning, and may claim perpetuity on the ground of their antiquity?

'It is a philanthropic and consoling reflection that the moral and physical condition of the African in the United States in a state of slavery is far better than it would have been had their ancestors not been brought from their native land.'

"I can scarce repress my indignation as I read this cruel sentence; there is so much of Satan dressed in the livery of heaven, as well as taking consolation from crime, that I scarcely know how to reply to it. Let me ask you what has been the cause of the present unsettled condition of Africa? Why has she not reached forth her hand unto God? Why have not her fields been made missionary grounds, as well as the Feejee Islands? Because of this very desolating traffic from which you seem to draw consolation. For three hundred years Christian nations, among whom we are foremost, have looked to Africa only as a place for the gratification of their lust and love of power, and every means have been adopted to stay the onward march of civilization in that unhappy land.

"Your declaration on this point places your consolation with that of the wolf in devouring the lamb.

"You say that 'Great Britain inflicted the evil upon you.' If this be true, it is equally true that she inflicted the same evil upon herself; but she has had the justice and the magnanimity to repent and bring forth fruits meet for repentance. You copied her bad example, why not avail yourself of her good one also?

"Emancipate your own slaves. Leave them not to be held or sold by others. Leave them free, as the Father of his Country left his, and let your name go down to posterity, as his came down to us, a slaveholder, to be sure, but a repentant one. Make the noble resolve, that so far as you are personally concerned, 'AMERICA SHALL BE FREE.'

"In asking you to do this, I ask nothing which in any degree conflicts with your argument against general emancipation. The dangers which you conjecture of the latter cannot be apprehended of the former. Your own slaves are too few in number to make them formidable or dangerous. In this matter you are without excuse. I leave you to your conscience and your God, and subscribe myself,

Faithfully yours,

FREDERICK DOUGLASS."

SLAVERY AND A WESTMINSTER DIVINE.

It may be interesting to our readers to have the sentiment of Mr. Samuel Rutherford, the author of LEX REX, and a very prominent member of the Westminster Assembly, on the subject of slavery. The reader will find upon page 51 of the late Edinburgh edition of the above work the following sentiment. "A man being created according to God's image, is res sacra, a sacred thing, and can no more by nature's law be sold and bought, than a religious and sacred thing dedicated to God. S. 1. Instit. de inutil. scrupl. l. inter Stipulantem. S. Sacram. F. de verber. Obligat."

Here is the fundamental principle of anti-slavery men of the present day clearly and strongly expressed—men who have been stigmatized as new lights and upstarts by not a few who profess to revere the memory of the Westminster divines.

We have but little doubt that the above declaration would have been approved by all the able and godly men who in that day were associated with Mr. Rutherford in the cause of truth and righteousness. —ED. OF EVAN. REP.

AMENDMENTS TO THE BOOK OF PSALMS IN METRE.

It was not the opinion of those who compiled the metrical version of the book of Psalms used in the Presbyterian churches in Scotland and Ireland, and by several branches of the same body in this country, that their work was perfect, that their descendants might not improve what they had done, as they themselves endeavoured to amend the performances of those who had preceded them. It is true that any amendments should be made with much caution, and before being used should be sanctioned by proper ecclesiastical authority. Yet it is our duty to make the effort to "go on to perfection," and we but imitate the honoured examples of our ancestors when we endeavour to improve the exhibitions of religious truths which they have left us. It is with this belief that we suggest the following amendments in the book of Psalms, which may, perhaps, be succeeded, from time to time, by others.

Psalm xix. 3, "There is no speech nor tongue to which
 Their voice doth not extend:
 Their line is gone through all the earth,
 Their word to the world's end."

Referring to the prose, we will find that some words have been supplied by our translators, one of which quite changes the meaning of the sacred writer. "There is no speech nor language where their voice is not heard." Omitting the word where, the passage would be read, "There is no speech nor language, their voice is not heard." The meaning appears to be, that the works of nature which are mentioned, are silent monitors, that their language is inaudible, though easily observed and understood. The poetical version follows the prose, and communicates the same incorrect idea. It might be amended as follows:

"Although there is no speech nor tongue,
 Although no voice is heard,
 Their line is gone through all the earth,
 To the world's end their word."

The celebrated Addison, in his paraphrase of a part of this psalm, has expressed the idea very clearly and beautifully:

"What though no real voice nor sound
 Amid their radiant orbs be found,
 In reason's ear they all rejoice,
 And utter forth a glorious voice,
 For ever singing as they shine,
 The hand that made us is divine."

Psalm xxxvii. 25, "I have been young, and now am old,
 Yet have I never seen
 The just man left, nor that his seed
 For bread have beggars been."

Taking this as it stands, it expresses something contrary to the psalmist's own experience, and at variance with the administrations of Divine Providence, in numerous instances. David himself was obliged to beg his bread, and many of the people of God, in preceding and subsequent ages, were destitute of daily food. The prose translation, while it may convey the idea expressed in the metrical version, also admits of a construction which is perfectly unobjectionable. "I have been young, and am now old, yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread,"—that is, his seed, although begging bread, were yet not forsaken. The following amendment may express the correct sense:

"I have been young, and now am old,
 Yet have I never seen
 The just man left, nor yet his seed, Though begging bread they've been."

Psalm lxxxiv. 2, 3, "My thirsty soul longs veh'emently,
 Yea pants thy courts to see,
 My very heart and flesh cry out,
 O living God, for thee.
 Behold, the sparrow findeth out
 A house wherein to rest,
 The swallow also for herself
 Hath purchased a nest;
 Even thine own altars, where she safe
 Her young ones forth may bring,
 O thou Almighty Lord of Hosts,
 Who art my God and King."

It seems a strange thing that the sparrow and swallow should be permitted to make their nests about the altars of God, even if their instincts would have inclined them to do so. Commentators have been much embarrassed in endeavouring to give a satisfactory explanation of this passage; but the whole difficulty it presents will vanish if we consider a portion of it as a parenthetical ejaculation, and connect the commencement of it immediately with its termination: the prose, unaltered in a single word, will then read thus: "My soul longeth, yea even fainteth, for the courts of the Lord; my heart and my flesh cry out for the living God: (yea the sparrow hath found a house, and the swallow a nest for herself, where she may lay her young,) even thine altars, O Lord of Hosts, my King and my God." Omitting the parenthesis, we read, "My heart and my flesh cry out for the living God, even thine altars," &c. Such interruptions occur in several places in the Psalms, as in Psalm xlv. 5, which in the arrangement in the original would be read, "Thine arrows are sharp, the people fall under them, in the heart of the king's enemies," but in this case the parenthesis being shorter, the true connexion and proper meaning have been observed. The following is proposed as an amendment of the passage quoted in the eighty-fourth psalm:

"Behold the sparrow finds a home,
The swallow builds her nest;
In safety each can rear their young,
And get a place of rest:
While I am longing for thy courts,
Almighty God, my King,
While I, upon thine altars, Lord,
Can lay no offering."

THE SOCIETY OF ODD FELLOWS.

The statistics of this strange organization for the year ending with June last, give 1,392 lodges, 118,961 contributing members, and 16,764 brothers relieved. Revenue of sub-lodges, $888,605 07; of which, lodges in the State of New York, $232,000; Pennsylvania, $139,000; Massachusetts and Ohio, each $75,000; Maryland, $44,000; New Jersey, $35,000; Connecticut, $33,000; Maine, $27,000, etc. It will be perceived that these receipts are very large compared with those of our benevolent institutions for spreading the gospel.

The editor of an able paper says, "One of the evils of the times is the formation of societies, attention to which demands a great and fatal sacrifice of the domestic principles. Every night during the year thousands of husbands are absent from their families under the plea of attending to these societies. A large amount of evil is the result of this neglect of domestic duties. Wives and children are neglected, and bad habits are contracted by husbands. The ruin of many a family may be traced to this source. It may startle the reader to hear us, in this connexion, propose the formation of a new society, and yet we are serious in thinking that without the formality of a single meeting a great society might be instituted, to the privileges of which every man should be entitled who spends his evenings at home with his family."

PUBLICATION SCHEME OF THE REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, OF SCOTLAND.

The following is the prospectus of the cheap publication scheme of our sister church in Scotland, to which reference was made in their minutes published in our December number. To excite the interest of our readers, we need only direct attention to the subject and the author of the work with which the enterprise is to be commenced, and we feel that no commendation from us is requisite or appropriate. We would only add, that any persons who may wish to obtain the work may do so by forwarding their names and payments to the Treasurer of the Board, the publisher of this Magazine.

CHEAP PUBLICATION SCHEME,

By a Committee of the Reformed Presbyterian Church of Scotland.

It is proposed to publish, if sufficient encouragement is obtained, an Annual Volume, of about 350 pages, Foolscape octavo, price Two Shillings,—to consist of an Original Work on some leading doctrine of Theology, with the view of counteracting prevailing error, and of illustrating and defending important truth.

The first volume by PROFESSOR SYMINGTON, of Paisley, embracing a view of the leading topics of the Calvinistic and Arminian systems, as developed in recent controversy,—particularly as regards the Sovereignty of God in Election,—the extent of the Atonement,—and the work of the Holy Spirit.

To be published (D. V.) during the summer of 1848; and to be succeeded, from year to year, by Works on other fundamental doctrines of religion, by Ministers of the Reformed Presbyterian Synod, as the controversies of the time, and the interests of present truth may require.

The power of the Press, as an instrument in forming the opinions, and moulding the characters of men, is on all hands admitted to be very great, and inferior only to that of the pulpit. And in proportion as education becomes general, and habits of reading are more widely cultivated, its influence, for good or evil, must progressively increase. It is to be lamented, that an instrument of such vast power should, to so large an extent, be under the control of those who are either ignorant of, or hostile to, the religion of the Bible.

It may be hoped that the friends of religion are beginning to feel more deeply than heretofore the necessity of making large use of the press. There are, no doubt, religious tracts, pamphlets, and treatises, pregnant with sound doctrine, in pretty extensive circulation; yet they require to be multiplied manifold. And that this may be done to advantage, the friends of religion should prove their love to the truth by a pains-taking strenuous endeavour to give circulation to really sound and valuable works, otherwise the writing and publishing of them must be labour in vain.

Among the efforts that are being employed to cherish a taste for profitable reading, and to furnish matter at once attractive and edifying to a numerous class, whose means of purchasing books, and their time for perusing them, are both very limited, we reckon the several cheap publication schemes which have been instituted, both by enterprising individuals, and by churches.

And why should not the Reformed Presbyterian Church have her Cheap Publication Scheme as well as others? She cannot allow that any church in Christendom has a larger or more solid platform of scriptural truth to rest it on, than that which she possesses. The two great and comprehensive doctrines which she labours to exhibit and maintain,—the UNIVERSAL SUPREMACY OF THE LORD JESUS CHRIST, and the UNIVERSAL AUTHORITY OF THE BIBLE AS A RULE TO MEN, in their social, as well as in their individual capacity,—are just the doctrines which the existing state of society requires, and without which the world can never be reformed.

During the last few years a class of opinions, which have been often refuted, has been brought before the public under new auspices, and zealously disseminated. They are sometimes distinguished by the imposing title of The New Theology. A slender acquaintance with Church History, however, is sufficient to show, that they are only extracts from the large book of Arminianism,—the original copy of which is found in the heart of man, as fallen and unrenewed. The vast importance of the doctrines to which this New Theology is opposed, seemed urgently to demand, that the First volume of the proposed Series should embrace a comprehensive, lucid, and scriptural view of the leading points which have so long divided the Calvinist and the Arminian.

In so far as it is contemplated to furnish original works, written expressly for the illustration and defence of important truth which may be presently assailed, the Scheme differs, in so far as is known to us, from all its predecessors. The idea is entertained, however, that the volume should sometimes consist of a reprint of one or more works of acknowledged merit adapted to the times, in which case the price might probably be reduced.

Unless the ministers and elders of the church shall take a warm interest in the Scheme, and use means to interest the people generally in it,—the proposal cannot succeed. In so small a church, an ordinary measure of zeal will not suffice to carry through a scheme of this description. But apathy and lukewarmness do not comport with the times. If a small church resign herself to slumber, she must soon remove, or be removed, from the stage. The members of the Reformed Presbyterian Church profess to have embraced the principles of the Scottish Reformers and Martyrs. They are pledged by their public profession “to maintain and diffuse” these principles. They are bound by the command of the Lord Jesus Christ “to confess him before men,” “to keep the word of his patience,” “to contend earnestly for the faith once delivered unto the saints.”

Let it be considered that the publication is proposed to be only once in the year—that the price is not to exceed two shillings, to be taken at once, or in quarterly payments, as may be preferred, for a goodly volume of original matter, handsomely done up in cloth,—that the success of the scheme for a few years would make a most valuable addition to the Standard Theology of the Church, and that the wide distribution of these volumes throughout the families of the church might prove, through the Divine blessing, a most effective means, even in these shaking times, of establishing the youth in the faith of their fathers, and in the knowledge and love of the truth.

The trial is now to be made whether the members of the church, and other friends of old-school Calvinism, will give such a response to this proposal as may encourage the Committee to make arrangements for carrying it forward. Unless a large list of subscribers be obtained, the scheme must be relinquished. Individuals who obtain twelve subscribers, or upwards, will be entitled to a copy of the work when published. And it is particularly requested that an effort be made in this matter without delay—and that all Lists of names of subscribers be returned to DR. BATES, Glasgow, Interim Secretary.

TEMPERANCE.

THE POSITION AND RELATIVE INFLUENCES OF THE TEMPERANCE REFORMATION.

(BY DR. BATES, OF GLASGOW.)

The estimate that is formed of any particular scheme or discovery must greatly depend on the character of the individual to whose mind it is presented. To him who contemplates man chiefly as a tenant of earth, raised above other animals by his superior intellectual and moral powers, those discoveries will appear most interesting that immediately affect his earthly condition. But to the Christian, who regards man as an heir of immortality, having death and judgment and an eternal state before him, the scheme or institution that is calculated to tell on his final destiny will appear infinitely the most important. There are many who bear the Christian name to whom the history of the Bible Society, by whose instrumentality the holy Scriptures have been brought within the reach of millions of the human race; or of Missionary Societies, by which the glorious Gospel has been sent to numerous tribes previously sunk in moral debasement; or of the Sabbath school, in which millions have received instruction on the most momentous of all subjects at the most critical period of life, will all appear tame and uninteresting in comparison with the history of the Steam Engine, or that of some recent discovery in the Arts. The latter class of subjects is, indeed, not without its interest to the Christian. He takes even a more enlarged and comprehensive view of such discoveries than the man of the world, and calculates their probable effects on man's higher destinies, as well as on his temporal condition; but the former class, as they directly and very powerfully affect the spiritual character and eternal interests of men, are invested with a moral grandeur and dignity which can never belong to the latter.

The Temperance Reformation holds a middle place between these two classes of discoveries, or it may, perhaps, be said rather to unite in it a portion of what is valuable in them both. Wherever it is brought into vigorous operation it tells powerfully on the temporal condition of men. It brings a remedy for so large a share of the destitution and wretchedness which follow in the train of intoxicating liquors, and so mightily changes the very face of society, that it may in this respect challenge comparison with any discovery of modern times. It does not effect this change, however, by creating wealth, but by preventing the waste and destruction of it. There is a prodigious amount of property, the fruit of toil and industry, which, if judiciously applied, would serve to promote the comfort and well-being of its possessors, but which being employed in procuring intoxicating liquors, becomes, in effect, the purchase-money of sorrow and distress. To prevent this prostitution of the gifts of a bountiful Providence, and thereby to elevate large numbers of men in the scale of worldly comfort and respectability, is one great object of the Temperance Reformation. Still it has a much loftier object in view than this, and one most intimately connected with the eternal welfare of man. It is calculated to produce a moral reformation in society of which the arithmetician cannot compute the value. This is done, not as being itself an instrument for enlightening, or converting, or sanctifying men; these effects can result only from a faithful exhibition of the great doctrines of the Gospel when they are accompanied by the power of the Holy Ghost. It might contribute perhaps to neutralize that suspicion with which the cause has often been met, could it be fully acquitted of the presumption of assuming a province for which it never can be adapted. It is not brought forward as a substitute for the gospel, nor as a new and independent power, designed to supplement any supposed weakness or inefficiency in the gospel. It is merely a particular mode of carrying into practical application certain well known principles of the gospel—a mode that has been suggested by the peculiar character of those evils which abound in society at the present day. It can no more be considered a rival to the gospel, than the House of Refuge for juvenile delinquents, or the Penitentiary, or the Lunatic Asylum. It is not the specific or primary object of these institutions to propagate the gospel, yet they are all calculated to subserve the great design of the gospel. The word of God, which liveth and abideth for ever, is the incorruptible seed of all piety in the heart and in the church. The field in which this seed must be sown is the world; but there are important preparations for the seed in the moral world, as well as in the natural. It is not more certain that the labours of the husbandman must be, to a great degree, frustrated, and that a large portion of the seed must perish in a field which is overspread with briars and thorns, or poisoned by the prevalence of stagnant waters, than that the progress of the gospel must be hindered, and its efficacy in the hearts of men neutralized, in a community that is widely corrupted by intemperance. We do not chide the husbandman as mis-spending his time, and wasting his strength, who toils in the arduous work of rooting out the briars and thorns, or of draining off the waters that have converted his field into a marsh, and insist that he must rely exclusively on the efforts of the plough, and a plentiful scattering of the seed over the soil. The person who should offer such counsel would be justly reputed as an enthusiast, or a fool; yet this would be every whit as rational as to quarrel with the temperance society, as if it aspired to be a rival to the gospel.

MISSIONARY INTELLIGENCE.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

In the conclusion of the last annual report of the English Church Missionary Society, we find the following interesting observations on the signs of the times, in relation to exertions for the evangelization of the heathen. To the members of our church, in view of an enlargement of our Foreign Missionary effort, they are particularly appropriate.

First—It appears that the ancient false religions, which for more than twenty centuries have held the nations of the earth in abject slavery, are now waning in their influence.

Buddhism, which has extended its sway over a larger portion of the family of man than any other superstition, is failing; failing, moreover, even in parts where neither Christianity nor civilization has penetrated. According to the reports of our Missionary, at the Island of Pootoo, the sacred metropolis of Buddhism in China, the number of Priests has been diminished by more than 300 during the last century; and the dilapidated state of their Temples, and the evident signs of contempt for them among the people, show that Buddhism is destined, ere long, to fall from mere inherent decay. The King of Siam sent an embassy to Ceylon, the reputed cradle of Buddhism, to seek elements for rekindling the flame of his devotion in his own dominions; and there he learned, from the representatives of the ancient line of Buddhist Kings, that the cause is failing, and that, even with the help of gold from Siam, it can scarcely survive another century.

That Brahminism is declining before the power of Christian truth, and the progress of European science, is testified by every intelligent observer; by the lamentations of deserted shrines; and by the bitter enmity of enraged devotees.

Secondly—Another great fact which presents itself is, that the Mahomedan and Heathen secular powers are beginning to admit the principle of toleration in the place of bigotry and persecution.

The edict of toleration in China has been sufficiently tested, and proved to be no dead letter, but the admission of a principle which the Celestial Empire has not the power to contravene. The partial recognition of this principle by the Turkish Sultan, the secular Head and Guardian of Mahomedanism, is a still more astonishing event. And even in Central Africa, as it appears from the missionaries at Abbekuta, the same principle of toleration is recognised, and presents an open field to the teachers of the Christian faith.

The Third fact is, the tendency to decay in the lapsed Christian churches of the East, and the disposition among their members to seek refuge within the pale of Protestantism. Manifestations of this appear in the "transition" of the Syrian Christians of Travancore; in the accepted aid of our mission by the Coptic church; and, upon a still larger scale, in the late defections of Armenian Christians at Constantinople, through the labours of a kindred Society.

It thus appears as though the forces which have long held the minds of men in subjection, were withdrawing, and leaving a clear and open field for some approaching contest between other contending parties. There can be little doubt what those other contending parties will be. The troops are mustering. Here and there they survey and cast up the ground for fortifying some strong position. The missionaries from Rome, and the missionaries from Protestant churches of Europe and America are the parties taking the field. Each successive year affords fresh proof of the warlike activity in the Romish camp, and sees multitudes sent out on Foreign missions, who have been trained in the College of the Propaganda. In numbers and activity they far outdo the advocates of the truth. While we are meditating to send a Missionary or Catechist to a distant tribe of North-West American Indians, 1000 miles from the missionary head-quarters of both parties, we hear that four Romish Priests are already among them! While the Church of England for a whole year seeks, and seeks in vain, for one single missionary to China, the Romish Agent at Hong Kong negotiates for a contract with a Steam Navigation Company to carry to China 100 Priests within the year! Their missionary lists contain a host of Archbishops, Bishops, Vicars Apostolical, Priests, Deacons, Sub-deacons, and Nuns. In extent of ground, they surround and overspread our positions. The intrusion into our missions at Krishnaghur and New Zealand are but faint skirmishes to be numbered among the many signs which unequivocally proclaim that the battle between Popery and Protestantism must be fought on the mission field no less than at home.

But there is enough to sustain confidence in the assured triumph of the cause. We fear not the comparison as to the present results of Popish and Protestant missions, truth being the judge. We fear not the numbers and the multiplied Orders of Popish missions, if we are only enabled to send a few faithful witnesses of the truth, with an open Bible and a simple faith. In very many such trials of the comparative efficacy of the two systems, the Bible has already triumphed among the Heathen.

SKETCH OF THE GEOGRAPHY OF INDIA.—NO. 2.

A geographical account of India, is quite too extensive a subject to be treated satisfactorily in one or two short papers, such as I purpose penning, on topics connected with this country. A very brief outline however, may be given of its general features and of its divisions.

India, like America and Africa, and some of the minor portions of the earth's surface, terminates in a southerly direction, in a peninsula. The river Indus, (properly Sindh,*) is considered the north-western, and the Himalaya mountains, the north-eastern boundary of this extensive country. Its peninsular portion is washed on the east by the Bay of Bengal, while the Arabian sea forms its western boundary. From a point near the head of the Bay of Bengal, a line drawn with considerable convexity towards the west, to the Himalaya mountains, will form its boundary eastward. The peninsula terminates in a point at Cape Comorin. The extreme length of India, from the point where the Indus issues from the Himalaya mountains to Cape Comorin, is nearly 2000 miles. Its greatest breadth is about 1,500 miles, and its area is estimated at 1,280,000 square miles.

The grand divisions of the country, are North and South India. A considerable river called the Nerbudda, between 600 and 700 miles in length, which runs a due west course and falls into the Gulf of Cam-bay on the west coast, constitutes the boundary line between them. The parallel of 22° north, will answer very well as a dividing line between north and south India. South India is sometimes called the Deccan.† The presidency of Bombay is frequently called Western India, but in describing the country, the two grand divisions of north and south only are noticed.

India presents several very imposing natural features. The stupendous ranges of mountains which form its north-eastern boundary, and which, in many places, rear their snow-clad summits more than 20,000 feet above the level of the sea, are amongst the most grand of natural objects on the globe. The mighty Ganges, and still more mighty Indus, which roll their vast volumes of water along courses of so many hundreds of miles in length, are also well calculated to enlarge our views of the Creator's omnipotence. Nor are its extensive plains, which in north India stretch almost across its entire breadth, objects of less interest.

* "This river," says Hamilton, "is called the Sindha in Sanscrit, and Ab Sinde, or the water of Sinde, by the Persians." It is quite a mistake, therefore, into which modern geographers have fallen, to state that the country takes its name from this river: the reverse is probably true.

† The Sanscrit term Dakshin, (Dukshin,) from which the name Dakhin is derived in Hindoo, and which the English write Deccan, means the south. By some geographers, the name Deccan is applied only to that part of south India between the Nerbudda and Krishna rivers.

It is worthy of remark, that except the Himalaya ranges, there is no elevation in North India deserving of the name of mountain. The Rajmal Hills of Bengal, though sometimes called mountains, do not generally exceed a few hundred feet in height. Although there are here and there low ranges of hills running in different directions, nearly the whole of North India may be considered as one vast plain.

By far the larger portion of South India is high table land, faced both east and west with mountains 5,000 or 6,000 feet above the level of the sea, and extending nearly parallel with the coasts on each side, almost the whole length of the peninsula.

It would be interesting to enter somewhat into detail, in giving a geographical description of this country; but my object in this paper, was simply to mention its extent and define its boundaries. Nor shall I at present advert to the character of its climate, soil, productions, &c. These and kindred subjects I hope to discuss after penning some papers on the character, customs, and religion of its inhabitants.

Truly, India is a wide field for missionary labour. Nor is any portion of its great extent closed against the efforts of the heralds of the cross. The Lord grant that soon over its whole length and breadth, his gospel may have free course and be glorified. J. C.

DEATH OF REV. W. M. LOWRIE.

Late accounts from China give us the following information respecting this indefatigable, ardent, and active missionary. His name adds another to the list of martyr missionaries. The removal of one so much valued, and that removal in such distressing circumstances, must excite the most melancholy feelings, but we feel sure that none will be deterred by such an event from engaging in the work in which he fell; rather let it serve to increase the number of those who will devote themselves to its prosecution.

On the morning of the 19th, the boat in which they had taken passage set sail very early. The wind was unfavourable, being strong from the south. Accordingly it was necessary to beat, and the boat sailed, as is supposed, about ten miles in a south-easterly direction; when suddenly a vessel was seen bearing down upon them very rapidly. It was a craft like those which belong to Chapoo, with three masts and eight oars. At the sight of this vessel the boatmen and other Chinese (passengers,) in the boat were greatly terrified, and were for turning back, but Mr. Lowrie endeavoured to allay their fears. As it drew nearer he showed a small American flag which he had with him, but still they came on, and soon discharged their fire-arms. Upon this he went to the inner part of the boat, having been previously standing in the open part of the boat, at the bow. * * * When the pirates came up, they boarded the boat with swords and spears, and began to thrust and beat all who stood in their way; especially they seemed to seek out and maim the sailors, or the strong and able-bodied, to put an end to their interference. The servants escaped with only one or two blows, but all agree in stating that they did not see a single blow inflicted upon Mr. Lowrie. He is said to have seated himself on a chair or box and remained quiet, and when they were breaking open a trunk with their heavy spears, he took out the key and gave it to them, saying, "There is no need to break it open; here is the key." The pirates continued their work of plunder, breaking open every thing, and taking out such things as they wished, and stripping even the clothes from the Chinamen. Yet they did not touch any thing that was on Mr. Lowrie—even his watch, and perhaps seven or eight dollars that were in his pocket, they did not take.

Before they had finished plundering, something seemed to have awakened a fear in the minds of the pirates, lest when he reached Shanghai they would be reported to the authorities. Whereupon they debated for a moment whether they should kill him or throw him alive into the sea. They hastily determined upon the latter, and two men seized him; and they being unable to effect their purpose, another came up and he was thrown overboard. He was not seen afterwards, for the sea was running very high.

THE RELATION OF THE MISSIONARIES OF THE REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH TO THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY'S BOARD.

In order that our readers and others who desire it, may possess correct information on this subject, we publish the following brief statement. The connexion of our missionaries with the General Assembly's Board, is in no sense ecclesiastical. They constitute a distinct Presbytery in India, in subordination to the General Synod of our church in this country, to which they are amenable in all relating to their doctrine, discipline, and order. They do not make use of the Confession of Faith in the form adopted by the Presbyterian church in the United States in the admission of members, and the Psalmody they employ, is the most literal poetical version they can obtain, several of the Psalms having been versified by one of our own missionaries. The Board of Missions of our church operates in connexion with the General Assembly's Board, by a provision made in perfect consistency with a distinct denominational standing, and honourable to them, while kind to us. The ecclesiastical connexion of our missionaries has, we believe, been distinctly mentioned in all the reports of the Presbyterian Board, except the last, where it was omitted, we presume, by an oversight. The intercourse of our Board with that of the General Assembly has ever been of the most friendly character; and while they have never appeared to seek either to disparage or change our relative position, they have always displayed the kindness, courtesy, and generous feeling which the true disciples of the LORD JESUS CHRIST may be expected to exercise towards their brethren.

SOUTHERN MISSIONARY REPORT.

From the Annual Report of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, South, it appears that they have 282 Domestic and Indian Missions, in which are 297 Missionaries, and 63,885 Church members. Of the Missionaries, 129 are employed among the people of colour, 32 among the Indians, and 6 among the German population. One Missionary has been appointed for China, but has not yet sailed for his destination. The contributions for the year amounted to $73,667 66.

SUPERSTITION.

It may seem incredible, but it is undoubtedly true, that there now exists at the Marmadilla Frank, in the middle of the city and island of Bombay, British India, a human being who has inhabited a summer house, and held on the palm of his left hand a heavy flower-pot for twenty-one years without intermission. The narrator of this circumstance actually saw the hermit, (for such he is called.) The arm is completely sinew-bound and shrivelled, the nails of his fingers nine inches long, and curved like the talons of a bird. His beard nearly reaches to the ground when standing erect.

Whilst sitting, the man rests his elbow on his knee, and when walking, he supports it with the other hand. His countenance indicates intelligence, and he once had very extensive possessions. All he now possesses, is a few rags round the middle of his body, and a servant who is allowed to attend his immediate wants, the pecuniary part of which is supplied by visitors.

Twenty-one years ago he lost his caste by eating mutton! an indulgence in totally forbidden food, and was condemned to hold, for thirty years, a large flower-pot filled with earth, in which grows a sacred plant. To lose caste, and not be able to take it up again, according to the superstitions of these deluded idolaters, is to incur the penalty of everlasting misery in a future state. What an example does this poor deluded creature afford of perseverance, zeal, courage, and devotion worthy even of the highest cause. If he lives to redeem his caste, most likely he will hereafter be set apart to be worshipped as a god!—Ch. Reflector.

DOMESTIC MISSIONS.

NARRATIVE OF A MISSIONARY TOUR.

The following sketch of an interesting and extensive tour has been kindly furnished for publication in the Banner. It will serve to show how vast is the field for labour at home as well as abroad; how urgent are the calls for immediate aid, and how encouraging are the prospects of success: and, while it may show that the good soldier of Jesus Christ must endure hardness, it is calculated to impress the minds of all right-hearted men, who are desirous of the “good work” the apostle mentions, with the need of their speedy and energetic help, and to lead the people of God generally to contribute of their substance in aid of an object evidently so excellent, necessary, and promising.

MESSRS. EDITORS,—Agreeably to request, I proceed to present a brief sketch of a missionary tour, for fifteen months, throughout various parts of the country in which the Reformed Presbyterian church is found, hoping that it will prove acceptable to yourselves and your numerous readers. We live in a day of benevolent enterprise, when great facilities are furnished for the development of the best feelings of a generous heart, in bringing to bear upon a dying world all the benign influences of an enlightened Christianity. Every Christian philanthropist may find a field of exertion by leading men to “the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world.”

Agreeably to Synodical direction, I set out on my travels in September, 1846. According to the scale of appointments given to me by the Western Presbytery, I proceeded to Milwaukee, Wisconsin Territory. This town is situated about 115 miles north of Chicago, on lake Michigan. It has made very rapid improvement during the last ten years, and contains a population of about 12,000. The papists constitute the predominant party, and as a consequence most of those who occupy offices of trust and power belong to that sect. There are here one New School Presbyterian church, one Congregational, and one Methodist. I had been appointed to reconnoitre that place, and to make an effort to rally any who were disposed to maintain Reformation principles. Having formed an acquaintance with a few individuals, I obtained information respecting the condition of matters connected with my mission operation, which led me to consider that I would not be authorized to remain. A missionary sent out by the Board of the Old School Presbyterian church in the July previous, had collected a small society together, and I did not wish to interfere with his efforts while so many places were altogether destitute. I would have been happy to have visited various other locations throughout that fertile territory, where much good might be accomplished; but the inclemency of the winter in that region prevented me from such an undertaking. I proceeded thence to Deerfield, Illinois; there I preached for four Sabbaths to a small congregation hungering for the bread of life. This place is situated on the road leading from Chicago to Galena: it is about forty miles west of Chicago, and six miles west of Elgin, on Fox river. The proximity of these places, makes this a desirable location for the farmer. Elgin is a town of considerable business, and possesses great water power. It has an extensive saw-mill, and a large woollen factory owned by an enterprising firm from New England. Both of these were in successful operation when I was in that vicinity. At Deerfield we have a most interesting congregation; they are a people warmly attached to Reformed Presbyterian principles, industrious in their habits, frugal and enterprising: they amount to about fifteen or twenty families; and if the ordinances could be frequently administered, they would double their numbers and increase with rapidity in a very little time.

I might here mention that we have also another congregation organized since I left that country, in Rock Prairie near Rock river in Wisconsin: it consists of forty members, and, as I have been lately informed by a minister of the western Presbytery, it is anticipated that they will soon number one hundred. The period of my allotment being fulfilled at Deerfield, I set out on my journey for Iowa. I rode only twenty-six miles on the first day, which brought me to the town of Belvidere. This is principally a New England settlement. I put up at the house of an individual to whom I carried a verbal introduction, from a member at Deerfield: people in the west do not stand on the formalities of the old settled countries of the east, nor are pen, ink and paper always at hand. My friend, however, received me with great cordiality. I found in the vicinity a family belonging to our church, and others, as well as my friend, with whom I remained, exceedingly favourable to our principles. I remained over Sabbath, preached in Belvidere during the day, and in the evening in the house of my friend, where we had gathered together a goodly number of hearers. On Monday morning I took farewell of my new but agreeable acquaintances, and proceeded on my way to Iowa.—My journey was exceedingly disagreeable, from the inclemency of the weather, it being the last week of November. On the first day, I travelled through snow and sleet without any way of shielding myself; as riding on horseback is the only possible mode of travelling for a preacher, in visiting the numerous vacancies throughout the west. My progress was, therefore, not so rapid as I would have desired. I arrived at Franklin, Linn Co., Iowa, on the next Tuesday week. Here I remained and preached for six Sabbaths. Iowa is an interesting state, though yet in its swaddling bands: its population is of a superior order, consisting of emigrants from almost every state in the union, as well as a considerable proportion from Scotland and Ireland, and from the continent of Europe, especially from Germany. The climate is for the most part salubrious and healthy, chills and fevers prevail more or less; these are often produced by not observing proper precaution. The country is beautiful, fertile and gently undulating; it is interspersed with timber lands and prairies, it abounds with springs and considerable water-power, and it is rapidly filling up with an industrious and enterprising people. The prospects in Linn Co. are very flattering. There is here a large field for ministerial enterprise; it is truly white unto the harvest: the labourer only needs to put in his sickle, and under the blessing of God, and his fostering care, he may reap a rich and abundant harvest. Under an efficient ministry a large and flourishing congregation may soon be established: and this is not all, a powerful religious influence may be brought to bear upon the community for many miles around. Nor is this the only place in this infant state where our church might operate with great efficiency—we might point to Washington, the county-town of Washington county, which has been visited by the Rev. Samuel Wylie of Randolph Co., Ill. Another small society on the borders of Louisa and Des Moines Co., to the towns of Edinburgh, Wapello, Columbia city, and indeed, many other places might be mentioned. Wherever immortal beings are to be found, there the missionary should be sent, and there the gospel should be preached for the salvation of sinners. After leaving Linn County, I proceeded on my way to Iowa city, where the legislature of the state was then in session. It consisted of a body of men not surpassed in respectability and regard for good order by many states in the union. I preached on the succeeding Sabbath in Louisa Co., to an audience consisting of various denominations. I proceeded during the next week, (it was about the middle of January,) on my way to Monmouth, Illinois. In this place there is a little society of Covenanters, who had removed thither from the southern parts of Indiana and Illinois. Here I preached eight Sabbaths. It is the county-seat of Warren Co. The face of the country is truly beautiful as it strikes the eye of the traveller, and the soil is very fertile. A congregation has been organized since I left the place. Its condition is very encouraging, respected by the community around them; by a constant ministration of the ordinances, with the divine blessing, success must inevitably be obtained. About the 16th of March, 1847, I proceeded to the congregation at Walnut Hill, in Marion Co., about 22½ miles south of Monmouth. The congregation is at present vacant, it numbers about ninety members: ministerial labour is much needed, among this interesting people, who desire to have a pastor settled amongst them. There is here also a wide field for ministerial labour—there are many places in the circumference of fifty or one hundred miles where missionary labour might be employed with great profit in stemming the progress of infidelity, and also in counteracting the unscriptural tenets of Alexander Campbell, which predominate so extensively and with such injurious results, throughout the whole valley of the Mississippi. Having completed my appointments in the western regions, I proceeded to the Pittsburgh Presbytery. Here there is an interesting field of labour, though it is greatly circumscribed in the range of country, when compared with the vast and mighty field under the supervision of the western Presbytery. In this Presbytery, comprising all western Pa. beyond the Alleghany range and one congregation in Ohio, there are a number of vacancies anxious for the ordinances. They, however, do not labour under the same amount of destitution experienced by those lonely places already referred to in the far west, yet there is a pressing demand for the gospel.

APPOINTMENT OF A SCRIPTURE READER IN THE FIRST REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN CONGREGATION, PHILADA.

In the May Number of our last volume, we had the pleasure of recording the appointment of a Scripture Reader in the Reformed Presbyterian Church in the city of New York, an effort to do good which has been crowned with remarkable success. We have now the gratification of announcing that the session of the First Reformed Presbyterian Church in this city has appointed Mr. William Stavelly Darragh, who is at present attending the Theological Seminary, to the same work in this place. Mr. Darragh has been informally engaged under the direction of session since the commencement of last October, and has already done much good, especially in the southern districts of this city. The report of the committee of session in reference to this subject will be published in our next number, and we hope it will procure for Mr. Darragh a welcome and encouragement from all whom he may meet, while it may lead other churches to make use of a similar agency.

THE SABBATH SCHOOL.

PARENTAL CO-OPERATION WITH THE SABBATH-SCHOOL TEACHER.

There are four things that parents should do in relation to the Sabbath-schools.

First. They should continue to retain and fill the government department in training their children. For the good behaviour of their children, when at the school, or going to, or returning from it, the teacher can be responsible only to a very limited extent. To curb, restrain or control the deportment of scholars, he is clothed with no authority beyond that of persuasion, and besides, he meets his scholars for other purposes than that of government. It is his province to store the intellect with the knowledge of divine things; to perform his work, he needs to find the children rendered tractable, docile and teachable, by the governmental training of parents at home. Let parents see to it that their duty in this matter be not neglected. It is theirs, and theirs only, and cannot be performed by others. If they fail to perform it, the results of its neglect must be realized.

Secondly. Parents could and should do much to interest their children in the Sabbath-school. The manner in which they talk about it, their action in relation to it, and the estimation in which they hold it, will not fail to produce an effect on the minds of their children. For indifference to the Sabbath-school on the part of the children, parents are fully responsible—the fault, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, is theirs.

Thirdly. Parents should see to it that their children are prepared for and punctually in their places in the school. Tardy arrival, ragged clothes, dirty faces, or bad lessons, are all indicative of parental neglect, and would all disappear under the proper exercise of parental fidelity to the interests of the Sabbath-school; and Fourthly. Let them give the teachers their sympathy, their counsels, and their prayers. The disheartening besetments of the teacher's toils demand their sympathy. The inexperience of their youth, the delicacy of their assumed charge of young children, and the skilfulness requisite to its execution, demand your counsels. Their entire dependence upon the blessing of God to do your children good, demands your prayers. Never, O, never, send your child to the Sabbath-school, without asking your Heavenly Father to bless the efforts of his teacher to do him good when he gets there.—S. S. Treasury.

PRAYER AND LABOUR.—TO TEACHERS.

All the difficulties in your way may be overcome. Be constant in prayer for the class, and constant in labour with them. The apostles prayed and waited, and the Spirit came; then they testified of Jesus, and the blessing came. They had knowledge by inspiration; you can have it only by study, and scriptural knowledge by study of the Scriptures. If you desire to set forth the glory of God, and to promote the salvation of the class, plough in the closet, and you will reap in the school. It is in grace, as in nature: the fruits of the earth are not from labour, but from God; and yet not from God without labour, but from God by labour. Pray and labour, and God will prosper: prayer without labour will not prevail; labour without prayer cannot.

FAMILY CIRCLE.

DOMESTIC PIETY.

BY D'AUBIGNE.

“Let them show piety at home.”—1 Tim. v. 4.

Parents, if your children do not meet with a spirit of piety in your houses; if, on the contrary, your pride consists in surrounding them with external gifts, introducing them into worldly society, indulging all their whims, letting them follow their own course, you will see them grow vain, proud, idle, disobedient, and extravagant. They will treat you with contempt; and the more your hearts are wrapped up in them, the less they will think of you. This is seen but too often to be the case; but ask yourselves, if you are not responsible for their bad habits and practices; and your consciences will reply that you are; that you are now eating the bread of bitterness which you have prepared for yourselves. May you learn thereby how great is your sin against God, in neglecting the means which were in your power for influencing their hearts; and may others take warning from your misfortune, and bring up their children in the Lord! Nothing is more effectual in doing this than an example of domestic piety. Public worship is often too vague and general for children, and does not sufficiently interest them as to the worship of the closet, they do not yet understand it.—A lesson learned by rote, if unaccompanied by any thing else, may lead them to look upon religion as a study, like those of foreign languages or history. Here, as every where, and more here than elsewhere, example is more effectual than precept. They are not merely to be taught out of some elementary book that they must love God, but you must show them that God is loved. If they observe that no worship is paid to the God of whom they hear, the very best instruction will prove useless: but by means of Family Worship, these young plants will grow “like a tree planted by the rivers of water that bringeth forth his fruit in season; his leaf also shall not wither.” Your children may leave you, but they will remember in foreign lands the prayers of the parental roof, and those prayers will protect them. “If any,” says the Scripture, “have children or nephews, let them learn to show piety at home. But if any provide not for his own, and especially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel.”

A HEATHEN FAMILY.

That family where there is no religious instruction, where there is no family prayer, where the blessing of God is not sought upon its members, is a family trained up in heathenism. What love can a parent have for the souls of his children, who will not teach them that there is a God, that they are sinners, that there is a heaven and a hell, that there is a Saviour, Jesus Christ, who died for their sins—will he does not persuade them to flee to Christ, escape from hell, and receive an everlasting home in heaven? Does this line reach the eye of father or mother who have never prayed for the salvation of their child? What more have you done for your child than a heathen parent? If that child should be lost because of your neglect, will not God require its blood at your hands?

HINTS AS TO SCHOOLING.

A common error into which many parents fall, is to send their children to an inferior school first, and afterwards to place them in an establishment where they may, as it is termed, “finish” their education. Not only is the pupil a severe loser by this method, but the master, to whose care he is at length confined, experiences much additional trouble. He has not only now to lead the youth into a right path, but to lead him back from many a wrong one; not merely to urge him to the farther acquisition of good habits, but to endeavour to root out many that are faulty. It is related by Quintilian that those who went to learn music of Timotheus, paid double price if they had received any previous instruction—a safe-guard I would recommend for general adoption, by good teachers. But there are other evils connected with such a system, not to mention those that result from a change of plans to the student himself. It is obvious that no tutor can be expected to take much interest in the progress of children who are placed with him only as a temporary thing. Whereas, if it is understood that they are to continue with him so long as his treatment of them is what it ought to be, he has an incentive to diligence in the highest degree effective. He looks upon them as the future ornaments of his school; and they immediately come under the influence of those well-regulated stimuli which urge them on to fill up the ranks of those who are about to finish their scholastic course. A well-directed establishment, where the morals, intellectual improvement, and health of the pupils are carefully and assiduously attended to, presents advantages which ought to be appreciated by parents, though they are seldom valued by the pupils.—Monthly Prize Essay.

ITEMS IN DOMESTIC ECONOMY.

Use spirits of turpentine to remove grease spots from clothes. It dissolves the grease, and then soap the more easily removes it. Grease may be removed from undyed woollen by a solution of pearlash.

Lime spots on woollen may be completely removed by strong vinegar. The vinegar effectually neutralizes the lime, but does not generally affect the colour of the cloth. Dark cloth, the colour of which has been completely destroyed in spots of six inches square, has thus had its colour completely restored.

The whiteness of ivory-handled knives may be restored by rubbing them with fine sand paper or emery.

The oftener carpets are shaken, the longer they last, as the particles of sand which collect upon them grind the threads. Sweeping them also wears them.

Dry wood will produce, on a moderate estimate, twice as much heat as the same amount of green wood; and saves much trouble in kindling fires on cold mornings. To prevent its burning away too rapidly, the sticks should be large. To suppose that green wood would actually give more heat in burning than dry, is as absurd as to suppose that a vessel of hot water will freeze sooner than a cold one.

EXAMPLE—LOOK TO IT.

Let every parent look well to his daily and hourly example; for children, says an able writer, make more use of the eye than the ear; and the expressions are clearer and stronger from the one than the other—they will not be influenced so much by what you say, as by what you do. In vain do you exhort them to be spiritual, while you are worldly. In vain do you point them to the narrow path which leads to heaven, while you decline to walk in it. In vain do you warn them from carnal indulgences in which you seek your gratification. You must live what you teach; you must be what you desire them to become. This is the necessary price of a happy state of religion in the family; and it is, alas! a price many parents decline to pay.

FOR THE YOUNG.

HINTS FOR BOYS.

Seven classes of company to be avoided:

1. Those who ridicule their parents, or disobey their commands.

2. Those who scoff at religion.
3. Those who use profane or filthy language.
4. Those who are unfaithful, play truant, and waste their time in idleness.
5. Those who are of a quarrelsome temper, and apt to get into difficulty with others.
6. Those who are addicted to lying and stealing.
7. Those who are of a cruel disposition, who take pleasure in torturing and maiming animals and insects, robbing birds of their young, and such like acts.

All these classes of companions are to be avoided; for if you associate with them, they will soon make you as bad as themselves.

ILLUSTRATION FOR CHILDREN.

I once saw a preacher trying to teach the children that their souls would live after they were dead. They listened, but evidently did not understand it—He was too abstract. Snatching his watch from his pocket, he said:

“James, what is this I hold in my hand?”

“A little clock,” says another.

“Do you all see it?”

“Yes, sir.”

“How do you know it is a watch?”

“It ticks, sir.”

“Very well, can any of you hear it tick?” All listen. After a pause—

“Yes, sir, we hear it.”

He then took off the case, and held the case in one hand, and the watch in the other.

“Now, children, which is the watch?—You see there are two; which is the watch?”

“Very well, again. Now I will lay the case aside. Put it away down there in my hat. Now let us see if you can hear the ticking?”

“Yes, sir, we hear it,” exclaimed several voices.

“Well, the watch can tick, and go, and keep time, you see, when the case is taken off, and put in my hat. So it is with you, children. Your body is nothing but the case, the soul is inside. The case—the body—may be taken off and buried up in the ground, and the soul will live and think, just as well as this will go, as you see, when the case is off.”

REV. R. J. BLACK.

Rev. R. J. Black, who was obliged to withdraw from the pastoral charge of the 3d Reformed Presbyterian church in this city on account of ill health, was about to set sail last month for the West Indies. He is now in all probability on the mighty deep. May He who rules the sea and the dry land preserve him from all evil, and return him to this country with renovated health, that he may long and faithfully labour in the work of the LORD.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSIONS.

THE COVENANT OF WORKS.

Reason tells us that a change must have taken place in the condition of man, since a holy God must have created all things without the taint of sin, but she leaves us utterly in the dark as to its cause. Reason never could tell how sin came into the world. But we are not left in ignorance. The Bible informs us that by "one man's disobedience sin entered into the world," and it gives a full history of that momentous event. From it we learn that God entered into a covenant with the first of men, the CREATOR with the creature. A covenant is an agreement between two parties on certain conditions. God had a right to give man any commandment he chose, and man would have been bound to obey it unconditionally: but in his infinite goodness, God connected a promise with the performance, and a penalty with the violation of his command, thus giving it the character of a covenant, and making man's happiness depend on his obedience. Man broke this covenant, incurred the penalty, and thus came sin into the world, and with it death and all our woes.

But Adam stood not only for himself. He represented all his posterity. "In Adam all die." In dealing with angels, God had made a covenant with each one for himself, and many of them had fallen. In dealing with man, he pursues a different plan; HE makes a covenant with one for all. Does any one object to this? What plan more calculated to benefit the human race can be suggested? The person God selected was as likely to keep the covenant as any one of his descendants; and what a strong motive to obedience had he beyond any other, in the fact that his obedience would make happy, his disobedience make miserable, untold millions who should spring from him? Had all mankind been assembled, and the character of the covenant been stated to them, would they not have selected their great first parent as their representative? If we may judge by probabilities, it was far more probable that Adam, as a federal head, would keep the covenant, than that any of his descendants should do so. Indeed, since Adam fell, we might suppose any of his descendants must have fallen; for the same causes that produced his fall, would have produced theirs, and we cannot conceive that they would have been able to stand in the circumstances in which he fell. But whatever may be our speculations on this point, of this we are sure, that there could be no iniquity with God; the Judge of all the earth must do right, and any proposal which he would make to man, would be based equally on justice, goodness, and wisdom.

Being represented in Adam, Adam's sin is ours, as much as if we had been present and committed it personally. Thus of every human being it may be said, "Thou hast fallen by thine iniquity." "Thou hast fallen:" originally created in God's image, like him in holiness, thou hast fallen from thy high estate, and become what thou now art. "Thou hast fallen by thine iniquity." Thou wast left free to stand, and free to fall, and thou hast fallen. Thou didst voluntarily transgress the easy commandment of thy God, and thou hast brought ruin upon thy soul.

ON PRAYER.

"The effectual, fervent prayer of the righteous man availeth much."—James v. 16.

That "the energetic, inwrought* prayer of a righteous man availeth much;" that by it numerous blessings are bestowed by God upon his erring and dependent creatures, was a truth confidently believed and acted upon centuries previous to the times of the apostles. Nor was it a religious rite peculiar to the Jewish people. Gentile nations, the world over, whether they dwelt on the burning plains of central Africa, or roved amid the dense forests of northern Europe; whether they built their altars of fire on the mountain-tops of western Asia, or sprinkled the blood of human victims in the oaken groves of the British isles; here, and every where, all acknowledged the necessity of invoking the assistance of some invisible and omnipotent power. God's chosen people, however, alone prayed with a faith enlightened by a direct revelation. Did pestilence, or famine, settle down upon their hearth-stones? or disease enfold within its withering arms the form of some helpless little one? sacrifices were made, and petitions offered up that the one might be banished from their borders, and the other restored to health and happiness. When David ordered Joab to number the people of Israel, seventy thousand perished, and the plague ceased not until the guilty king humbled himself before God, and wrestled with him in prayer. Famine oppressed the land for three years, and there dropped not on the parched earth either rain or dew, until Elijah lay in the dust on Carmel, and asked that the heavens might again send forth their refreshing showers.

If prayer be thus effectual to the accomplishment of mighty works, we should inquire earnestly into its nature. The inspired writer informs us that the inwrought prayer of a righteous man availeth much. For convenience, we change this declaration of the apostle into the following simple synonymous proposition—The right kind of prayer exerts a powerful influence. Our first inquiry, therefore, will be, What is the right kind of prayer? And we remark that to pray aright,

We must be in a suitable frame of mind. Do we come into the presence of our Maker with feelings of revenge or malice, injustice or ingratitude, self-pride or evil suspicion? A just and holy God frowns upon our impiety, and looks upon our petition as upon abomination. Hence the language in the gospel of John—"Now we know that God heareth not sinners." Hence, also, the language of the Psalmist—"If I regard iniquity in my heart, the LORD will not hear me."

We must have faith in God's hearing and answering prayer. "Ask, and it shall be given you," is the language of HIM from whom cometh every good and perfect gift. Christ himself has invited us to come unto HIM, and lay before him our numerous necessities, assuring us that, "If we ask any thing according to the will of God, he heareth." The Psalmist of old placed his confidence in HIM, and was never disappointed; for he says, "I cried unto the LORD, and he heard me out of his holy hill." What saith the apostle James also? "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him. But," adds the apostle, "let him ask in faith, nothing wavering; for he that wavereth is like a wave of the sea driven with the wind and tossed."

We must pray with a suitable object in view. Words are but embodied thoughts, and thoughts arise in the mind as they are suggested either by outward or inward exigencies. Prayer, therefore, must be shaped by those thoughts which are dominant in the mind upon any particular occasion; and must, of necessity, be as diversified in its verbal structure as are the infinite necessities of a ruined race. Christ, however, has left us a model which, perhaps, contains the germs of all genuine prayer. He teaches us to ask for the revering of God's holy name—the spreading of his kingdom—the doing of his will upon earth as in heaven—the giving of our daily food—the forgiveness of sins—strength to resist temptation, and deliverance therefrom when ensnared. The Christian who is guided in his prayer by that of Christ, will rarely presume to ask for an unsuitable object, for he then consults the will of God, and has his eye single to his glory.

We must pray with importunity. God demands of us earnestness: lukewarmness is his detestation. Jacob wrestled with God from midnight until dawn, and said, "I will not let thee go except thou bless me." David "prevented the dawning of the morning, and cried." And, above all, "Christ being in agony prayed more earnestly, and his sweat was as it were great drops of blood." If, then, prayer be importunate; have for its issue a right object, be delivered in faith, and in a suitable frame of mind, the blessing must follow just as surely as does the dawn purple upwards from the darkness.

Having thus determined the nature of suitable prayer, we proceed to consider how it exerts a powerful influence. And it does so, By radically changing our relations to God. We attempt not here to prove the proposition, simply to illustrate it. If a gardener who had stored his green house with rare plants, should never either ventilate the conservatory, or permit one ray of light to enter, the effect would soon be manifest in their destruction. Speedily the plants would droop and wither; for the life-giving influences derivable from the sun and air would be effectually withdrawn, notwithstanding the one poured down its rays as warmly as of old, and the other freely circulated over the spot where the plants were dying. If, however, at certain hours of the day the coverings were withdrawn from the windows, and the light and air permitted to enter, the plants would soon spread forth their fast strengthening leaves, and unfold their beauties beneath the genial influence. So is it with prayer. The sunshine is the grace of God ever ready to be applied by the Holy Spirit to the sinner's heart. The conservatory is his own soul; and the coverings which shut out the grace of God, his own sinful and perverse will. "The carnal heart is enmity against God." In league with sin, and loving darkness rather than light, it seeks to shut out those influences which would work in it to will and to do of God's good pleasure. But when through the enlightening influence of the Spirit, the sinner is brought to see his lost condition, and pray that God would for ever be reconciled to him through the all-atoning merits of Christ's ever-living sacrifice, these very acts of repentance and prayer bring him, through the influence of the Spirit and the intercession of Christ, into new relations with God, making him, thereafter, a suitable object of Divine favour.

It brings down God's richest blessings. Is a son or a daughter, a parent or a kinsman, to be reclaimed from the paths of vice and sin? Are the sick to be restored to health, and the wavering to steadfastness of purpose? Is war with its hydra-headed vices, or pestilence and famine to be removed from a nation? God's people must prostrate themselves before his mercy seat, and agonize in prayer until they obtain the desired gift. In the ancient church, prayer effected miraculous interposition. The dead were brought to life, and the living prematurely sent to fester with the dead. Fires were quenched; the mouths of lions stopped; the heavens opened; the blind made to see; the deaf to hear; the lame to walk, and sins to be forgiven. God's power is not now diminished, nor his will less beneficent than of old, for "HE is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever;" and the declaration of the apostle, as mighty in its truthfulness as when first penned, still lies engraven on the page of Holy Writ, assuring us that "the effectual, fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much."

HISTORICAL SKETCHES.

JOHN KNOX.

The following sketch of the life and character of John Knox, is from Turnbull's "Genius of Scotland." It is a well drawn portrait of the indomitable Reformer, and we have no doubt will be acceptable to our readers.

The character of Knox has been terribly blackened by heartless and infidel historians, and especially by sickly sentimentalists of the Werter school. Nevertheless he was a noble-hearted, truth-loving, sham-hating, God-fearing, self-sacrificing man; a hero in the proper sense of the word, a minister of righteousness, an angel of reform. Not, indeed, a soft, baby-faced, puling sentimentalist; but a lofty, iron-hearted man, who "never feared the face of clay," and did God's will, in spite of devils, popes, and kings. His history possesses the deepest and most romantic interest. It is one of the most magnificent passages in Scottish story. Bruce battled for a crown; Knox battled for the truth. Both conquered, after long struggles, and conquered mainly by the might of their single arm. But the glory which irradiates the head of the reformer, far outshines that of the hero of Bannockburn, for the latter is earthly and evanescent, the former celestial and immortal.

John Knox was born in Haddington, not far from Edinburgh, of poor but honest parents, in the year 1505; grew up in solitude; was destined for the church; received a thorough collegiate education; became an honest friar; wore the monk's cowl for many years; adopted, silently and unostentatiously, the principles of the protestant reformation; spent much of his time in teaching, and in the prosecution of liberal studies, of which he was considered a master; was suddenly and unexpectedly called, at St. Andrew's, by the unanimous voice of his brethren, to the preaching of the word, and the defence of their religious liberties: after a brief struggle with himself, yielded to the call, nobly threw himself into the breach, at the hazard of his life, attacked "papal idolatry" with unsparing vigour, was seized by the authorities, and sent a prisoner to France, in 1547, where he worked in the galleys as a slave, but evermore maintained his lofty courage and cheerful hope; was set at liberty two years afterwards; preached in England, in the time of Edward the Sixth; refused a bishopric from that best of kings; retired to the continent at the accession of Mary, residing chiefly at Geneva and Frankfort; returned to Scotland in 1555; laboured with indomitable perseverance to establish protestantism; rebuked the great for immorality, profaneness, and rapacity, and succeeded in greatly strengthening the cause of truth and freedom. At the earnest solicitation of the English congregation in Geneva, he went thither a second time; there he published, "The First Blast of the Trumpet against the Monstrous Regiment (Government) of Women," directed principally against Mary of Guise, and the Regent of Scotland, two narrow-minded, miserable despots; returned to Scotland in 1559; continued his exertions in behalf of Christ's truth; did much to establish common schools; finally saw protestantism triumphant in Scotland; and died in 1572, so poor that his family had scarcely sufficient to bury him, but with the universal love and homage of his countrymen, a conscience void of offence, and a hope full of immortality. He had a sore fight of an existence; wrestling with popes and principalities; in defeat, contention, life-long struggle; rowing as a galley slave, wandering as an exile. A sore fight, but he won it. "Have you hope?" they asked him in his last moments, when he could no longer speak. He lifted his finger, "pointed upwards with his finger," and so died. Honour to him! His works have not died. The letter of his work dies, as of all men's; but the spirit of it, never.

Knox has been much abused for his violent treatment of Queen Mary. His addresses and appeals to her have been characterized as impudent and cruel; but, thoroughly inspected, they will be found the reverse. Strong and startling they were, but neither impudent nor cruel. Doubtless they fell upon her ear like the tones of some old prophet, sternly rebuking sin, or vindicating the rights of God. Mary was a woman of matchless beauty; and had she been educated differently, might have blessed the world with the mild lustre of her Scottish reign; but she was the dupe of bad counsels, in spirit and practice a despot, the plaything of passion, and the reckless opposer of the best interests of her country. Her beauty and sufferings have shed a false lustre over her character; above all, have aided in concealing the terrible stain of infidelity to her marriage vows, and the implied murder of her wretched husband; charges which her apologists can extenuate, but not deny. But, forsooth, it is an insufferable thing for a plain, honest-hearted man, like John Knox, to tell the truth to such a one! She was young, beautiful, fascinating, and however recklessly, madly, ruinously wrong, he must not advise her—above all, must not warn her! Now, such a notion may possibly commend itself to your "absolute gentlemen, of very soft society, full of most excellent differences and great showing; indeed, to speak feelingly of them, who are the card and calendar of gentry," but it cannot be imposed upon our plain common sense. Mary was a queen, however, and John Knox a poor plebeian! Ay, ay! that is the difficulty! Kings and queens may do what they please. The people are made for them, not they for the people. And sure enough it is a vulgar thing to oppose them in their ambitious schemes, or to tell them the honest truth betimes! Poor John Knox! thou must fall down and worship "a painted bredd" after all. A beautiful queen must be spared, if Scotland should perish. But looking at the matter from the free atmosphere of New England, we maintain that John Knox was of higher rank than Mary, Queen of Scots. He was more true, more heroic, more kingly, than all the race of the Stuarts. He had a right, in God's name, to speak the truth, "to reprove, rebuke, and exhort, with all long-suffering." Hence, though his words were stern and appalling, they were uttered with a kind and generous intention. "Madam," said Knox, when he saw Mary burst into tears from vexation and grief, "in God's presence I speak; I never delighted in the weeping of any of God's creatures, yea, I can scarcely well abide the tears of mine own boys, when mine own hands correct them, much less can I rejoice in your majesty's weeping; but seeing I have offered unto you no just occasion to be offended, I must sustain your majesty's tears, rather than I dare hurt my conscience, or betray the commonwealth, by silence."

Yes, he was a stern old Puritan, a lion of a man, who made terrible havoc among the "painted bredds" of popery, and turned back the fury of wild barons and persecuting priests. "His single voice," says Randolph, "could put more life into a host than six hundred blustering trumpets." Single-handed he met the rage of a disappointed government, and an infuriated priesthood, and conquered by the single might of his magnanimous audacity. In the wildest whirl of contending emotion, he never lost sight of the great end of his being, as a servant of God, nor wavered a hair's breadth from truth and right.

Yet this stern old Covenanter was not without a touch of gentleness, and even of hilarity. He loved his home, his children and his friends. An honest, quiet laugh, often mantled his pale earnest visage. "They are wrong," says Carlyle, (whose thorough appreciation of such men as Luther, Cromwell, and Knox, is truly refreshing amid the vapid inanities or coarse prejudices of ordinary historians,) "who think that Knox was a gloomy, spasmodic, shrinking fanatic. Not at all. He is one of the solidest of men. Practical, cautious, hopeful, patient; a most shrewd, observing, quietly discerning man. In fact, he has very much the type of character we assign to the Scotch at present; a certain sardonic taciturnity is in him; insight enough; and a stouter heart than he himself knows of. * * An honest-hearted, brotherly man; brother to the high, brother to the low; sincere in his sympathy with both."

Knox, doubtless, had his faults; and what of that? He made some mistakes! and what, too, of that? Was he not a true man, and a true minister of God's word? Did he not accomplish a great and beneficial work of reform; and, having done this, did he not die a sweet and triumphant death? God has set his seal upon him, and upon his work; and that is enough for us.

We hesitate not, with Carlyle, to name the reformation under Knox as the great era in Scottish history, as the one glorious event which gave life to the nation. Thence resulted freedom, activity, purity of morals, science, national and individual greatness. Previous to this event, Scotland possessed only a rough, tumultuous, physical life; her politics—dissensions and executions; her religion—a puerile superstition; her literature—ballads and monkish legends; her joy—hunting, fighting and drinking! But the reformation breathed into her the breath of a spiritual existence. Her national prosperity dates from that era. Thence proceeded faith and order, education, industry and wealth. “It was not a smooth business; but it was welcome, surely, and cheap at that price, had it been far rougher. On the whole, cheap at any price, as life is. The people began to live; they needed first of all to do that, at what cost and costs soever. Scottish literature and thought, Scottish industry, James Watt, David Hume, Walter Scott, Robert Burns: I find Knox and the Reformation acting in the heart’s core of every one of these persons and phenomena; I find that without the reformation they would not have been. Or what of Scotland? The Puritanism of Scotland became that of England—of New England. A tumult in the High Church of Edinburgh, spread into a universal battle and struggle over all these realms; and there came out of it, after fifty years’ struggling, what we call the ‘Glorious Revolution,’ a Habeas Corpus Act, Free Parliaments, and much else.”

It has become fashionable of late, in certain quarters, to undervalue the reformation, and to condemn those great and rugged spirits by whom it was accomplished. A sentimental, baby-hearted, superstition-smitten generation, cannot appreciate those mighty men, and mightier reforms of the olden time. But how well and worthily does the large-hearted and ethereal Milton speak of it: “When I recall to mind, at last, after so many dark ages, wherein the huge, overshadowing train of error had almost swept all the stars out of the firmament of the church—how the bright and blissful reformation, by Divine power, struck through the black and settled night of ignorance and anti-Christian tyranny, methinks a sovereign and reviving joy must needs rush into the bosom of him that reads or hears, and the sweet odor of the returning gospel imbathe his soul with the fragranciness of heaven. Then was the sacred Bible sought out of the dusty corners, where profane falsehood and neglect had thrown it; the schools opened; divine and human learning raked out of the embers of forgotten tongues; the princes and cities trooping apace to the new-erected banner of salvation; the martyrs, with the irresistible might of weakness, shaking the powers of darkness, and scorning the fiery rage of the red old dragon.” A noble testimony like this far outweighs all the cant of a whining sentimentalism. Its truth, as well as its eloquence all must admit.

ROMANISM.

ROMANISM A NOVELTY IN IRELAND.

From this, it is evident, first, that the number of Christians in Ireland which moved the efforts of Celestine, was very considerable; secondly, that the number was increasing, and that there was time for heresy to spring up and to sow its seeds: thirdly, that this was three years before St. Patrick was sent thither, and in the last place, that when Palladius was appointed Bishop there, the terms of his mission were, "to Scots, (that is, to the Irish, for such was the ancient name by which they were known,) believing in Christ." And to bring up our proof to a still earlier date, we may refer to the well known fact, that Celestus, (by birth an Irishman,) who became the follower of Pelagius, and such an abettor of his heresy, that Jerome called him "the leader of the whole army of the Pelagians;" before he adopted those opinions, had written three letters to his parents in Ireland, from the monastery of St. Martin's, in Tours, in the year 369, which letters were full of such piety, as Gennadius expresses it, "as to make them necessary to all who love God." Now these letters were written by one who had been educated in Ireland, and who therefore must have received his religious views there. They were written to his parents residing in Ireland, who, we must therefore suppose, were capable of appreciating them, and they were composed sixty-two years before St. Patrick's arrival in Ireland, which plainly proves that the light of the gospel appeared in that horizon, before St. Patrick engaged in the work of converting to the faith, as well as that the orthodox faith of its ancient church was not primarily received from Rome. We have also the testimony of Tertullian, one of the Latin fathers, who wrote about the year A.D. 200, and who asserts in his book against the Jews, that "those parts of the British Isles which were unapproached by the Romans, were yet subject to Christ." The reference to Ireland is here most evident, from the use of the plural noun "Isles;" and to this testimony we might add many more, if time and space allowed: but all these tend to the same point, namely, that there was a general reception of Christianity, before the arrival of St. Patrick. Comparatively speaking, it signifies little who had the honour of first preaching the gospel among the Irish, or whence he came. But one point is clear, and every writer of Irish history has been obliged to acknowledge it, even down to Moore, and Carew, the ecclesiastical historian from Maynooth, that the original link is not to be traced to Rome, inasmuch as Christianity so flourished in Ireland, before the coming of St. Patrick, that there was an increasing number of Christians in the country, before the arrival of that preacher. And in making this assertion on the evidence of history, let it not be supposed that it is our intention to lower the name of one so greatly and so justly revered. No,—it is merely to state the fact—the plain unvarnished truth, that the gospel was introduced among the Irish, by men who we doubt not are now enjoying glory above, who lived nearer to the times of Christ and his apostles than St. Patrick lived. Our object is to show the purity and truth of St. Patrick's doctrine: to prove that his creed contained the genuine religion of sainted Erin, and was primitive Christianity indeed.

2. Our second historical argument shall be, that after the mission of St. Patrick, the Pope's spiritual jurisdiction (not to speak of the temporal,) was of little authority there.

It need not here be detailed, that the question of the "three chapters" was a most serious one, and not only engaged the attention of Princes, but awakened the alarm of the Roman Court, and finally formed a subject for the decision of the fifth general council, held A.D. 553. (Moore's History.) Cardinal Baronius, in his annals under the date 556, has these remarkable words:—"All the bishops that were in Ireland, with most earnest study rose up jointly for the defence of the three chapters, and when they perceived that the church of Rome did both receive the condemnation of the three chapters, and strengthen the fifth synod with her consent, they departed from her, and clave to the rest of the schismatics that were either in Italy, or in Africa, or in other countries. Animated with that vain confidence that they did stand for the Catholic faith, while they defended those things that were concluded in the council of Chalcedon."

This historical statement furnishes us with convincing proof of the independence of the Irish church. It shows us, in the first place, that if any connexion had existed between the churches, it was purely voluntary in its nature; secondly, that so far from acknowledging an infallible superiority as vested in the See of Rome, that upon the first occasion of disagreement, she separated herself; thirdly, that in doing so, it was with the unanimous consent of all the bishops; and fourthly, that even the church of Rome pronounced the church of Ireland to be schismatical, and alien from the Catholic faith.

Here then, whatever Ireland might have been previously, it is fully and clearly declared, by an authority that cannot be contradicted, that Ireland withdrew from the Roman See; and did time allow, we could follow up the subject, by showing that the greatest efforts were made to bring her back to friendship and connexion with Rome, but without success.

This took place about the year 556, according to Baronius' annals, and the nationality of the Irish church continued from that period, till Adrian the Fourth, by the sword of England and internal dissension, succeeded in asserting the power and prerogative of papal Rome, and just as the ancient church of Ireland refused then to reverence the 5th council, commonly known as the second synod of Constantinople, and adhered only to the first four general councils, so do the Protestant churches of Ireland and England now take their stand on the same ground. At the period just mentioned, Ireland separated. She would acknowledge nothing but the Scriptures, and the first four general councils, and for this Rome pronounced her to be schismatical and alien, and nearly one thousand years after, the Protestants of England and Ireland took up the same position, and for identically the same reasons, separated themselves from the increased corruptions of the Romish communion.

PRACTICAL ESSAYS.

SO MANY CALLS.

It was a brisk, clear evening in the latter part of December, when Mr. Z— returned to the comforts of a bright coal fire and warm arm-chair in his parlour at home. He changed his heavy boots for slippers, drew around him the folds of his evening gown, and then lounging back in the chair, looked up to the ceiling and about the room with an air of satisfaction. Still there was a cloud on his brow. What could be the matter with Mr. Z—? To tell the truth, he had that afternoon received the agent of one of the principal religious charities of the day, and had been warmly urged to double his last year's subscription, and the urging had been pressed by statements and arguments to which he did not know well how to reply. "People think," soliloquized he to himself, "that I am made of money, I believe. This is the fourth object this year for which I have been requested to double my subscription, and this year has been one of heavy family expenses—building and fitting up this house, carpets, curtains—no end to the new things to be bought. I do not see really how I am to give a cent more to charity. Then, there are the bills for the boys and girls; they all say they must have twice as much now as before we came to this house; wonder if I did right in building it?" And Mr. Z— glanced uneasily up and down the ceiling, and around on the costly furniture, and looked into the fire in silence. He was tired, harassed, and sleepy—his head began to swim, and his eyes closed. He was asleep. In his sleep he thought he heard a tap at the door; and there stood a plain, poor-looking man, who in a voice singularly low and sweet, asked for a few moments' conversation with him. Mr. Z— asked him into the parlour, and drew him a chair near the fire. The stranger looked attentively round, and then turning to Mr. Z—, presented him with a paper: "It is your last year's subscription to Missions," said he; "you know all the wants of that cause that can be told you; I came to see if you had any thing more to add to it."

This was said in the same low and quiet voice as before; but for some reason unaccountable to himself, Mr. Z— was more embarrassed by the plain, poor, unpretending man, than he had been in the presence of any one before. He was for some moments silent before he could reply at all, and then in a hurried and embarrassed manner he began the same excuses which had appeared so satisfactory to him the afternoon before—the hardness of the times, the difficulty of collecting money, family expenses, &c.

The stranger quietly surveyed the spacious apartment, with its many elegancies and luxuries, and without any comment took from the merchant the paper he had given, but immediately presented him with another.

"This is your subscription to the Tract Society; have you any thing to add to it? You know how much it has been doing, and how much more it now desires to do, if Christians would only furnish means. Do you not feel called upon to add something to it?"

Mr. Z— was very uneasy under this appeal; but there was something in the still, mild manner of the stranger that restrained him; but he answered, that though he regretted it exceedingly, his circumstances were such that he could not this year conveniently add to any of his charities.

The stranger received back the paper without any reply, but immediately presented in its place the subscription to the Bible Society, and in a few clear and forcible words reminded him of its well-known claims, and again requested him to add something to his donation. Mr. Z— became impatient.

"Have I not said," he replied, "that I can do nothing more for any charity than I did last year? There seems to be no end to the calls in these days. At first there were only three or four objects presented, and the sums required moderate—now the objects increase every day, and call upon us for money; and all, after we have given once, want us to double, and treble, and quadruple our subscriptions. There is no end to the thing. We may as well stop in one place as another."

The stranger took back the paper, rose, and fixing his eye on his companion, said, in a voice that thrilled to his soul—

"One year ago to-night you thought that your daughter lay dying—you could not rest for agony—upon whom did you call that night?"

The merchant started and looked up—there seemed a change to have passed over the whole form of his visiter, whose eye was fixed on him with a calm, intense, penetrating expression that subdued him—he drew back, covered his face, and made no reply.

"Five years ago," said the stranger, "when you lay at the brink of the grave, and thought that if you died then, you would leave a family unprovided for, do you remember how you prayed? Who saved you then?"

The stranger drew yet nearer, and said, in a still lower and more impressive tone, "Do you remember fifteen years since, that time when you felt yourself so lost, so helpless, so hopeless, when you spent day and night in prayer; when you thought you would give the world for one hour's assurance that your sins were forgiven you? Who listened to you then?"

"It was my God and Saviour," said the merchant with a sudden burst of remorseful feeling, "O yes, it was he."

"And has he ever complained of being called on too often?" inquired the stranger in a voice of reproachful sweetness. "Say," added he, "are you willing to begin this night and ask no more of him, if he from this night will ask no more from you?"

"O never, never, never," said the merchant, throwing himself at his feet; but as he spake the words, the figure seemed to vanish, and he awoke with his whole soul stirred within him.

"O God and Saviour! what have I been doing!" he exclaimed. "Take all—take every thing—what is all that I have to what thou hast done for me?"—H. E. Beecher Stowe.

JACOB AND ESAU; OR, PROFESSIONS VS. PRACTICE.

Blind Isaac was sorely perplexed when his artful son brought him, with rough and hairy hands but silvery tones of persuasion, the savoury meat. We can readily imagine his doubtful countenance when he ended his investigations of the identity of his child by the remark—"The voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau."

The discrepancy thus observed is still often manifest, Jacob's voice and Esau's hands keeping up the same hypocritical alliance.

Here, for example, is a professor of piety who is eloquent in the praises of a pure Christianity; yet he himself is often found indulging in fleshly lusts which war against the soul. He is a firm defender of gospel institutions against infidel licentiousness, but nevertheless turns the Sabbath into a secular day sometimes, and absents himself from the sanctuary frequently. The voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau.

He believes in a benevolent, a self-denying religion; that "the silver and gold are the Lord's, and the cattle on a thousand hills." He says that the world is to be converted by Christian instrumentality, and a Christian he calls himself. But, then, if an agent is to plead the cause of perishing men in his pastor's pulpit, he finds it quite convenient to be on a journey, or peradventure asleep—at home. If funds are wanted to build or repair the broken down sanctuary of God; if the minister is famishing for lack of bread, or shivering for want of fuel, he who never heard a more eloquent sermon than that same minister's last, has an ague in his pocket, and dodges a subscription paper as though it were a sheriff's writ. Possibly, (there are such cases,) he has used the Lord's money for his own purposes, which he should have paid over promptly into its appropriate treasury, and it takes months of solicitation to extract it from his collapsed purse. Yet he talks as much as ever of the duty of liberality to the church, and prays devoutly—"Thy kingdom come." The voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau.

He believes in Christian love, that it is the secret of the church's prosperity and the right arm of its power upon the world. But he does not bridle his own tongue from taking up a suspicion against a brother and turning it into a scandal and a slander. The voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau.

He acknowledges parental responsibility, that he should train up his offspring for God and holiness; but he checks them not effectually from mingling with the frivolous and vain and dissipated votaries of folly and sin. He prays for their conversion, and decks them out for the ball-room, the theatre, the scenes of godless pleasure, which drown the soul in perdition. The voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau.

The reader may finish this contrast. But observe that neither the world nor God is deceived as was Isaac. He believed what the voice affirmed, in spite of the hairy hands. But God and men decide the other way. The voice is nothing, where the acts, the life, belie its declarations.

NOAH.

INFALLIBLE CURE.

The following method of "driving dull care away," was recommended by Howard, the celebrated philanthropist: "Set about doing good to somebody. Put on your hat, and go visit the sick and the poor; inquire into their wants and minister to them. Seek out the desolate and oppressed, and tell them of the consolations of religion. I have often tried this medicine, and always find it the best antidote for a heavy heart."

NO EFFORTS TO DO GOOD ARE LOST.

Ministers of the gospel, and Christians in general, often allow themselves to become disheartened at seeing no immediate fruits result from their efforts to advance the Redeemer's kingdom and promote the interests of their fellow-men. A more close consideration, however, of their labours of love, as connected with remote, if not with present results, would tend to lessen their discouragements, and prompt them to continued and increased efforts in the cause of their Divine Master. Every individual, whatever be his situation in life, has more or less influence which will be felt, and must, sooner or later, manifest itself in fruit corresponding with its nature, as certainly as there is any necessary connexion existing between cause and effect. Ministers and private Christians should, therefore, persevere in the midst of all apparent discouragements, in efforts to do good, resting assured that "in due season they shall reap, if they faint not."

Some one, of whose name we are ignorant, has illustrated the idea expressed above in the following beautiful language: "I have heard of some seeds which will sleep in the earth for ages, and I have read of the young of certain insects which lie in a state like death for eighty years together, and yet when the hand that scattered the seed had been mingled with the dust, and when the insect that had deposited the young had ended its flight for generations, the seed would come forth a forest of mighty trees, and the slumbering insect would wake to life, and become the mother of an endless multitude. And so it may be with us. We are scattering the seeds of knowledge, and piety, and immortality, but we see not the seed spring forth. Our instructions seem to be forgotten; the fruits of our liberality seem to have perished; and our favours appear to have been in vain. But be of good courage; the seed is still in the earth undecayed, and the time will come when it shall spring forth and yield a plenteous harvest. It is watched over by the God of heaven, and not a seed shall perish. The hand that scattered the seed may be withered, but the seed itself shall swell, and send forth its germ, and become a mighty tree. The voice that uttered the sermon may be silent, but others that received the truth shall come forth and declare it afresh to the generations that are yet unborn."—Weekly Messenger.

SUCCESSFUL MINISTERS.

"The old ministers," said Mr. Williams of Wern, "were not much better preachers than we are, and in many respects they were inferior to us; but there was an unction about their ministry, and success attendant upon it, that can now be but seldom seen. And what is the cause of the difference? They prayed more than we do. If we would prevail and 'have power with men,' we must first prevail and 'have power with God.' It was on his knees that Jacob became a 'prince;' and if we would become princes, we must be oftener and more importunate on our knees." He was very fond of relating the following anecdote respecting the late Rev. J. Griffith, of Carnarvon:—"Mr. Griffith was to preach one night in a farm-house, and he desired permission to retire to a private room before the service began. He remained there a considerable time after the congregation had assembled. As there was no sign of the preacher making his appearance, the good man of the house sent the servant to request him to come, as the people had been for some time waiting. On approaching the door, she heard what she supposed to be a conversation carried on by two persons in rather a subdued tone of voice. She stood listening at the door, and heard one say to the other, 'I will not go unless thou come with me.' The girl returned to her master, and said, 'There is some one with Mr. Griffith, and he tells him that he will not come unless the other accompany him. I did not hear the other make any reply, so I conclude he will not come from there to-night.' 'Yes, yes, he will,' said the master; 'and I'll warrant the other will come with him, if matters are as you represent them. We shall begin the service by singing and reading till the two come.' At length Mr. Griffith came, and the 'other' with him, and they had an extraordinary meeting that night. It proved the commencement of a powerful revival in the neighbourhood, and many were converted to God. 'Nothing, brethren,' Mr. Williams would say, by way of applying the anecdote, 'is necessary to render our ministry as efficient and successful as that of our fathers, but that we should be brought to the same spirit and frame of mind.'—London Magazine.

WHO ROB ORCHARDS?

In a certain village of the far west was an atheist. He was a great admirer of Robert Dale Owen and Fanny Wright; but he could see no excellence or beauty in the Sun of righteousness. This man, of course, never entered any place of worship. Indeed, in the fruit season, he was specially busy on the Sabbath, in defending his orchards from his great enemies, the woodpeckers, and the idle and profligate persons of the village, who, on that day, made unusually sad havoc among his apples and peaches. One day, while at work with his son-in-law—an atheist like himself, although a more kind and courteous gentleman—as the pastor of a congregation was passing, he very rudely thus accosted the minister:

"Sir, what is the use of your preaching? What good do you do by it? Why don't you teach these fellows here better morals? Why don't you tell them something about stealing, in your sermons, and keep them from robbing my orchards?"

To this the minister pleasantly replied, "My dear sir, I am sorry you are so annoyed, and I should most willingly read the fellows who rob your orchards a lecture on thieving; but the truth is, they are all so like you and the major here, I never get a chance!"

"Good, good!" replied the major, laughing; on which the elder atheist, blushing a little, and in an apologetical tone, said,

"Well, I believe it is true enough; it is not the church-going people that steal my apples."—American Messenger.

WITH WHAT SORT OF PEOPLE WE ARE SAFE.

Years ago, the writer was travelling with some six or seven persons, strangers to one another, and either nominal Christians or avowed unbelievers. One was a sea captain. He had many good qualities, characteristic of seafaring men; but then he was very profane, and was constantly sneering at religion, and uttering deistical sentiments.

During the day, the captain, in giving his history, had stated himself to be a widower; and that now, after a long absence, he was returning home, expecting to find his two daughters, his sole family, well and happy.

The writer, while replying to some ordinary slang of infidelity about the hypocrisy of religious people, at length addressed the seaman thus:

"Captain, you have two darling girls at home; their age renders you anxious: come, be candid; when you go to sea, do you leave your girls with your infidel friends, or with your Puritan neighbours?"

"Young man," replied the Captain, "I shall tell the truth; I always trust my girls with the Puritans. I do not feel as if they could be safe any where else."—Id.

POETRY.

CHRISTIAN AMBITION.

The public has just been favoured, from the Cincinnati press, with a volume of Poetry bearing the title of "A RHYME OF THE NORTH COUNTRY," having appended to the principal poem a number of other pieces of various length—by A. M. Gleeman.

The "Rhyme of the North Country" is replete with poetic sentiment and deep feeling, expressed in language and numbers corresponding with the subject. The author is no stranger to character, nor to the hidden emotions of the human breast. But as you might not deem the main subject to be perfectly accordant with the tenor of your Periodical, we say no more in reference to it, contenting ourselves with sending you one of the smallest scraps, which it is probable will, at a convenient time, find a place in your "Poet's Corner." It is believed the author needed not, as is thought to be the case, to have concealed his true name under that of an assumed one. The votaries of the Poetic muse will find him no stranger to her inspiration.

Z.

I could not wish the fortune mine,
To draw with wealth the wondering eye;
Nor with the little great to shine,
And be through life a living lie.

I would not have my brows adorned
With the triumphant warrior's bays,
To boast of that by thousands mourned—
A fame of mingled curse and praise.

But, could to every human tribe,
My labours renovation bring,
No dastard fear should circumscribe,
The triumphs of my peaceful King.

O! I would plant his standard where
The simoom from the tropic blows—
In Java's pestilential air,
And on the drear Kamschatkan snows.

Beyond Sahara's burning sand,
I'd bend the nations to his reign;
Not China's rampart should withstand
The progress of my vast campaign.

The north and south for him I'd claim;
Nor deem my course of conquest run,
Till songs of glory to his name
Should follow round with morning sun.

Such my ambition. I would see
All lands the home of ransomed men.
But should I die one soul to free;
Still life were richly bartered then.

MISCELLANEOUS COMMUNICATIONS.

ANNUAL RECEIPTS OF BENEVOLENT SOCIETIES.

In the London Missionary Register we find the following summary of the receipts of the principal benevolent societies in Europe and America. The table is interesting as presenting a view of the different kinds of means now in operation to promote the interests of Christianity, and the amount of pecuniary effort. We have inserted the names and receipts of some omitted societies, giving the latter in sterling money, for uniformity. The sum total, it may be noticed, is given also in our own currency.

PSALMODY IN INDIA.

In our last No. we mentioned that the psalmody used by our Missionaries in India was the most literal version of the Psalms of inspiration which they could procure. We have now the gratification of being able to submit to our readers the following specimens in the Hindustani language, with a literal translation by Mr. Campbell. It will be observed that while, as in our own metrical version, words and phrases are occasionally inserted, or modified, for the sake of poetical expression, the idea and the language of the sacred writer are preserved as far as practicable.

None of our readers, we suppose, are so ill informed as to believe that "a literal translation of David's Psalms" could be used in singing the praises of God, in consequence of the difference in Hebrew and English idioms, and the nature of modern poetry and music. The most that can be done, is to preserve carefully the idea, and the language as far as possible.

How gratifying is the reflection that the Psalms of inspiration are now used in India, instead of the unhallowed songs in praise of idols, which till lately were sung by every mouth.

In regard to pronunciation, it is only necessary to state, that the unaccented a is pronounced as u short; accented a as a in far: e as in there, and i as in machine.

1. Thanks—of thanks the song sing ;
Let all the nations sing ;
Into the presence of the Lord go,
Let all, even all worship.
2. Jehovah alone is Lord of all ;
Know him indeed even so ;
He alone has created us ;
On him place all your thoughts.
3. His workmanship then we all are ;
We did not make ourselves ;
We are the sheep of his flock ;
He feeds us on pasture.
4. Into his hall of audience let us go ;
There let us give thanks ;
Praise in his courts let us make,
Let us be ever thankful.
5. The God of goodness Jehovah is ;
He is for ever merciful ;
His truth also is ever enduring,
It will remain to eternity.

(God the Shepherd of his people.)

1. God Jehovah is my shepherd,
He gives me all necessary things,
He leadeth into green pastures.
He bestows upon me rest.
2. He gives me to drink living water ;
He refresheth and restoreth my soul ;
He leadeth me in the ways of righteousness ;
Thus he magnifies his own name.
3. Though I should walk in the shadow of death,
Yet will I not fear mine enemies ;
Thou thyself art then with me ;
Thy power is my constant support.
4. Thou art spreading my table cloth ;
Thou art furnishing spiritual blessings
Mine enemies are all beholding,
Being helpless, they are greatly perplex'd
5. Thou art pouring oil upon my head,
On me the Holy Spirit is flowing.
My cup of blessing is full.
Thou art giving joy and gladness.
6. Then mercy and goodness are united,
And all my life continuing with me,
In thy presence I will ever dwell,
And thee behold to eternity.

THE APPOINTMENT OF A SCRIPTURE READER BY THE SESSION OF 1ST REF. PRES. CHURCH, PHILADA.

In our last No. we mentioned that Mr. W. S. Darragh had been appointed by the Session of the 1st Reformed Presbyterian church in this city, to act as Scripture Reader. As the subject possesses great and general interest, we publish the report of the Committee of Session in regard to it, and also Mr. Darragh's Report of his proceedings since the commencement of his labours in this city. It will be gratifying to all who take pleasure in the success of efforts to do good, to learn that the most gratifying and encouraging results have already followed this attempt to glorify God and benefit man. By the kindness of its proprietor, the Union School House, in Christian street, west of Ninth street, has been obtained, and public worship is regularly maintained on the morning and afternoon of the Sabbath. The congregation is already very respectable, and the Sabbath school quite flourishing. A prayer meeting on Sabbath evening is attended by a large number of both old and young, and altogether there is much reason to believe that the Divine approbation is vouchsafed, and that great good will be accomplished.

Report of the Committee to which was referred the subject of employing a Scripture Reader.

The Committee appointed by Session to suggest some plan of operations in regard to the object stated, having been prevented by various circumstances from giving in their report previously, now beg leave to submit the following:

The city of Philadelphia, with the adjoining districts, contains a population of more than 300,000 persons. The number of churches and preaching stations of all denominations, within these limits, is about 170, of which at least 20 are such as cannot be considered evangelical, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men, and drowning men's souls in perdition. The remainder, 150, is all the provision made for the public worship of ALMIGHTY God, by the large population of 300,000 inhabitants; so that if each church could contain 1000 persons, which is by far too large an estimate, there would be accommodations for only one-half of the population, and even those disposed to take the most favourable view of the moral condition of this community, cannot suppose that as many as 150,000 even occasionally attend the services of the sanctuary. The remainder, therefore, disregarding the claims and commands of their Maker, are perishing. What a reflection, that so many are going down to eternal death within hearing of the sound of salvation.

Do we need to ask how the Sabbath is spent by these persons? We must all have obtained by our own observations some knowledge on this subject. The crowds which traverse the roads leading to places of public resort—the multitudes who frequent the taverns—the groups of young men to be found at so many corners, and before every engine house—the throngs of children who are playing in the streets and alleys, with those who profane the day of sacred rest by idleness at home, or by social visits, go far to answer the question, and show us what is the work the Christian has to do for the welfare of those immediately around him, and how important and how vast it is.

We may, however, consider the class of society which neglects the sanctuary more in detail. A part of it consists of men who have never made any profession of religion, and who have, probably, been brought up from infancy in ignorance of gospel truth, and habitual and entire disregard of religious duties, who yet, if they were kindly instructed and counselled, might be induced to listen to the word of life. Another part is composed of persons who have been educated in the church, and perhaps have themselves named the name of CHRIST, but who have, for the time, made shipwreck of their faith, and abandoned themselves to sin. Such are numerous, and as her backsliding children, should be the church's especial care. Others are immigrants from foreign countries who reach our shores ignorant of the provision made for the supply of the ordinances, and not knowing to what church to go, often fall into the meshes of the net which those who are so busy to proselyte to error are spreading around them, while very many of them form, by delay and hesitation, a habit of neglect and inattention to religion, so as to become in a short time unworthy to be considered its professors. Many again, are the children of poverty, whose hearts, troubled with the care of the present world, are so much occupied as to prevent their turning their attention to the vastly more important concerns of the world to come, while, if disposed to go to church, their tattered garments make them ashamed to appear where they fear some might hold them in derision. A number, too, are afflicted in such a manner as to preclude their appearance in the sanctuary even when they desire it, and full, it may be, of anxiety about eternity, they appear at the judgment seat of CHRIST without ever having been visited by a Christian counsellor, or heard what they must do to be saved. A vast multitude are the young who will soon be the moving and ruling spirits of the community, and who will, therefore, affect most powerfully the future welfare of the church, and the comfort of her members.

Has the church any concern with these persons? Much every way. The Redeemer certainly referred to such when he commanded his servants to "go out quickly into the streets and lanes of the city, and bring in the poor, the maimed, the halt, and the blind;" and again, to "go out into the highways and hedges, and compel them to come in;" and again, to "bid as many as they could find, both bad and good." It is not simply those who come to hear the gospel of their own accord who should be attended to, but CHRIST, made known by his servants, "is to be found of them that seek him not." The church, for her own welfare, for the good of man, both in this world and in eternity, for the glory of God, should make the effort to bring in those who disregard the Sabbath and the sanctuary, and who are found, without scarcely any exception, to be very careless in reference to moral duties, both to their God and to their fellow beings. Need we wonder that there is such a general disregard of law and order, and benevolence and equity, especially among the young, when we think that such vast numbers of our fellow citizens never hear the instructions delivered from the Holy Word of God.

We are sure that all of us feel the importance of this subject, and are inclined to do something in the discharge of our duty. It is true that this work belongs to the ministry, and more especially to the eldership of the church. But the time of the former is so much occupied with public duties, and attention to the members of the church, that neither their strength of body, nor period of labour, allows them to attend to it properly, while their official character often prevents their obtaining ready access and confidential intercourse. The eldership, too, having little leisure to devote to it, since their ordinary avocations require so much of their time. There is need, therefore, of some special instrumentalities for the accomplishment of the object. This is found in the Scripture Reader, an office which was authorized by the church of Scotland in the beginning of the Reformation, as required by her circumstances then, and which, in more modern times, has been revived with great advantage. Already the Session has, informally, commissioned Mr. Darragh to act in this capacity, and he has been labouring under their direction for the past three months with great assiduity, discretion, and success. A large number of children have been brought into the Sabbath school; a considerable number of poor have been visited and relieved; many have been induced to attend church, and some to connect themselves with it by a formal profession. Prayer meetings have been established, and a place of public worship, in a very destitute portion of the city, has been opened, and already a flourishing Sabbath school has been organized. Mr. Darragh's appointment has not yet been brought under any regular rules, and it is for this purpose that we submit this report. Devoting, as he does, his entire time to this work, in connexion with the prosecution of his Theological studies, and having abandoned the attempt to obtain support by other means, Mr. Darragh should have such a salary as will sustain him comfortably. We have thought that $200 was the smallest sum which could be offered. This, we suggest, might be raised in the following manner:—Let the Session contribute from its funds $50; the Sabbath School Association, $50; and the remainder be raised by a special effort on behalf of Domestic Missions, or in any other way which may be thought best. Let Mr. Darragh receive from the Session a formal charge, and also frequent instructions. He should present a monthly report at each stated meeting of session, and frequently consult with the pastors and elders, and receive from them advice and direction. In the mean time, the Session expect that Mr. D. will prosecute his studies with a view to the ministry, and they feel warranted and called upon to express the high approbation which his zeal, industry, and good sense in the performance of his duty, justly entitle him to receive.

Respectfully submitted by

THE COMMITTEE.

INSTRUCTIONS.*

To you, Mr. William S. Darragh, the Session of the First Reformed Presbyterian Church in the city of Philadelphia, affectionately address the following instructions. And,

1st. As to Doctrine. Recognising you as a student of Theology in regular standing, and under the care of the higher judicatories, all that Session deem needful to say on this subject is, that when you are called to speak to men on religious things, your doctrine shall be the plain, elementary truths of the gospel, drawn immediately from the word of God, using, when you may find the minds of your auditors prepared for it, the Confession and Catechisms of the Reformed Presbyterian church. These truths you will exhibit according to your discretion, not by way of authority, for this belongs exclusively to the Christian ministry, but by way of counsel, advice, and mutual conversation, as is due from one sinful immortal man to another. Seeking, in all that you do, the blessing of the Spirit of all grace, whose it is to make Divine truth effectual in the conversion and sanctification of sinners.

* The following instructions, with the exception of local allusions, were addressed by the Session of Dr. McLeod's congregation to their Scripture Reader, Mr. R. A. Hill. Being considered so excellent and suitable as to supersede the necessity of any thing different, they have been adopted as the instructions by which Mr. Darragh is to regulate his operations.

2. As to your mode of operation. You are further instructed—To employ a reasonable portion of time each day in seeking out children for the Sabbath school of the church, and repeating the visits to those found, in endeavouring to discover strangers and immigrants who may know something of religion, and advising such to give attention to Christian duties, and especially to the public ordinances, leading them, if possible, to the Reformed Presbyterian church, where accommodations will be cheerfully provided for their hearing the gospel. And, further, in reading the Scriptures to, and praying with and for the ignorant, careless, and immoral, and urging upon them, also, an attendance on the sanctuary, in our own department of the church of Jesus Christ, Session also trust that you will feel it to be your privilege and duty to counsel and persuade all whom you may find to need it, to respect the holy Sabbath, and abstain from any thing that would be inconsistent with its entire devotion to the service of God.

In carrying out the above, Session would also recommend that you attend the various praying societies in the congregation, and do all in your power to induce other professing Christians to do so likewise—and, further, that you keep a diary of your general proceedings, and thus prepare for making a monthly report to the Session of your progress in the work of the Lord.

3. As to the field. All that Session deem needful to say at present on this subject, and until further experience has been obtained, is, that your field of operation is the city of Philadelphia in general, but especially those parts which are most destitute.

4. As to co-operation with the benevolent and other voluntary associations around us. On this subject Session deem it sufficient to say that they expect you to co-operate with the Bible, Tract, Sabbath school, and other societies, and the agents they may have in the field, on terms of Christian affection and courtesy, lending to them all the aid in your power, and receiving from them all such assistance as they may be disposed to tender, and as may be consistent with your own obligations to receive.

With these brief directions, and trusting much to your own Christian discretion, the Session commend you, and the entire cause they seek to promote, to the favour and blessing of the Divine and only Head of the church.

REPORT OF THE SCRIPTURE READER OF THE 1ST REF. PRES. CHURCH, PHILADELPHIA.

"Go out quickly into the streets and lanes of the city."—THE SAVIOUR.

"Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty." In every effort to obtain this boon, the Christian participates; in every appropriate celebration of the triumph of liberty, the Christian rejoices. During the short period we have laboured under your direction as a Scripture Reader, in this place, we think we have seen the principle to some extent developed, that "liberty to the captive, and the opening of the prison doors to them that are bound," is proclaimed in the gospel. This, we trust, to some extent, will be demonstrated by the following facts, which we would respectfully report as the result of the blessing of God on our humble labours during the last three months.

When employed by you, three months since, my first labours were directed to children that had previously attended our Sabbath school, but for some time had been absent. Our superintendent directed me to upwards of fifty children of this class. Of these little wanderers, about thirty promised to return, and after frequent visitations have been induced to attend with a good degree of regularity. My endeavours to bring in children who had never before attended our school, or any other Sabbath school of an evangelical kind, have also been accompanied with a good degree of success. In this department I have visited a population of some thousands. Among these people I have witnessed much degradation, misery, and vice. I have succeeded, I trust, in rescuing some little immortals as brands from the burning of ignorance, wicked example on the Sabbath, and almost every unhallowed association. About eighty children of this character have been introduced into our Sabbath school, the majority of whom have given very encouraging attendance. I would be doing violence here to my own feelings, as well as injustice to the very benevolent members of our most efficient Dorcas Society, if I should omit to mention that about thirty of these children, and nearly as many grown persons, have been supplied by them with comfortable clothing. The labours of love performed by the members of that society, are worthy of all commendation. If the members of Session, and of the congregation, could but see the big tear of gratitude roll down over the furrowed cheek of squalid misery, in consequence of the benevolence of this Society, as I have done, I am sure they would appreciate highly the value of the many sacrifices made by those who devote their time and labour to this work, and I am sure that appreciation would be demonstrated by corresponding contributions to this very laudable object.

In the population from which these destitute children have been gathered, I have come in contact constantly with the parents, to whom, as well as all others I met that were ignorant or out of the way, I endeavoured to make myself useful, in presenting, to the best of my ability, the truths of the gospel—salvation through Jesus Christ. The neighbourhood in which I have principally laboured is composed chiefly of Irish immigrants, some who have been professors of religion in our churches at home, some who have been Roman Catholics, and many, by far the greater part, indeed, who have not given any attention at all to religion, but cared for none of these things. I must here acknowledge the seasonable advice and instruction that I constantly received from our beloved pastors, and most efficient and devoted Sabbath School superintendent. All cases of interest I met were immediately reported and several members of session have not been strangers with me in this dark place of the earth—warning the careless, soothing the disconsolate, and directing those who have no help of man at all to that friend that sticketh closer than a brother. By these labours upwards of thirty persons, some of them the parents of the children already alluded to, have been induced to attend our own church, and three of these have joined the communion of the church. A number of them propose joining with us, if spared, on the next occasion. Is it not to be regretted that so many of these persons who have left the home of their fathers have heretofore, from want of such an effort as we are now attempting to make, been suffered to wander so long from the church of God, and whilst they have enjoyed the other blessings of this free and happy land, have been permitted to forget, in a measure, the only bright spot in the land of their nativity, the religion of their fathers?

About two months since it was deemed advisable that a prayer meeting should be organized in the neighbourhood of Federal Street, above Broad. An attempt was made. Mr. Stuart spent much time and labour with me here, but the prospect appearing somewhat discouraging, it was finally resolved that we should try another field. We next selected the district of Moyamensing, and accordingly made an attack on Buena Vista.* Here we have met with most flattering success. Providence seemed to smile on our endeavours. And in the results we have, we trust, many pleasing evidences that "God is with us."—Above fifty persons, altogether, young and old, attend the prayer meeting that has now, for upwards of two months been regularly held here every Sabbath evening. The people who attend these meetings appear to take much interest in the exercises, and are often apparently deeply impressed. For the regular order of the exercises of these meetings we have not yet adopted any definite plan. We have, however given particular attention to the children, and appointed lessons to be prepared by them through the week in the Shorter Catechism and Psalms. The interest communicated to the meeting by the children may be inferred from a single fact which I shall here relate. A few evenings since, a little girl whom I had brought to the Sabbath school about six weeks before, and whose parents had not previously attended any church, and whom I had also brought out to hear some of Mr. Campbell's addresses to children, on the subject of foreign missions, a few evenings since rose in the meeting, and said she had a missionary purse there she wished to have filled. The purse was taken and handed round, and the sum of $4.92 was collected from the people there on that occasion. We take advantage of the kind Christian friends who meet with us from time to time, and endeavour to employ them to the best account. The whole affair is conducted under the immediate supervision and direction of our pastors and the superintendent of the Sabbath school. Several members of session attend these meetings, and labour with me during the week, as they have opportunity. I must here acknowledge, also, the very kind co-operation of some of the students of the theological class. Since the opening of the seminary the students in attendance, particularly the two brethren who have asked the church to send them far hence unto the Gentiles, and another brother, (Mr. Gordon,) who laboured, as appears from certain written reports from the church with which he was connected in Ireland, in a similar field there, with zeal and great success, and who was employed during the last summer by the church in New York. In these labours brothers H. and W. have added another item to that consistent testimony which they have before given, that whilst their hearts yearn upon the heathen that are perishing abroad, they are not insensible to the destitution of the heathen at home, and whilst they have given you in these labours a demonstration of their willingness to come up to the help of the Lord against the mighty, in that field which is the world, we trust they have also had here, in Buena Vista, an earnest of that harvest which we hope they are appointed by the Head of the church to reap from the scorching sands of India. And we trust that the seed they have here sown, both in their personal conversation and advice, and also in their more public appeals and exhortations, may yet wave with prosperous fruit, when they shall be standing on a far distant shore, and that on the great harvest day they may have the inexpressible delight of seeing the fruit of Buena Vista, and the fruit of Northern India gathered into the same celestial granary.

We met in this neighbourhood an agent of the Tract Society. He has co-operated with us kindly.

We have now a preaching station established in that part of the city, in Christian Street, below Tenth. A house has been procured which can accommodate about one hundred and thirty persons. We have had preaching there for the last three weeks: nearly one hundred people attend regularly. We have also a Sabbath school now organized in this room: upwards of forty children attend. Notwithstanding these gratifying evidences of success, still we labour under many difficulties, and meet with many discouragements. One great difficulty is want of assistance in conducting the Sabbath School.* We therefore hope that the members of our congregation may be induced to imitate the worthy example of our brethren in a similar effort, in a neighbouring city, where, during the last summer, the labours of the scripture reader have been crowned with such abundant success. "The harvest truly is great, but the labourers are few."

W. S. DARRAGH.

[From the New York Observer.]

TIMES OF REFRESHING: GOOD NEWS.

In the Observer for December 11th, an article appears, headed "Interesting Communion Season," and describing a joint celebration of the Lord's supper by the churches in connexion with the third Presbytery of New York. After referring to a variety of interesting statistics, and very properly lamenting the low state of religion in our land, one of the reverend speakers is represented as saying, "every evangelical denomination in the land has, within the last year, lost in numbers. More have been removed by death than have been added to them."

Whether the speaker has been correctly reported we cannot say, but we are persuaded that the assertion is too broad, and needs much qualification. And if the fact can be shown to be directly the reverse, in regard to some of the evangelical churches of our country, it ought to be known, to the praise of God and the encouragement of his people.

There are, Messrs. Editors, several Christian and Presbyterian denominations in our country to whom none will deny the name of "evangelical," and who, we presume, were not intended to be included in the remark on which we are animadverting, though it does, in fact, comprehend them. Among these are the Reformed Presbyterian, the Associate, and the Associate Reformed Churches. The congregations of these bodies are found scattered over the country, in the villages and in the large cities, and sending forth probably their five hundred ministers to preach the truth and labour for the salvation of the world. Their movement is indeed less noisy than that of some other bodies, and they are not so frequent in the exhibition of their statistical reports, but they are undoubtedly making an impression for good on the communities in the midst of which they are found; and they are not without evidence, from time to time, of the presence and approbation of the Spirit of all grace.

* We are happy to learn that, since this report was presented, a number of well qualified and devoted teachers have been obtained, though still some are needed.

It is, for example, a fact in relation to the Reformed Presbyterian Church, that during the past year its accessions have been unusually large. And this whether coming from the world, or from other departments of the church of Christ. More calls have been made for the preaching of the gospel in destitute places, a larger number of new congregations have been organized in city and country, and more success enjoyed in missionary labours than has existed for years before. At recent communions, fifty-five were added to Dr. Wylie's Church, in Philadelphia, forty-six to the third Reformed Presbyterian Church in that city; and fifty-one, making seventy, during the current year, to Dr. McLeod's church, New York. Among all these were persons of thirty, forty, sixty, and nearly seventy years of age, coming out of the world, and by a public profession declaring themselves on the side of Jesus Christ, two of them, with their families, receiving the sacrament of baptism.

Seeing and lamenting over the moral destitution around them, and much of which they could not reach by the ordinary ministrations, the session of Dr. McLeod's church determined on a special effort for bringing men within the reach of the gospel. They employed a qualified person as a colporteur or scripture reader, to be supported by the congregation. He was sent forth, under definite instructions, and has been labouring successfully for nearly eight months in his vocation. His object has been to go to the most destitute, and by Bible and Tract distribution, by conversation and prayer, endeavour to induce men to give heed to the gospel, and especially to come within its reach as preached on the Lord's day, in the public sanctuary. He has co-operated with the agents of the various benevolent societies, and given his aid to them, whenever they came in contact with him. The experiment, thus far, has been decidedly encouraging, and the influence of the effort on the church itself has been animating and reviving. There are means of revival to the church, as well as of conversion to the world. Among the best of these are plain, affectionate religious conversation, addressed directly to the individual; the simple, pointed preaching of the word; and prayer, all-availing prayer. Let Israel do her duty, call for the "Restorer," and he will come to bless and save. The gentle dew will revive the flower, as well as the rain that comes from the alarming thunder cloud. If there be refreshing to any "evangelical" body in the land brought to his notice, we know that the author of the remark on which we have been animadverting, will rejoice with us. N.

ECCLESIASTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

LICENSURE OF MESSRS. HILL AND WOODSIDE.

We have the pleasure of recording, for the general information of the church, the licensure of these two young brethren, who, as our readers are aware, are candidates for the foreign missionary field. Mr. Hill was licensed on the 8th of December, by the Northern Reformed Presbytery, having delivered, with approbation, the usual pieces of trial. Mr. Woodside received licensure from the Philadelphia Reformed Presbytery, at a meeting held on the 26th of January, the usual trial discourses assigned to him having been sustained. Both these brethren have since been actively employed in preaching to various congregations in this city, and their labours have been very acceptable and useful.

REV. WILLIAM WILSON.

It is proper that the relations of this gentleman to the Reformed Presbyterian Church should be known and understood. The facts of the case are as follows: At the semi-annual meeting of the Reformed Presbytery of Ohio, in October last, he applied for a certificate, expressly with a view to obtain admission into the Pro-Re-Nata presbytery, then in session in the vicinity of the other, and to which he had actually applied before the Presbytery of Ohio had met. The Presbytery directed a certificate of character to be given. It was at once prepared. Mr. Wilson received it, and left the court, whereupon his name was erased from the roll of members. It would seem, however, that the presbytery to which he went were not prepared to receive him, and he did not obtain admission as a member.

When the Ohio Presbytery adjourned, it was to meet again in Xenia, about a month subsequently. At this meeting Mr. Wilson was present, witnessed the constitution, and the reception of some communications from the brethren in Cincinnati, and then suddenly left the house. Presbytery, at that meeting, declared the congregation of Cincinnati vacant, and directed one of its members to preach in Cincinnati, and declare the fact. This was done, accordingly, and the pulpit has since been regularly supplied by Presbytery. It is also a matter of public notoriety that, since that period, Mr. Wilson proceeded to dispense the ordinance of the Lord's supper, in a private house, to some twelve or fifteen persons, which, we presume, constitute the number of his present adherents. The Cincinnati congregation, retaining their former place of worship, adhere to the regular judicatories of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, and Mr. Wilson is in no sense in connexion with that body. We feel it dutiful to declare these facts, as they have come from a member of the Ohio Presbytery, and leave them to speak for themselves.

FOREIGN MISSIONS.

REFLEX INFLUENCE OF MISSIONARY EXERTIONS.

MESSRS. EDITORS—It is not my intention to enter into an elaborate argument to prove the proposition that the more the church does for the heathen, the more she will be enabled to do at home. I take it for granted that when our church considered the condition of India, she took "pity on the poor,"—that when she resolved to send two additional missionaries there, she made a loan to God. I will lay before you a few facts to illustrate the fulfilment to us of the promise "That which he hath given will he repay again." A year ago it was feared by many that any additional exertion for India would cripple seriously and dangerously our efforts at home. The offer made was, however, finally accepted. What has been the consequence? Has Heaven frowned upon us? Have our stakes been weakened, our cords shortened, or the curtains of our habitation contracted? Has the door of usefulness been shut upon us at home? No. When has our church enjoyed more gratifying evidences of prosperity? Hear the calls that are made upon us for the ordinances from every corner of the land! And that the opening of this door is the fulfilment of the promise we have quoted cannot be denied. We gave to the poor. We set apart two missionaries for the heathen; and now, before they have yet left our shores, God has thus paid us in advance far more than the interest of our loan. But this is not all. There have been, during the last year, particularly in the east, unusually large additions to the communion of the church. If these additional calls had been made upon us, and yet no more labourers sent into the field, the path of duty might have appeared to some somewhat obscure; but when we find that there have been more licentiates in the church since the last meeting of Synod than for many years before, and when we find that there never were as many students in the Theological Seminary before, since the organization of the institution; and when we hear from the professors that the Seminary was never, at any previous time, in so flourishing a condition; and, farther, when we mingle among the students themselves, and perceive an unusual degree of activity, zeal and enterprise; when we find them, without a single exception, engaged in the labours of the Sabbath school; not only attending the various praying societies of our congregations in the city, but also going out, as they have opportunity, and, in connexion with their professors and others, labouring to establish societies and hold prayer meetings among the poor and destitute of our city; when we witness this state of things on the present occasion, who cannot see in these facts an illustration of the assertion of the wise man, "He that hath pity on the poor lendeth unto the Lord, and that which he hath given will he pay him again?"

REV. MR. CAMPBELL.

The Rev. Mr. Campbell, being desirous to visit the churches in our connexion as extensively as possible before his return to India, in July next, has made the following arrangements for his tour. As it is absolutely impossible to appropriate a Sabbath to each place, the most prominent points have been selected, and others will be visited as time and circumstances will permit. Respected brethren whose congregations may not be mentioned will please propose such arrangements in reference to services during the week, as will not conflict with the general plan. These suggestions can be addressed to Mr. Campbell according to his location at particular times, as stated in the plan, and, if at all possible, he will concur with them.

THE PROSPECT.

We have great pleasure in stating that the prospect that the church will be able to send out and sustain the young brethren who have offered themselves for the missionary service appears to be encouraging. In New York and also in this place, Mr. Campbell has obtained liberal subscriptions. Although his operations have been confined as yet to these two places, a large amount of the sum necessary has already been subscribed. It is hoped that the churches yet unvisited will be found willing, as we feel sure they are able, to make up what is yet needed. We are aware that the claims made upon them for their own immediate wants, are great and frequent; but we are confident that they will be in no sense whatever losers, by any contributions for this object. Let them be neither barren nor unfruitful in the work of the Lord. Remember, brethren, the language of the apostle Paul, "But this I say, he which soweth sparingly, shall reap also sparingly; and he which soweth bountifully, shall reap also bountifully. Every man according as he purposeth in his heart, so let him give; not grudgingly, or of necessity: for God loveth a cheerful giver. And God is able to make all grace abound toward you; that ye, always having all sufficiency in all things, may abound to every good work: (As it is written, He hath dispersed abroad; he hath given to the poor: his righteousness remaineth for ever. Now, he that ministereth seed to the sower, both minister bread for your food, and multiply your seed sown, and increase the fruits of your righteousness;) Being enriched in every thing to all bountifulness, which causeth through us thanksgiving to God. For the administration of this service not only supplieth the want of the saints, but is abundant also by many thanksgivings unto God."

PROCEEDINGS OF A PUBLIC MEETING HELD AT THE CLOSE OF A COURSE OF LECTURES, BY REV. J. R. CAMPBELL.

The Rev. James R. Campbell having completed his regular course of Lectures on Foreign Missions, a public meeting was held in the First Reformed Presbyterian Church in this city, on the evening of December 14th, 1847, in order to afford, to any who desired it, an opportunity to propose such inquiries as were connected with the subjects discussed in the Lectures, and calculated to increase an interest in the cause which they were designed to promote. On motion, Joseph R. Dickson, Esq., was called to the chair, and George H. Stuart appointed secretary. The Rev. Dr. Lord then opened the meeting with prayer.

A large number of questions which had been addressed to him were then read by Mr. Campbell, and such replies given as afforded much valuable and interesting information. The manner of discussion was novel; the statements made perspicuous, full, and very satisfactory, and the whole exercises commanded the close attention of a large and intelligent assembly.

Mr. Campbell having at length concluded his remarks, the following resolutions were presented, and unanimously adopted, the movers accompanying them by appropriate observations.

Resolution No. 1,—Presented by Rev. J. B. Dales.

RESOLVED, That we have listened with great satisfaction to the lectures which have been delivered by Rev. Mr. Campbell, and that we tender to him our thanks for the instruction we have received, presented in so interesting and eloquent a manner.

No. 2,—Presented by Rev. J. T. Cooper.

RESOLVED, That while we know that though a "Paul may plant and an Apollos water, yet it is God alone who can give the increase," we feel grateful that the missionaries who are labouring in India and in other countries appear to be so worthy of the confidence of the Christian church for the industry, integrity, prudence, and zeal which they display, and that we humbly yet confidently trust that their self-denying and laborious exertions will be blessed by the accompanying influences of the HOLY SPIRIT.

No. 3,—Presented by Rev. Andrew Bower.

RESOLVED, That the gospel is the only remedy for sinful man, and that the condition of the heathen world demonstrates the necessity of united and persevering efforts to spread it among all people.

No. 4,—Presented by Rev. Dr. Crawford.

RESOLVED, That the statements made in the lectures delivered by Rev. Mr. Campbell appear to us well calculated to increase the interest which the Christian church should feel in the work, and we trust will cause all who have heard them to be more zealous and more active in the service of CHRIST.

No. 5,—Presented by Rev. Dr. Lord.

RESOLVED, That the progress which has been made in the missionary work is a reason for humble gratitude to God, and should encourage the Christian church to continue and increase its efforts.

No. 6,—Presented by Rev. T. W. J. Wyllie.

RESOLVED, That the accounts we have received of the progress of the work in India give us good reason to believe that the efforts made by the church are approved by the great King and Head of Zion, and that his blessing, to which alone all the increase is owing, has been vouchsafed to the exertions of the church, however unworthy and feeble they have been.

No. 7,—Presented by G. H. Stuart.

RESOLVED, That having heard, with great satisfaction, the instructive and interesting course of lectures delivered by Rev. J. R. Campbell, we hope he may be induced to repeat them in other places, and we would express our belief that they will tend very much to promote the cause of missions; and we therefore commend them to the respectful attention of the Christian community.

RESOLVED, That the proceedings of this meeting be published in the religious periodicals.

The meeting was then adjourned by singing the 133d Psalm, and the apostolic benediction.

Signed, G. H. STUART, Sec.

DOMESTIC MISSIONS.

NARRATIVE OF A MISSIONARY TOUR.

(Concluded.)

I proceeded in the beginning of September to the Northern Presbytery. There are a number of vacancies here—I first visited New Fane, a village some miles north of Lockport. It might be considered as a missionary station, and with frequent supplies of the gospel, it is probable that some good might be effected.

I next visited Redfield, a station recently formed. It is situated about thirty miles north by west of Rome, in Oswego Co. It is chiefly a New England settlement. The people are a reading community, and as a consequence, are generally intelligent. They wish to know what is the truth, and are fond of inquiring into it, and when convinced, cheerfully embrace it. This place was brought into notice by means of a member of the Reformed Presbyterian church in New York, who removed thither with his family, designing to make a permanent settlement; encouraged by his noble perseverance and successful enterprise, a few more families are about to remove thither also, so that with this little society as a foundation, we think that an interesting congregation may soon be built up.

I next proceeded to Lisbon. Here, amid all the severe reverses which that congregation has endured, the prospects are still promising. Let a minister be settled among them, and success must follow. Besides, this place is destined to become an important location, in a commercial point of view: a railroad has been chartered, and is now under contract, which is to extend from Boston to Ogdensburgh—it will pass within five miles of the church, and will, therefore, give a new impetus to business, and enhance the value of property: it will induce enterprising men to settle in that country, and should, therefore, command the attention of those interested in the welfare of the church to forward its interests as much as possible. From Lisbon, I proceeded down the St. Lawrence by steamboat, from Ogdensburgh to Montreal, on my route to Ryegate, Vt. I enjoyed a pleasant sail down that beautiful river. The wide-spread prevalence of the ship-fever, in Montreal and other places adjacent, has prevented much public travel, which has been seriously felt by those who keep places for entertainment, or obtain support by steamboats which ply upon this noble river. It would sicken the heart to hear the tales of poverty and distress and the numerous deaths in the most trying circumstances.

From Montreal, I took a steamboat across the St. Lawrence, where a train of cars was in readiness to carry the passengers from La Prairie to St. John's, a distance of about 21 miles. At the latter place we entered another steamboat, and enjoyed a delightful sail up Lake Champlain until I arrived at Burlington, Vt., the seat of Vermont University; which is at present in a flourishing condition under the supervision of the Rev. Dr. Wheeler. I set out from Burlington at about one o'clock on a cold morning, about the close of October, across the Green Mountains. I sat on the box with the driver, which seat I was desirous to secure that I might enjoy the delightful prospect of the picturesque scenery. The morning star, the bright precursor of day, was shedding his silvery beams upon us, and lit up the darkness of night; nor did he leave us until he committed us to the advancing beams of "rosy-fingered morn." It would require the pencil of the painter, or the pen of the poet, to portray the grandeur of the scenery as it burst into view before us. Immense heights were constantly in our view for many miles. We followed the course of the Onion and Waits rivers, sometimes nearly on a level with us, and at other times rolling down in deep ravines, hundreds of feet below us. We arrived at the town of Haverhill, 80 miles from Burlington, at about six o'clock, P. M. This place is noted for a young ladies' Seminary, and as the central point of stage travelling; but above all, it is celebrated for the picturesque scenery which surrounds it: it is situated in a sort of amphitheatre, having the Connecticut river on the west, and the Moushillock Mountains on the east, stretching out their spurs on the north and south. I proceeded on the next morning at four o'clock for Ryegate, 15 miles north, where I preached five Sabbaths. The congregation is in a good condition; it is ripe for a settlement, and the people are desirous to have the gospel preached statedly amongst them. With the regular administration of the ordinances, they would become sufficiently strong to sustain a pastor.

Thus I have endeavoured to present a brief sketch of the condition of our church as it presented itself to my mind—and I would now, in conclusion, avail myself of the occasion to present a few remarks of a general character. And first, I would remark, that all those places which have been visited, might soon be built up into flourishing congregations, if they had the means of grace duly administered. It is true that some would not be able at first to make provision for the entire support of their ministers; but in the vicinity of all these congregations, there are many individuals who would willingly contribute to the support of the gospel, and perhaps unite with the church if they saw a favourable prospect of the continuance of the ordinances. Yet it is evident that some means should be employed, whereby feeble congregations throughout the whole church should receive assistance to enable them to provide a sufficient support for their pastors. An effective Home Missionary Society, therefore, must be brought into operation; this must be brought to bear upon the interests of our feeble congregations, and I am sure that every man among us who has any regard for the extension of our Zion, the city of our solemnities, every man who loves his Master and his Master's cause more than he loves his gold and his silver, will contribute freely, heartily, and liberally for this noble object. If such a course is pursued, our church will soon take a stand among the other churches of the Reformation worthy of her character, and worthy of the noble testimony which she professes to maintain. These places will not require this aid for a long time; in a few years they will be able sufficiently to maintain themselves, and also to contribute liberally for the support of others who may be in such circumstances as they now are. Nor will this necessarily interfere with the cause of Foreign Missions, since all who are willing to contribute to the cause of Domestic Missions will find means to sustain the former. The church has abundance of means within herself; her resources are extensive, and she only needs to draw forth her dormant energies to carry forward all these noble purposes—it is the cause of God—the truth is mighty, and must prevail; and thus the Reformed Presbyterian Church will be enabled to carry forward the interests of Zion in the introduction of that period when the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ, and the glory of the Lord shall fill the earth as the waters fill the sea.

A LICENTIATE.

Notices of New Publications.

Sketches of Scottish Church History, embracing the period from the Reformation to the Revolution. By Rev. Thomas McCrie. Fourth Edition. Issued by the Committee of the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland for the publication of the works of the Scottish Reformers and Divines. Edinburgh. 2 vols. 12mo. For sale by the Presbyterian Board of Publication, price 44 cents a volume.

We have read this work with great pleasure. It contains a judicious, well-authenticated, and graphic account of the history of the Church of Scotland during the period mentioned. The number of editions through which the work has passed, and the selection of it by the Publication Committee of the Free Church, are evidences of its general excellence, and while we may not agree with all the views which it presents, we can say we know of no work which gives a more correct, interesting, and candid history of the eventful period of which it treats. Among the members of the Reformed Presbyterian Church it should have a large circulation, and the remarkably cheap price at which it is sold places it within the reach of all. We hope a copy may be obtained by every family. The young will be found to read it with interest, and it will be profitable even to those who have read many other histories of the same period.

Sloth and Thrift, or the Causes and Corrections of Social Inequality. Philadelphia, American Sunday School Union. Pp. 152. 18mo.

This is a very valuable work, calculated to dissipate many of the erroneous ideas which prevail in regard to social evils. An interesting tale presents a contrast between a life of sincere practical religion and a course of worldly conduct. The narrative is natural, and the tone of the whole is excellent. Such a work would be of great use to young persons about that time of life when they are becoming withdrawn from the influences of the family, and entering into the active duties of the world. Parents also would be greatly benefited by reading it.

Frank Harper, or the Country Boy in Town. American Sunday School Union. Pp. 159. 18mo.

The youth of large cities are exposed to many temptations, and those who have spent their childhood in the quiet of country life are peculiarly liable to be ensnared and destroyed. This work shows what are some of these temptations, and how they may be avoided, while the consequences of integrity and piety are exhibited in contrast with the wages of sin. The tale is attractive to the young, and parents would act wisely in causing their children to read it.

The Christian Minstrel; a New System of Musical Notation, with a selection of Psalm Tunes, Anthems, and Chants. By J. B. Aiken. Philadelphia, E. C. & J. Biddle. Fifth Edition.

Sacred music has been, in modern times, shamefully and even sinfully neglected by the Christian church. No part of public worship is better calculated to excite and foster devotional feelings, yet frequently it is so conducted as to fail in producing its appropriate effects, and perhaps even to cause those which are directly opposite. Any attempt to improve the music of the church is commendable, and should meet with encouragement. The work mentioned above appears to us the best publication on the subject. By dispensing with several of the arbitrary and useless encumbrances which have rendered musical notation so obscure and difficult, the author has greatly simplified the science and rendered it easy to all. In the introduction he has given an outline of the system he pursues, and afterwards a large collection of tunes, in various metres, with chants and anthems. The notes are all indicated by different characters. The work seems to be a most excellent one.

Parental Duties, and the Blessings resulting from their Faithful Performance. By Rev. T. Houston, Pastor of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, Knockbracken, (Ireland.) Presbyterian Board of Publication. Pp. 224. 18mo.

We have very seldom read a work more interesting and valuable than this. At the present time, particularly, when family discipline has become almost a mere nullity, and when principles of insubordination are so rife, this work is calculated to do great good. We hope it will be extensively circulated and read.

The Stone of Help: a Discourse, Historical and Commemorative, delivered to the Reformed Presbyterian Church, New York, on Sabbath evening, December 26th, 1847, being the fiftieth anniversary of their organization. By J. N. McLeod, D.D., Pastor. Published at their request. Pp. 24. 8vo.

Not only is the general history of the Christian church interesting and important, but even the incidents presented in the annals of particular congregations should be made known and preserved in memory. The discourse above named is designed to record and transmit the local and peculiar history of the Reformed Presbyterian church in New York, and enjoying, as that congregation has done, the services of so eminent a Christian and divine as the late Dr. McLeod, whose pastoral life was entirely connected with it, it presents a very fruitful subject for an historical sketch. The writer has given a very interesting and valuable narration, selecting the most important events, and exhibiting all with the perspicuity, vigour, judiciousness and Christian tone, which mark his writings. For Reformed Presbyterians this work possesses unusual interest, and we think a copy of it should be preserved in every household. Such memorials of other congregations should also be published, that thus the "fathers may tell the children, showing to the generations to come the praises of the Lord, and his strength, and his wonderful works that he hath done."

PROCEEDINGS OF A MEETING OF THE FIRST REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, PHILADELPHIA, HELD DECEMBER 1, 1847.

The Rev. Dr. Wylie arrived in Philadelphia, on the 31st October, 1797: the fiftieth anniversary of this event occurred, therefore, on the 31st of October, 1847. The fact having been alluded to, at the close of the services held on the evening of the day last mentioned, which was observed in the 1st Reformed Presbyterian Church as a communion Sabbath, arrangements were made by the congregation with a view to its commemoration. A public meeting was held for this purpose, on the evening of Wednesday, Dec. 1st, 1847. Mr. John M'Kinley, the oldest surviving member at the organization of the congregation, was called to preside, and the meeting was opened with prayer by the Junior Pastor. Rev. James R. Campbell, as Chairman of the Committee of the Congregation, of which he had been for many years, previous to his being engaged in Missionary labour, a most valuable and excellent member, read the accompanying Address, and presented to the Pastor a very handsome piece of Plate, consisting of a silver pitcher upon a salver, with a purse containing five hundred dollars in gold. Dr. Wylie then made some appropriate and deeply affecting remarks in reply; after which, some observations were made by the Junior Pastor, Mr. J. W. Faires, and Mr. John M'Kinley. The services were concluded with prayer by Mr. M'Kinley, and afterwards the members of the congregation and others who desired it, passing before the pulpit, had an opportunity of friendly greeting with their beloved Pastor. The whole services were of the most interesting and impressive character.

ADDRESS TO DR. WYLIE.

REVEREND AND BELOVED PASTOR:

As a committee appointed by your congregation, and as individuals who entertain for you the highest respect and veneration, we are called upon this evening to perform a duty most pleasing to ourselves, not only because we have been honoured to act on this occasion as the representatives of the sincerely attached people of your charge, but because we have the opportunity of conveying to you in this formal manner, and on this interesting occasion, an expression of their deepest gratitude for your labours among them, as a faithful minister of the gospel for a period of Half a Century. It has been thought that the fact of a minister's residing with the same people for fifty years should not be allowed to pass by without some tangible memorial expressive of our thanksgiving to God for sparing your invaluable life so long, and of our deep sense of the benefits derived from your ministry. It would be impossible, Reverend and Dear Sir, by any Testimonial that might be offered by your congregation, to convey to you all that is felt on this occasion, and therefore the small, but spontaneous tribute now made and presented by us in behalf of this whole congregation, is to be considered as a feeble but a hearty expression of their love and esteem, leaving still a debt of gratitude which it would be impossible to discharge. The King and Head of the church alone, whose you are and whom you have so faithfully served, is able to reward you for all the labours you have performed for his name, and the good of his church and people; and this reward of grace he will bestow when your labours on earth are terminated.

On the piece of plate which stands before you, and of which, as a congregation, we beg your acceptance, we have taken the liberty of placing the following inscription:—

PRESENTED
(with a Purse of Gold) to the REV'D. SAMUEL B. WYLIE, D. D. on the Fiftieth Anniversary of his arrival in Philadelphia,
 by his congregation,
 as a Testimonial of their affection and gratitude.
 Oct. 31st, A. D. 1847.

In the purse you will find the sum of five hundred dollars in gold.

You must allow us, beloved pastor, to trespass upon your patience still farther at this interesting moment, by referring briefly to some thoughts which are suggested by the circumstances which have called us together. There are events in the history of some men, which ought to be recorded and handed down to posterity for their guidance and admiration,—events which have had such a bearing on the general interests of religion and human happiness as to render them valuable in the annals of a world rising from the ages of darkness and barbarism to the light and glory and felicity of the millennial period. Reminiscences of such events frequently call up the most pleasing associations, and enable us to re-enjoy the pleasurable emotions of the days of former years. Providences which have had a bearing on our lot in life, and have contributed to our usefulness among our fellow-men, should be observed and gratefully acknowledged. It was at a time when great political disturbances convulsed the British Isles, that you first took your leave of Erin's shores—your native land, and directed your course to this Western Continent, the home of the free and the asylum of the oppressed; bringing with you, however, a highly cultivated mind, and a large, warm, Irish heart, to beat in unison with all, in every land, who aimed at the promotion of the best interests and highest destinies of man. After a tedious and perilous voyage, in which pestilence and famine threatened the termination of the lives of the brave adventurers, you arrived in this city on the 31st of October, 1797. Since that time, you have not been an unconcerned spectator of the mighty movements that have been going on around you, but have ever been actively engaged in promoting the civil and religious prosperity which now so strikingly marks the character of this great and growing Republic. We have only to glance at the state of this city and its population at the time of your arrival, and compare its condition then, with its improvements and wide-spread dimensions now, in order to have an impressive view of what the enterprise of the age has accomplished during the last Fifty years. On your landing at New Castle in company with the late Mr. Thos. M'Adam, so long a faithful and efficient ruling elder in this church, you travelled on foot to Philadelphia. When you arrived at Centre now called Penn Square, the very centre of our present population, travelling from the Schuylkill, you inquired for the city not then in view, and were informed that it was still half a mile distant! Now you behold a wide-spread and beautiful city, which for the intelligence and morality of its inhabitants, is not surpassed by any other of its size in Christendom. You see it now, with its hundreds of magnificent Christian churches,—its High schools and colleges,—its numerous benevolent and charitable institutions,—and in short, with every thing that can contribute to the temporal and spiritual welfare of its highly favoured inhabitants. These improvements, which have gone on with such amazing rapidity, you have greatly promoted by the influence you have exerted over the minds by which they have been planned and carried forward. You have lived in a remarkable age,—an age of discoveries and inventions and movements which border on the miraculous.—You have seen the most astonishing improvements in steam power as applied to navigation, to rail-roads, and machinery, by which men move now over sea and land with such wonderful rapidity, and by which even Herculean labour is now performed under the superintendence of a child. As the last and most surprising of all these discoveries, you have witnessed the magnetic telegraph, which almost annihilates space, and enables us to converse with a friend at the other side of a Continent, as if he stood before us.

We must not, Dear Sir, pass by the intimate connexion you have had with the cause of education and religion in this land and in this city, during the past fifty years. You have ever taken a deep interest in the instruction of the young, in imparting that sound knowledge, which lays the foundation of future eminence; so that many men of the brightest talents, the most extensive erudition, and the greatest influence in the land, are indebted to you for much of that mental training, which has rendered them the ornaments of their respective professions. As the principal of the most celebrated classical school in this city, and for so many years as the Professor of Ancient Languages, and Vice-provost in the University of Pennsylvania, you distinguished yourself as an enlightened and efficient instructor. Your name will ever stand honourably connected with that venerable seat of learning, and be ranked among those who are universally confessed to be the first scholars of the age. We would also notice your invaluable labours as professor of Theology in the Seminary of the Reformed Presbyterian church in this country,—the church with which you are so closely identified, and which, among other things, owes so much to you for training up nearly all the ministers in her connexion. These labours, we may say also, have been performed by you altogether gratuitously, and most of them, too, during the hours that other men appropriate to relaxation and repose. In raising up so many able ministers of the New Testament, however, you have the consolation of knowing, that when your own pulpit duties shall terminate, the truths you have taught and inculcated, shall be proclaimed by others, and that the results of your labours shall continue to be developed to the latest posterity. To you also, our own church is deeply indebted for the able maintenance of enlightened and scriptural views of Reformation principles, at a time when an attempt was made to place them in an unfavourable light before the public. You have always been the warm admirer and advocate of the principles of freedom, and in the vigour of youth, your voice was raised, in the Southern states, in behalf of the poor helpless slave unjustly held in bondage. These principles, so decidedly scriptural and anti-slavery in their character, have by yourself and others in the church, been clearly exhibited on her standards, so that on this exciting subject of the day, she continued to occupy before the Christian public, and the world, a lofty and honourable position.

But, Reverend Sir, it is as a congregation, that we address you, and it is to your Pastoral labours among us since our organization that we would delight to refer. We look upon you, with a few others, as the link which still unites us with those recognised as original members who have fallen asleep in Jesus. Only five, we believe, that is, Mr. John McKinley and Mr. Robert Orr, ruling elders, and Mrs. Graham, Mrs. Henry and Mrs. McAdam remain to tell us of your discouragements and your efforts to build up the little flock intrusted to your care,—and those associated with yourself, we receive as the representatives of a past age, and esteem very highly in love for their work's sake. When the congregation was in numbers very few, and when it could hold out to you no prospect of worldly advantage, and make but a trifling compensation for your invaluable services and labours, you devoted to its spiritual welfare your time and energy and talents. Nay, farther, you opened your purse, and with a liberality peculiarly your own, you poured out your hundreds of dollars again and again, to aid the congregation in its struggles for existence and respectability. Nor was your benevolence confined to your own church or even to the household of faith. It has ever been extended to the immigrant stranger without money and without employment, and to the poor of every name and denomination. Tempting as were the offers and prospects from other quarters, and to which your talents and acquirements entitled you, you refused them all, and cast in your lot with the little flock of covenanters which met in a small private room in humble circumstances. You organized us into a congregation, you preached to us the pure Gospel of Christ, and your labours were remarkably blessed. The Lord did not despise the day of small things. The little one has become a thousand. She has "lengthened her cords and strengthened her stakes," and "broken forth on the right hand and on the left." With the blessing of God on your efficient labours, the congregation became large and respectable. It has branched off again and again, and still it remains larger than at any former period. Its present condition and prospects are most encouraging. The influence of its benevolence is felt largely even in India. Its annual contributions to every good cause, are greater now than in previous years, and yet its debt is being diminished, and will soon be liquidated. It has been favoured with increased ministerial aid,—aid raised up within its own bosom, and furnished so efficiently and acceptably by one, who has, with truth, been called "the child of the congregation," and for whom, as a son, and as a co-labourer in the Gospel, you have good reason to be thankful.

Among other measures adopted to render the congregation efficient in every good work, and which you have so warmly patronized, there is the Dorcas Society for clothing the poor; the Mite Society, aiming to remove its entire debt; the large and flourishing Sabbath school, and Bible classes, from which so many additions from time to time have been made to its communion; its weekly Praying and Conference societies, so well calculated to edify its members, and unite them in bonds of Christian brotherhood; and last, though not least, its Missionary society, which has so liberally aided in the spread of the gospel at home and abroad, and by which so many pagan youth have been saved from the horrors of starvation and of heathenism, instructed in the saving truths of the gospel, and now qualified for usefulness among their benighted countrymen. Thus the congregation, flourishing under your ministry, has now arrived at a state of great and almost unexampled prosperity, for which our heart-felt thanks are due to the Head of the church, and to you, his honoured and devoted servant. Above all, we rejoice that, with the Divine blessing on your able and well-directed labours among us, many have been brought to a knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus, and many have been built up in the faith and hope of the gospel, who have entered on that rest which remains for the people of God above, who shall be as stars in your crown of rejoicing throughout eternity.

These things, Reverend and dear sir, and many more, which a regard to your feelings forbids us to mention on this occasion, compel us to come forward and express to you our grateful acknowledgments for your invaluable labours amongst us. Surely, after a silence of fifty years, and when you have become old and gray-headed in the service of your heavenly Master, and when all the facts to which we have referred, and many others which we cannot enumerate, rise up with cumulative and overwhelming force before our minds, and when our hearts overflow with gratitude for all your kindness, and for all the benefits we have received through your ministry, we must be allowed this once to express something of the emotions which swell our bosoms. Our prayer is that you may be long spared to go in and out before us; that you may have all the support and consolation which your situation requires; that your bow may long abide in strength, and the arms of your hands be made strong by the mighty God of Jacob, and that when your labours among us are at an end, and your warfare is accomplished, you may have an abundant entrance administered to you, into the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ, and then receive the palm of victory, and the crown of glory, and the plaudit from the Master himself, of "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter into the joy of thy Lord."

On behalf of the congregation, we subscribe ourselves, dear sir,

Yours ever in the Lord,

|                    |                                            |

To the Rev. SAMUEL B. WYLIE, D. D., Pastor of the First Reformed Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia.

Mr. Campbell, as chairman of the Committee of the congregation, having concluded his address, Dr. Wylie replied substantially as follows:

DR. WYLIE'S REPLY.

Reverend and Dear Brother:—Words can but feebly express the emotions excited in my mind by the scene now presented to me, and the whole transactions of the evening. I was not prepared for such things. The whole matter has been a spontaneous effort of the congregation, almost wholly unknown to me. I did, indeed, believe that I possessed the affectionate regard and good-will of my people generally, since they have long and frequently manifested such feelings towards me—but such an expression of them as has been made this evening, had not been at all anticipated. It was not needed to cement the bonds of amity between my beloved flock and myself, but it is not on that account less grateful to my heart. And permit me, Reverend and dear brother, to state the fact that the selection of yourself, my kind and much valued friend for so many years, as the agent of the congregation to present this splendid and valuable testimonial of their respect and love, has added a most agreeable zest to the proceedings of this evening. With regard to the address which you have just made, I would only remark, that while I appreciate the elegance of its composition, I must add that it soars into regions much higher than the sphere in which I have been destined to move, and ascribes to me worth and merit to which I make no pretensions. This, Dear Sir, I impute to your own generous heart, and to your kind partiality for your ancient friend. But let that pass. Allow me, my dear sir, to yourself personally, to the Committee of which you are chairman, and through you and them to the whole Congregation, individually and collectively, to return my most grateful and cordial acknowledgments.

As you have been pleased, sir, in terms of kindness to allude to the success and prosperity of the congregation, it is but justice for me to state that this is owing in no small degree to your own instrumentality. While a private member of the congregation, before entering on your missionary career, your Christian deportment, and vigorous and untiring exertions, assisted greatly in promoting our welfare and prosperity, especially in connexion with our Sabbath school, which you, with a few others like-minded, resuscitated, and to which you gave a tone of character so pleasing and so useful. Here you and your late colleague in the missionary field, the much lamented Mr. James Craig, who has now gone to his reward, but whose memory is still dear to those of the congregation who had the pleasure of his acquaintance, laboured assiduously for many years, promoting the interest of the institution, and causing it to be productive of benefits far beyond the most sanguine expectations of its warmest friends. You have also been identified with our Missionary society, and your operations as a herald of salvation in a heathen land, not only should be, but have been, appreciated by all who are acquainted with them. Your works of faith and labours of love, your indefatigable exertions in the pulpit, in the bazaar, in the midst of idolatrous heathen, by your voice, your pen, and your example of * Dr. W.'s remarks being extempore, and not recorded at the time he spoke, he was requested to prepare a written reply, to be published in connexion with the Address of the congregation. In this reply he has embodied a brief sketch of the history of the congregation since its organization, Jan. 28, 1798, to the present time.

Christian character, the instructions you have delivered, the important and valuable writings you have translated into the Hindustani and other languages and so widely circulated,—all these will tell in wonderful and happy results when your soul shall have gone to the presence of your God, and your body shall have been mingled with the clods of the valley.

In expressing, dear brother, the sense I feel of your unceasing kindness to our Church, and the ardent desire for her prosperity and growth in grace which you have ever displayed, I have only further to add my humble and earnest prayer that God may ever have you, your amiable consort, and your dear children, in his most holy keeping, and may abundantly prosper your laudable efforts in this Christian land for the promotion of the Missionary cause,—that he may spare you long to labour among the heathen, if it should be his will that you return to your former field of usefulness, and that at last you may, with “those who turn many to righteousness, be made to shine in glory as the brightness of the firmament, and as the stars for ever and ever.”

Addressing himself to the congregation, Dr. W. then proceeded, after some most affectionate and valuable counsels, to refer to its history during the last fifty years. His remarks on this subject have been expanded into the following narrative:

It may not be considered inappropriate on such an occasion as the present, to furnish a brief history of the origin, progress, and existing position of the 1st Reformed Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, in connexion with the relation they have sustained to their present Senior pastor, on whom they have this evening conferred such a testimonial of their regard.

Dearly Beloved Brethren:—He who is now your Senior Pastor, having graduated in the University of Glasgow, in the month of April, 1797, in the following August sailed for the United States of America. He had as fellow passengers, Rev. William Gibson, with his family, Mr. John Black, now Rev. Dr. Black, Mr. John Reilly, afterwards Rev. Mr. Reilly, and Mr. Thomas M'Adam, all members of the Ref. Pres. Church. After a tedious voyage of seventy days, during which many dangers and hardships were encountered, the vessel reached New Castle, Del., on the 18th October. The yellow fever had prevailed in Philadelphia that fall to a considerable degree, and the city had been deserted by many of its inhabitants. After landing at New Castle, the passengers in the vessel dispersed in various directions as previous purpose or present inclination induced them. Your present senior Pastor, with Mr. Thomas M'Adam, determined to go to the city of Philadelphia. Having accidentally missed their passage in a sloop on board of which they had put their baggage to be conveyed to the city, they proceeded on their way on foot, and reached the city on Hallow Eve, Saturday evening, October 31, about sundown. The two travellers found accommodations in the same house, No. 208 N. Second st., and here they spent their first Sabbath. Mr. Gibson preached in the city that day, but they did not know it. On Monday they sallied forth in search of their trunks, which contained their all of worldly goods, and found, to their great mortification, that the sloop had returned to New Castle, and their baggage had been taken on shore by a fellow-passenger, but who he was, where he had gone, and how he had disposed of their property, they could not ascertain. Advertising in the newspapers, and other means which they used to obtain information, proved unsuccessful. At length after eight days, during which they suffered peculiar hardships, by a remarkable Providence, always to be gratefully remembered, they were conducted to a store on Market street wharf, where they found their baggage safe and uninjured. During their first week's residence in the city, they had the pleasure of meeting with several of their fellow-passengers who had arrived by various routes. Among them, Mr. Gibson, Mr. Black, Mr. Reilly, and Mr. Atchison. Through Mr. Reilly they became acquainted with Mr. Samuel Campbell, and Mr. Thomas Thompson, with their families, members of the Reformed Presbyterian Church. Mr. Thompson's humble abode was the resort of all those who were attached to the covenanted cause, and its hospitable proprietor, as far as he was able, gave a welcome to every friend of the Redeemer. Mr. Thompson and his wife were immigrants from County Down, Ireland, staunch and strict covenanters, who had been in communion with Mr. Stavelly's congregation, near Belfast. They were not affluent in worldly wealth, but rich in faith. Their hearts were noble and princely, and no wonder, for they were of royal lineage, they were born of God. In their house a society was in the habit of meeting, consisting at that time of the following members—Mr. John Stewart, from Paisley, Scotland, Mr. James M'Gowan, and Mr. Stephen Young, also from Scotland, and Mr. Charles Huston, Mr. John Wallace, Mr. William Atchison, Mr. Andrew Atchison, Mr. Samuel Radcliff and wife, all of whom came from Ireland, and of whom but two, Mr. Samuel Radcliff and Mr. William Atchison, are now alive, the former an elder in the Reformed Presbyterian Church, N. Y. Mr. John M'Kinley, then employed as a teacher in some part of New Jersey, also occasionally visited the society, and its number was increased by the addition of Mr. Joseph M'Clurg and his family, from Coleraine, Mr. Robert Orr, from Strabane, and Messrs. Black, Reilly, M'Adam, and him who now addresses you. The meetings of the society were held on Wednesday evening, and on such Sabbaths as there was no supply of preaching. They were from time to time visited by Rev. W. Gibson, who divided his ministerial services between them and a small society in New York. Harmony and love, sincere respect and mutual good-will, a genuine relish for sound doctrine, and a pure and holy zeal for the divine glory marked the character of this little brotherhood. Its members were all industrious, economical, and well-behaved. They consecrated a large portion of their savings to the support of the gospel, and though so few in numbers, and poor in worldly riches, they endeavoured to furnish a comfortable support for Mr. Gibson, during the half of his time which he spent among them.

It was a considerable time after their arrival in this city before the efforts made most assiduously by Messrs. Black, Reilly, M'Adam, and Wylie to obtain any proper employment, were successful. Mr. M'Adam was the first who procured a situation, and most generously shared his earnings with his less successful companions. Such was his disposition and character, and we might add a more noble-minded, intelligent, trustworthy, kind, and honourable man could not any where be readily found. His connexion with his companions was of the most agreeable and satisfactory character, and while the pecuniary assistance he rendered was not long after repaid, the debt of gratitude has never been cancelled. In about six weeks the others obtained employment. Mr. Reilly as a teacher near Darby, and by the benevolence of a venerable Quaker, Messrs. Black and Wylie in the same capacity, in Lower Dublin and Cheltenham, about ten miles north of the city. Thus all these four brethren, in the good Providence of God, were in such circumstances as to be able to procure by their honest industry a competent support.

As yet there had been no regular organization of the congregation in this city. Mr. Reid, a minister of the Reformed Presbyterian Church in Scotland, who had been sent on a mission to the United States in 1790, had spent some time here; he preached to a few individuals, and a society had been constituted. As it now appeared proper to take measures for an organization, Mr. Gibson brought on from New York, where an organization had been made a short time before, two elders, Messrs. Andrew Gifford and David Clark, and having constituted a session, organized the society as a congregation, ordaining as elders Messrs. Thomas Thompson and Stephen Young, the unanimous choice of the members. This ordination took place on Sabbath, Jan. 28, 1798. Messrs. Black and Wylie were not present on the occasion, as it was only on alternate Sabbaths that they could attend the society. Shortly after this, however, they obtained situations as tutors in the University of Pennsylvania, and thus took up their residence in the city. They had from this time the opportunity of meeting constantly with their Christian brethren, who yet assembled in the house of Mr. Thompson. How delightful was the communion of saints in that loving brotherhood!

In the spring of 1798, the Reformed Presbytery, which had been dissolved at the formation of the Associate Reformed Church in 1782, was again constituted by Messrs. M'Kinney and Gibson. The former of these gentlemen had emigrated from Ireland in 1793, and after having traversed a large part of the United States, had settled for a season in Philadelphia. In the summer of 1797, he had obtained a lot for the erection of a church, but shortly after the edifice had been commenced, the yellow fever broke out with great violence, and Mr. M'Kinney, with his family, removed to Galway, Saratoga county, N. Y. On the arrival of Mr. Gibson, he united with him in the formation of the Reformed Presbytery, which was constituted in the city of Philadelphia.

At this time the congregation was in the habit of meeting in a school-house in Gaskill street, between 4th and 5th, and here the organization was made, and the ordinances were dispensed. At this, the first meeting of Presbytery, Messrs. Black, and Wylie, and M'Leod, were recognised as students of theology, and discourses were prescribed for them. Mr. Alexander M'Leod, afterwards Rev. Dr. M'Leod, had emigrated to this country from Scotland, in the year 1792, and had graduated in Union College, Schenectady, N. Y. Having been led by a discourse delivered by Rev. James M'Kinney, to connect himself with the Reformed Presbyterian Church, he commenced the study of theology under the direction of that gentleman, and was taken at this time under the care of Presbytery.

According to appointment, Presbytery met in the city of New York in the following August, and to this place the students of theology repaired to deliver their discourses. It was at this time that Messrs. Black and Wylie first met with Dr. M'Leod, and formed with him a friendship and intimacy which lasted during his whole life. The sacrament of the Lord's supper was dispensed at this time, and the members of Presbytery, and the theological students, with the few individuals then in connexion with the Church in New York, had an opportunity, when they partook of the symbols of the Redeemer's body and blood, to enjoy high and holy fellowship with one another, as well as communion with the Father and the Son JESUS CHRIST. This was the first celebration of the Lord's supper in the Reformed Presbyterian Church, New York.

Having delivered discourses with approbation at this, and two succeeding meetings of Presbytery, these young men, with Mr. Thomas Donelly, from South Carolina, who had also been received as a student of theology, were licensed to preach the gospel. This took place on the 25th June, 1799, and the meeting was held in Coldenham, Orange county, N. Y. Such appointments were then given to them as circumstances seemed to render proper. Your present senior Pastor, after preaching for some time in Wallkill, Orange county, N. Y., and assisting Mr. M'Kinney at a communion in Galway, Saratoga county, in the same state, laboured for some time in New York. In the winter he returned to Philadelphia, where he remained till the spring of the following year.

In the year 1800, Mr. M'Leod received a call from the congregation of Walkill, some of the subscribers to which were holders of slaves. Being unwilling to enter into a pastoral relation with any who were involved in the sin of slaveholding, he brought the subject before Presbytery, which decided that no slaveholder should remain in the communion of the Reformed Presbyterian Church. As the members of the church in the South were generally involved in this sin, Presbytery resolved to appoint a committee to visit that section of country, and take such measures as might be proper to induce them to abandon the evil. In order that he might be a member of this committee, your senior pastor was ordained to the office of the gospel ministry at Ryegate in Vermont, June 25th, 1800, and in the fall of that year, in connexion with Mr. M'Kinney, set out upon his journey. In their progress they preached and baptized as opportunity required, and on their way through Pittsburgh they ordained Mr. Black, and installed him in the pastoral charge of the Reformed Presbyterian Church in that place. From Pittsburgh they descended the Ohio river as far as Maysville, Kentucky, when they commenced a journey on horseback through Kentucky and Tennessee, in both of which states they preached frequently and organized societies and administered the Sacrament of Baptism. Having reached South Carolina, they held meetings of the members of the church in various places, and proposing to them the alternative of relinquishing the communion of the church or emancipating their slaves, they had the pleasure of finding that all in that state were willing to sacrifice their claim to property in their fellow-men on the altar of religion. During their stay they ordained Mr. Thomas Donelly, and installed him pastor of a large and flourishing congregation, requiring the services of two ministers, which long afterwards were obtained.

On their return they presented to Presbytery their report, which was accepted and approved. Mr. Alexander M'Leod was then ordained to the ministry, and constituted pastor of the united congregations of New York and Coldenham. The Presbytery now consisted of six ministerial members, with ruling elders. All the ministers had pastoral charges, with the exception of Mr. Wylie, who having declined several calls for his services, was appointed to supply the united congregations of Philadelphia and Baltimore. About a year afterwards, in the fall of 1802, he accepted a call from these congregations on the condition that he should be allowed to spend a year in Europe, that his pastoral connexion should commence on his return, and that at the end of two years he might be at liberty to select one or other or neither of the congregations without further action of Presbytery. As the congregation had been increasing during this time, it was thought proper to have additional elders. Accordingly on the 5th of August, 1801, Messrs. John Stewart, Wm. Henry, Thos. M'Adam, and John Reilly, having been duly elected, were solemnly set apart to this office. Mr. Stephen Young, a most worthy and excellent man, had some time before returned to Scotland. The communion was dispensed in 1802, by Messrs. M'Leod and Wylie to thirty-five persons, exclusive of the ministers.

While absent in Scotland, your senior pastor was not forgetful of his beloved flock, and had the pleasure of being the means of procuring a considerable sum of money in its behalf. From the congregation in Glasgow he received for this purpose £22, and an equal amount from the congregation in Paisley. These donations were on his return most gratefully acknowledged by a formal vote of session. Being at that time few in number and very feeble in resources, and yet having engaged in the erection of a church edifice, this aid was much needed.

On his return from Europe, late in the fall of 1803, your pastor was formally installed by Rev. Mr. Black. He found the congregation in this city and that in Baltimore, in a very feeble condition. The ordinances had been dispensed with as much frequency as possible, and the church edifice had been roofed, but its accommodations were very poor and its location exceedingly disagreeable. It was thought proper to abandon it altogether and seek another situation. This design, however, was not carried into effect for a considerable time, and meanwhile such improvements were made as rendered the building more comfortable.

The term of Mr. Wylie's connexion with the Philadelphia congregation having expired, he was earnestly invited to remain with them. This application was presented at a meeting of Presbytery in Conococheague, in 1807, and at the same time an urgent call was addressed to him from the United Congregations of Galway and Duanesburgh, New York. Feeling unable to decide for himself, your pastor referred the subject to the decision of the Presbytery. The appearance of things in this city was at that time very discouraging, and the prospects of usefulness and comfort in another locality much more favourable, hence the Presbytery recommended the selection of Galway and Duanesburgh. In the course of the following night, after much solicitude and prayer for divine direction, your pastor felt that he could not abandon his little but beloved flock. He had the satisfaction of finding that his labours thenceforth became more successful, and the whole aspect of the congregation more encouraging. On the next communion twenty-five persons were admitted to church privileges, and from time to time, numbers more were added to the church of whom there was reason to entertain the hope they were such as should be saved.

In the year 1808 an increase of the Session being considered necessary, Messrs. John M'Kinley, James Robinson and Robert Orr, were ordained to the office of ruling elders. In 1809 Mr. John Reilly was licensed to preach, and his connexion with this congregation terminated.

The congregation having continued to increase, more extensive accommodations were considered necessary. The premises then occupied were therefore disposed of, and a lot purchased, and the building in Eleventh street corner of Marble, which we now occupy, was erected. While this edifice was in progress, we were allowed by the trustees of the Second Associate Reformed Church, to use their house in Thirteenth near Market, which was then unoccupied. Our own church was opened for divine service 21st June, 1818, although at that time the portion occupied for religious purposes was not so extensive as at present, a considerable part in the rear being fitted up as school rooms, and used for that purpose. About this time a charter, with an act of incorporation, was obtained from the Legislature of the state, principally by the wise suggestion and laudable exertions of the present Rev. Dr. James R. Willson, then a member of the congregation.

In the year 1819, the increase of the congregation required an addition to the session, and Messrs. Isaac Campbell, John Murphy and Samuel Bell, were elected and ordained to the office of ruling elders. In 1820, Mr. Caleb Gray, who had been previously an elder in the Associate Reformed church, and had connected himself with us, was recognised as a ruling elder of our congregation. In 1824, Mr. Hugh Hardy, who had been an elder in a Reformed Presbyterian Church in Ohio, was recognised as sustaining the same relation to this church. In 1829, Mr. Henry Sterling, a ruling elder from the Reformed Presbyterian church in Pittsburgh, was elected to the same office in this church. In 1829 more accommodations were requisite, and the school rooms in the back part of the church were removed, and the space they occupied rendered suitable for divine service.

While the congregation during this period enjoyed general peace and prosperity; as might be expected, it was not exempted from trials of various kinds. The little bark, for the most part, was favoured with fair weather and prosperous gales, but sometimes it encountered adverse winds and stormy waves. It was, however, always found that the tempest by which it might have been tossed, soon passed away, while, like the storms which purify the natural atmosphere, very beneficial consequences resulted. The most severe trial which the congregation ever experienced, was the secession which took place in consequence of what was denominated a Pro Re Nata meeting of the Eastern Subordinate Synod. By this assemblage a large number of our ministers were suspended from their office in the most irregular manner—an act in itself invalid, and which the whole Christian community have treated as a nullity. In consequence of the party which was rallied to sustain the act, a considerable number withdrew from the congregation and formed a new congregation, which before long procured a building and a pastor. We do not follow these misguided brethren with reproachful vituperation; so far as they are right in their views, and conscientiously believe themselves so, we cordially wish them "God speed."

In the year 1835 a number of members of the congregation residing in the vicinity of Fairmount, feeling themselves able, in connexion with some others friendly to reformation principles, to sustain the ordinances as a distinct congregation, received an amicable dismissal and were organized into the Second Reformed Presbyterian Church. They have had the services of Rev. S. W. Crawford, now Dr. Crawford, who was regularly installed as their pastor; and after his demission, those of Rev. Samuel Stevenson, who was also installed in the same capacity. At present they are destitute of a minister, but it is understood that Mr. Wm. Sterrett has accepted their call for his services, and from his excellent qualifications for the office, it is hoped that with the divine blessing, they will increase and prosper abundantly.

In 1835, an increase of the session was again considered necessary, Mr. Gray having departed this life, Mr. Bell having removed from the city, and Mr. Murphy having connected himself with the second Reformed Presbyterian Church. An election was therefore held, and Messrs. James Craig, Robert Guy, Robert Lowry, and Charles Bruster, being chosen by the congregation, were ordained to the office of ruling elders. Of these but one, Mr. Robert Guy, now remains in the session; Messrs. Robert Lowry and James Craig having been removed by death, the latter in 1845, after having laboured for more than seven years as a Missionary in India. In 1842, additional elders were again chosen, and Messrs. C. McCune, Wm. Montgomery, J. Alexander and G. H. Stuart, were set apart to that office.

In 1843, it was thought that the increase of the congregation, in connexion with the advancing age and multifarious employments of the senior pastor, required that he should have some stated and permanent assistance in ministerial services. After much deliberation and prayer, an election having been duly held, it pleased the congregation to find for their pastor an assistant in his own son,—one who had been brought up in the midst of them, and who “might be expected naturally to care for their state, and as a son with the father to serve with him in the gospel.” His ordination and installation as assistant and successor of his father, took place on the 26th October, 1843, and since that time he has been employed as a co-labourer in this part of God’s spiritual vineyard. It may be permitted to a father to say, that the kindness of the congregation in making this selection, has been felt as one of the strongest evidences of their love and affection; it has been to him satisfactory and consoling, and he believes the hopes entertained respecting its results have not been disappointed.

In 1846, in consequence of the increase of the congregation rendering such a measure expedient and desirable, and from the prospect which there was of extending the influence of Reformation Principles, and enlarging the boundaries of our Zion, the members of the congregation in the district of Kensington were set off as a separate congregation. The organization of the Third Reformed Presbyterian Church, which was formed in the most amicable manner, took place on July 6th, 1846. In the following year they obtained a pastor in the Rev. R. J. Black, who was ordained and installed on the 22d April, 1847. In consequence of ill health he has been obliged to leave his flock, but only, we trust, for a season. In the mean time it is a pleasing circumstance that they are supplied with the ordinances, with very few interruptions, and that their numbers are rapidly increasing.

It may be mentioned before closing this sketch, that the condition of the congregation at this time, is more prosperous than at any previous epoch. Under the management of its very efficient and diligent Board of Trustees, whose laborious and self-denying services deserve the highest encomiums, all its pecuniary engagements are met with promptness, and its debt is undergoing a rapid reduction. The Sabbath school, established in 1824, is in a very flourishing condition.—The congregation are much indebted to its former superintendents, Messrs. M·Adam, Orr, Craig, and Alexander, and are deriving from it great benefits under its present zealous, indefatigable and excellent superintendent, Mr. Geo. H. Stuart. By the instructions communicated in it, an incalculable amount of good is done both to the old and the young of the congregation. The tender minds of the children are imbued with Christian knowledge, and their expanding hearts are furnished with appropriate aliment. Those who communicate instruction increase their own knowledge, and parents are greatly aided in the discharge of their duties to their children. It has been a prolific nursery, from which many precious shoots have been transplanted to the garden of the church, where, as trees of Righteousness, they are bringing forth much fruit to the glory of God. Its prosperity and usefulness are now greater than ever, and we trust that the Lord will yet cause it to “increase more and more.”*

In concluding this narrative I must express my sincere thanks to the congregation for the kindness and respect they have ever manifested in their intercourse with me. I have never had reason to complain for want of temporal support, and the sum which they furnished was quite liberal, considering their circumstances, and was always paid as punctually as a check on the best bank. My connexion with them has been long and pleasant, and I have had the gratification of seeing among them evidences of the divine approbation of my labours.—My heart's desire and prayer for all of them is that they may be saved, and I trust that the growth of piety and genuine godliness may ever keep pace with the increase of their numbers and resources, and be undiminished by any adverse circumstances which may surround them. Let them remember to seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and then rest assured that all other things necessary for their present and eternal happiness shall be abundantly added. In the language of the apostle Peter, “I will not be negligent to put you always in remembrance of these things, though ye know them, and be established in the present truth. Yea, I think it meet, as long as I am in this tabernacle, to stir you up by putting you in remembrance; knowing that shortly I must put off this my tabernacle. Moreover, I will endeavour that ye may be able, after my decease, to have these things always in remembrance. For we have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming of our

* Among many cases which might be mentioned showing the influence which the instructions of the Sabbath school exert upon the youthful mind, one may be here recorded. A short time ago, a fire occurred near the centre of the city, which threatened to consume the house in which a member of our church, a widow with her only son, resided. The building was saved, and the next day the little boy, when talking on the subject, said he had felt sure that their house would not be burned.—“Why were you sure?” said his mother, “Because,” replied the child, “My Sabbath school teacher told me that God would hear the prayers of little children, and when I was afraid the house would be burned, I prayed to him to save it; and I went on praying all the time, until the fire was put out. Now,” he added, “I know that God hears the prayers of children, or he has heard my prayer.”

Lord Jesus Christ." 2 Pet. i. 12—16. And now, brethren, in the language of the inscription on the seal of the corporation of our church, "LET MESSIAH REIGN."

VERSES SUGGESTED BY READING, IN THE PRESBYTERIAN, AN ACCOUNT OF THE PRESENTATION OF A MEMORIAL TO REV. DR. WYLIE.

"The congregation of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, presented their venerable pastor, the Rev. Samuel B. Wylie, D. D., in testimony of their affection and gratitude, and in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of his arrival in Philadelphia, a very handsome piece of plate, and a purse of gold containing $500, in money. At the close of the service which was held on the occasion, the whole congregation passed round before the pulpit, and shook hands with their excellent and much-esteemed pastor, who at the age of nearly seventy-five years, is still able to discharge his duties with great acceptance."

TO REV. SAMUEL B. WYLIE, D. D.

Thy church glad thanks to thee hath sung,

We fain would be repeating;—*

For though our harp be willow-hung,

We send thee joyous greeting;—

Though churchless, pastorless, we live,

Yet our true sympathy we give.

Thy people rise to bless thee!—rise

With glad united lays;

And prayer ascends unto the skies,

Blent with the voice of praise;

They sing—"God gave thee not in vain!"

What hast thou done such meed to gain?

Thou'st taught firm trust 'mid tempests frown,

In a good God alway:

Thou'st soothed the stricken, and bent down

Beside the sick to pray;—

"Weeping with those who wept,"—thy voice

Hath joyed with those who did rejoice.

The guide to all who looked to thee,

In times of joy and gloom;

Still pointing them unceasingly,

To life beyond the tomb.

The star whose steady lustre beamed,

To show the Christ for the redeemed.

Example of strong faith!—thy home

Hath not been always bright;

Dark sorrow came, as it will come,

To try the spirit's might:

Thou'st known the chastening love of God,

And often bowed to kiss the rod.

Yet meekly was thy cross up taken,

With quenchless trust in Him;

For never wert thou God-forsaken,

Tho' life looked darkly dim;

'Mid sacrifice and tears, grew bright

The heaven thou ever hadst in sight.

"Toiling, rejoicing, sorrowing,"

So hast thou journeyed on,

Until in thy stern tasks performing,

Full fifty years have flown;

And now they rise to bless thee!—they

Whom thou oft blessed upon their way.

Blest shalt thou be!—when at God's throne
 At last thou shalt appear,
 With the bright band thou hast led on,
 Through storm and trial here;
 Blest wert thou!—art thou!—and to be
 God-blessed through all eternity.
 Oh! long on earth, we fain would pray
 Thy spirit to detain;
 Could love—could prayer—prolong thy stay,
 Then should'st thou long remain,
 A holy mission to fulfil
 And bless us with thy presence still.
 But the death-doom is thine!—we crave
 From Heaven—beseech—implore
 This—that thou pass not to thy grave
 Through a pain-suffering door.
 But calmly, gently, find thy rest,
 Thy head upon the Saviour's breast.

TUNE—"DAYS OF ABSENCE."

Whither haste ye, friends of Jesus,
 Wherefore leave your native land?
 'Midst fierce winds and foaming billows,
 Wherefore seek a foreign strand?
 Is it earth's gay phantoms lure you
 Thus to part from all you love?—
 Riches—pleasures—that induce you
 Thus to distant lands to rove?
 No: a nobler spirit urges,
 Jesus beckons from afar;
 Fear ye not midst storms and surges
 He will be your guiding star;

Bear glad tidings to the "heathen,"
 Of a blessed Saviour's name,
 Glorious grace and free salvation
 In those distant lands proclaim.
 What though for a while ye sever
 From the friends you dearly prize,
 Should it be on earth for ever,
 You will meet above the skies.
 Then "fare ye well," and peace be with you,
 Grace and mercy from on high,
 God will still protect and guard you
 With his ever watchful eye.

The Sabbath School.

NINETEENTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE SABBATH SCHOOL ASSOCIATION OF THE 1ST REF'D. PRES. CHURCH, PHILAD'A.

We have great pleasure in presenting to our readers the following interesting report. We will be glad to publish accounts of any similar institutions in any part of our church that all may thus "encourage one another."

While on the eve of entering upon a New Year, it may be well to linger on the threshold for a little, and recall the actions of the past. New and renewed opportunities have been afforded for benefiting our fellow-beings, and as the Judge of all the earth will require at our hands an account of our stewardship at the day of judgment, it behooves us to make a proper use of the talents placed in our keeping. We have been assigned a very important place in the vineyard, and should delight in the occupation of imparting instruction to the lambs of the flock, and persuading them in early life to place their hopes in their risen and exalted Saviour.

With all the facilities afforded at the present day for carrying on the work of Sabbath School instruction with success, the fault is our own if we fail in its accomplishment. These privileges will not always be enjoyed; the hand of death may suddenly arrest us in our career and abruptly terminate our labours—this fact should be ever before us, and impress us with a sense of our mortality, of the uncertainty of life, and of the necessity of closing in with the gospel offer of salvation ere it be too late.

The past has been an eventful year in the history of our Association. It has been marked with occurrences of an exceedingly interesting character; one of the most prominent we would advert to, is the safe return to our midst, of one much beloved, who occupied a conspicuous position at the organization of our association, and was for many years a devoted teacher in our Sabbath School. We feel grateful that the Lord has permitted Mr. Campbell to return to us, though it be for a short season; it is refreshing after the lapse of so many years to meet again—the event has brought to mind reminiscences of a most pleasing character of the days of other years, when we took sweet counsel together, and laboured side by side in promoting the interests of the Redeemer's kingdom. We sincerely desire that this meeting may tend to our mutual edification, that his heart may be encouraged and his hands strengthened for the arduous work in which he is engaged, and that we may be impressed with a deeper sense of our obligations to spread the gospel to every creature, in obedience to the commands of our Saviour.

Another important event, though of very recent date, is the organization of a branch Sabbath School in the southern part of the city: it is with great satisfaction that the announcement is made, and we know that it is received with similar feelings by every one interested in this great work. Attempts had previously been made to accomplish this, but they failed of success. We think it but justice here to state that the success attending this last effort is in a great measure to be attributed to the indefatigable exertions of Mr. Darragh, who was employed as the visiting agent of our Sabbath School. As the school is yet in its infancy, we can state nothing farther in regard to it. There appears to be no lack of children: over 40 have already been in attendance, and a number of individuals have volunteered their services as teachers.

Affairs in our own school have been carried on harmoniously, and conducted with success.

At the present time, there are on our roll about 267 pupils, 141 female, and 126 male, and of teachers, 28; female 15, male 12. The average attendance about 140 pupils. The infant class, under the supervision of Miss Clarke, consists of 40 boys and 25 girls. The amount of the recitations as extracted from the quarterly reports, is 13,170 verses of Scripture, 11,327 stanzas of Psalms, 2,087 questions in Brown's Catechism, 8,475 in the shorter, and 493 questions in the larger Catechism; the number of absent marks, 1368. The Union Question Book is generally made use of, except in the smaller classes, and in the 10th vol. now under consideration, the 11th lesson has been reached.

There has been collected in the various classes, by the contributions of children in aid of Foreign Missions, the sum of $105.00, far exceeding that of last year.

Two sessions of the school have been held upon the Sabbath, with the exception of Communion Sabbaths, and a period from the 25th of July to the first of September, during which time it was deemed expedient, on account of the extremely warm weather, to suspend operations altogether: as far as we can judge, the school received no disadvantage in consequence. Both the Bible class and the prayer-meeting have been kept up, and generally well attended. The first Sabbath of each month in the afternoon has been devoted to the examination of the School upon Brown's Catechism, the Shorter, and the Union Questions. Our School has frequently been visited by the agent of the American Sunday School Union, and by others, both clergymen and laymen—on most of these occasions addresses were made, and listened to with great attention, coming from the lips of those who were warm advocates of the Sabbath School cause. Committees from other Schools have several times waited upon us, with a view of establishing a friendly intercourse, and observing the plan of instruction pursued by us. Their feelings have been responded to, and we most cordially concur in any thing that may tend to promote a friendly feeling with other similar institutions, and secure co-operation in accomplishing the end that all have in view.

While we are spared the monuments of God's mercy, no less than five persons, who had been at some time associated with us, have fallen victims to the hand of the destroyer. Mr. Robert McCune and Miss Catharine R. Davis were last connected with the school in the capacity of teachers—and David Dickson, Margaret Ferguson, and Joseph F. Thorburn were pupils. These are solemn admonitions to the living: "Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh." Death recognises no distinctions of age or sex; some of us may, before the close of the present year be summoned to our final account. Let us, therefore, while in the enjoyment of health and strength, endeavour to give earnest heed to those things which will qualify us for the enjoyment of another and a better world when our race in this shall have been completed.

Your Librarians report that 2924 volumes have been loaned to the pupils, 1647 to the females, and 1277 to the males, that all these have been returned, with the exception of 78. Some hints have been thrown out requiring the attention of the teachers, which it is hoped will receive due consideration; a very little trouble would obviate all the evils and save expense to the Association, which must every year be incurred in the purchase of lost volumes. From the annual report of the Treasurer, the receipts during the year appear to have been $127.30, and payments $127.23, showing a balance of 7 cents on hand.

Five meetings of our Association have been held in the course of the year, the same individuals filling the offices as in the preceding one; elections for teachers were held on three several occasions, and eight persons were chosen: some of these did not remain long in the discharge of their duty. We were only favoured with two addresses, one by Mr. Alcorn, and one by Mr. John Woodside.

Mr. William S. Darragh, as our visiting agent, has succeeded well in this department: he has not only visited and brought back a goodly number of absentees, but also introduced many new scholars—his zeal and perseverance in this respect are highly commendable and worthy of imitation.

Both upon Christmas and New Year's days, public meetings of the school were held. On the former occasion, addresses upon the subject of missions were delivered by the Rev. Mr. Campbell and others. Five schools were invited to be present, but many were detained by the inclemency of the weather: on the latter occasion, the pupils were each presented with a book. Several interesting addresses were made, with a statement of the present condition of the school. The teachers also presented Mr. Campbell with a copy of the English Hexapla, accompanied with a suitable address as a mark of their esteem and attachment. The annual sermon to the school was delivered by Mr. Campbell, from the words, "I am the way," on the first Sabbath of the year, and listened to by a large concourse of the children and others.

We have attempted to give you a short sketch of the operations of the past year, and have succeeded only imperfectly. If any good has resulted from the efforts put forth, let us "thank God and take courage." An addition of ten was made to the communion from our school during that period: a cause of rejoicing to all, and particularly to those teachers who have pleaded earnestly at the throne of grace for the salvation of the children committed to their care. Let us resolve, at the commencement of this year, to be more zealous in the discharge of our duties to each other, and to our fellow-men, than we have ever heretofore been; and in imparting instructions to the youths, to place before them an example of a holy walk and conversation.

SOME INQUIRIES.

A correspondent has proposed to us the following inquiries, which we lay before our readers, as they suggest interesting subjects of consideration. Should any suitable communications be furnished to us in reply, they will appear in our pages at the earliest opportunity. The inquirer, we might add, is a Sabbath School teacher himself, and we presume his wish is, that the instructions given in such institutions, should be as far as possible of a religious character.

MESSRS. EDITORS:—Would you or some of your correspondents give an opinion on the following points:—

1. Who are the proper subjects of Sabbath School instruction?
2. What are the appropriate exercises of a Sabbath School in its meetings on the Lord's day?
3. Should such exercises as can be attended to on week days, be allowed in the Sabbath School on the Lord's day?

It certainly is not right that Sabbath School teachers, most of whom are laboriously engaged during the week, should sacrifice their time on the Sabbath, in communicating to children such instruction as they may receive in the public schools from properly qualified teachers employed for that purpose.

A SPIRITUAL TEST.—The sincerity of a true religious principle cannot be better known than by the readiness with which the thoughts advert to God, and the pleasure with which they are employed in devout exercises. And though a person may not always be so well pleased with hearing religious things talked of by others, whose different tastes, sentiments, or manner of expression, may have something disagreeable, yet if he have no inclination to think of them himself, or to converse with himself about them, he hath great reason to suspect that his heart is not right with God. But if he frequently and delightfully exercise his mind in divine contemplations, it will not only be a good mark of sincerity, but will habitually dispose it for the reception of the best and most useful thoughts, and fit it for the noblest entertainments. J. MASON.

LIVE FOR LIFE'S END.—God has written upon the flowers that sweeten the air—on the breeze that rocks the flowers on the stem—upon the rain-drop that refreshes the sprig of moss that lifts its head in the desert—upon the ocean that rocks every swimmer in its deep chamber—upon every pencilled shell that sleeps in the caverns of the deep, no less than upon the mighty sun that warms and cheers millions of creatures that live in its light—upon all his works he has written—“none of us liveth to himself.” And probably, were we wise enough to understand these works, we should find that there is nothing, from the cold stone in the earth, or the minutest creature that breathes—which may not, in some way or other, minister to the happiness of some living creature. We admire and praise the flower that best answers the end for which it was created, and the tree that bears fruit the most rich and abundant; the star that is most useful in the heavens we admire the most.

And is it not reasonable that man, to whom the whole creation, from the flower up to the spangled heavens, all minister—man, who has the power of conferring deeper misery and higher happiness, than any being on earth—man, who can act like God if he will; is it not reasonable that he should live for the noble end of living, not for himself, but for others?

SECRET OF BEING ALWAYS SATISFIED.—An Italian bishop having struggled through great difficulties without complaining, and met with much opposition in the discharge of his Episcopal functions, without ever betraying the least impatience, an intimate friend of his, who highly admired those virtues, which he conceived it impossible to imitate, one day asked the prelate if he could tell him the secret of being always easy. “Yes,” replied the old man, “I can teach you my secret, and will do so very readily. It consists in nothing more than in making great use of my eyes.” His friend begged him to explain. “Most willingly,” said the bishop. “In whatever state I am, I first of all look up to heaven, and remember that my principal business here is to get there: I then look down upon the earth, and call to mind the space I shall shortly occupy in it: I then look abroad into the world, and observe what multitudes there are who in all respects have more cause to be unhappy than myself. Thus I learn where true happiness is placed, where all our cares must end, and how very little reason I have to repine or complain.”

GLEANINGS FROM SIMEON.—“So congenial were the duties of the Lord’s day with his taste, that he generally appeared at the close of the day to be invigorated, rather than exhausted by them. ‘I am an eight-day clock,’ said he; ‘now I am wound up for another week!’”

"I have never thought," he said, "that the circumstance of God's having forgiven me, was any reason why I should forgive myself; on the contrary, I have always judged it better to loathe myself the more, in proportion as I was assured that God was pacified toward me. Nor have I been satisfied with viewing my sins, as men view the stars in a cloudy night—one here, and another there, with great intervals between; but have endeavoured to get, and to preserve continually before my eyes, such a view of them as we have of the stars in the brightest night; the greater and the smaller all intermingled, and forming, as it were, one continuous mass; nor yet as committed a long time ago, and in many successive years; but as all forming an aggregate of guilt, and needing the same measure of humiliation daily, as they needed at the very moment they were committed."

"I have said nothing to Mr. —, or to the vice-provost, or any in the College, about Mr. —'s conduct. It is the second blow that makes the battle. And what harm does it do me to be silent? To pass by a transgression is more becoming the gospel than to resent it."

"A man strikes me with a sword and inflicts a wound. Suppose, instead of binding up the wound, I am showing it to every body; and after it has been bound up, I am taking off the bandage continually, and examining the depth of the wound, and making it to fester, till my limb becomes greatly inflamed, and my general health is materially affected; is there a person in the world who would not call me a fool? Now such a fool is he, who, by dwelling upon little injuries, or insults, or provocations, causes them to agitate and inflame his mind. How much better were it to put a bandage over the wound, and never look at it again!"

"To a monotonous preacher who had asked him, after sermon, his opinion, he replied, 'Why, my dear brother—I am sure you will pardon me, you know it is all in love, my brother—but indeed it was just as if you were knocking on a warming-pan—tin, tin, tin, tin, without any intermission.'"

EVENING HOURS.—What have evening hours done for mechanics who had only ten hours' toil? What in the moral, what in the religious, what in the scientific world! Harken to these facts! One of the best editors the Westminster Review could ever boast, and one of the most brilliant writers of the passing hour, was a cooper in Aberdeen. One of the editors of a London daily journal was a baker in Elgin; perhaps the best reporter on the London Times was a weaver in Edinburgh; the editor of the Edinburgh Witness was a stone-mason. One of the ablest ministers in London was a blacksmith in Dundee; another was a watchmaker in Banff; the late Dr. Milne, of China, was a herd-boy in Rhynie; the principal of the London Missionary Society's College at Hong Kong was a saddler at Huntly; and one of the best missionaries that ever went to India was a tailor in Keith. The leading machinist on the London and Birmingham Railway, with 700*l.* a year, was a mechanic in Glasgow; and perhaps the richest iron-founder in England was a working man in Moray. Sir James Clarke, her Majesty's physician, was a druggist in Banff; Joseph Hume was a sailor; Mr. Macgregor, the member for Glasgow, was a poor boy in Ross-shire; James Wilson, the member for Westbury, was a ploughman in Haddington; and Arthur Anderson, the member for Orkney, earned his bread by the sweat of his brow in the Ultima Thule.—North of Scotland Gazette.

NOT TOO LATE, YOUNG MEN.—Handel was 48 before he gave the world assurance of a man; Dryden came up to London from the Provinces dressed in drugget somewhat above 30, and did not even then know that he could write a line of poetry; Milton was upwards of 50 when he began his great work; Cowper knew not his own might till he was far beyond his 30th year, and his Task was not written till near his 50th year; Sir Walter Scott was also upwards of 30 before he published his Minstrelsy, and all his greatness was yet to come.—Aird's "Old Bachelor."

SYSTEMATIC BENEVOLENCE.

DEAR MR. EDITOR,—For a long time it has been my design to call the attention of your readers, and of all the members of our churches, to the subject which has been selected as the head of this article. We do not now attempt a discussion of the subject of Christian benevolence, nor do we present arguments to show that all the friends and followers of Christ,—that all his real disciples, who are imitating His example who went about doing good, must, not only theoretically but practically, be benevolent characters, and thus take some active part in helping forward the efforts of the church to evangelize all lands. But taking this for granted, as a subject which has been frequently and fully discussed, and one which is acknowledged to be binding on all the members of the Christian church, we would now attempt to suggest a plan by which, we think, the tide of benevolence might be increased, and directed into those channels through which it ought to flow, in order to make glad the city of God,—to make the desert blossom as the rose.

We all must know that the prosecution of a good system is the secret of success in any enterprise, and that without system, the very best schemes are not likely to come to maturity, or to yield the results that might be anticipated. On this point all men of business are fully agreed. In this particular the people of the world are wise in their generation. Why should not Christians imitate them in the adoption of plans to accomplish benevolent ends? Heretofore, the church, in her attempts to raise the means for the support of her benevolent enterprises, has either been labouring under the disadvantage of having no system at all, or, at best, of pursuing those systems which experience has proved to be troublesome, expensive, and inefficient, and by no means adapted to the present state of the church, and the increased operations which she is carrying forward for the spread of the gospel and the good of men. During the last fifty years, the church of Christ has been putting forth increased efforts for the spread of his kingdom both at home and abroad; and as the work of benevolence is only in its infancy, she has been gradually, as it were, feeling the way to the hearts and consciences of her members. Probably the plans heretofore pursued were, on the whole, the best under these circumstances. The public mind had to be awakened and aroused from the sleep of ages. The selfish principle, natural to the hearts of all, had to be attacked, and right principles and motives to be urged by men of eloquence. Agents were sent forth to make warm and powerful appeals to the feelings and sympathies of Christians—to depict the horrors of heathenism—to urge the obligation of obedience to the Saviour's last command—to present the claims of hundreds of millions of pagans perishing without the gospel, and the claims, too, of those in nominally Christian lands, who are living without God and without hope in the world. These labours to awake up the church have, in some degree, been blessed. Some generous hearts have been opened, and liberal contributions have been made by a few; but, as yet, benevolence is confined to a few, and not even all of them contribute systematically. Heretofore the benevolence of the church has been spasmodic—more the result of feelings excited, than of enlightened Christian principle. Now, however, that the church is breaking forth on the right hand and the left, and that she actually attempts the conversion of the world to God, by the employment of divinely appointed means, it does seem to me, that she cannot afford to go on much longer in the old way. As the time has come for an increase of effort, she must greatly increase her means and her resources. For this, a scheme more simple, and one which will embrace the benevolence of the whole church, seems imperatively demanded at the present time.

What we have to propose, therefore, is something like the following. Let all the ministers in our church preach on the subject of Christian benevolence, and from time to time bring before their congregations the importance of the various schemes approved of by the church. Let them urge upon all professors of religion the duty of doing something, and according to their ability, for the promotion of every good cause. Let this duty be enforced on principles of love to God and man—of gratitude for distinguishing favours freely received through Christ, and as an essential part of Christian duty—or rather of privilege to which Christ admits his people, as co-workers with himself. Let it be shown that the work of benevolence is not one which Christians may do or not do, just as it suits their own inclination or convenience, but that it is one which ought to bind their consciences, and that it is only acting out in practice the profession which all have made to obey Christ, and to imitate him “who though he was rich, yet for our sakes became poor, that we through his poverty might be rich.” The way having been prepared, let a book be provided, in the margin of which all the names of communicants shall be entered. Let other columns be ruled and headed for all the benevolent objects that ought to claim attention. Then let a day be appointed for the congregation to assemble. Let all, before coming, decide, in their closets, at a throne of grace, and in view of the wants of the world, the love of Christ, and their individual obligations and ability, the whole amount they may be able to contribute, after the support of the ordinances among themselves, and then let them divide that sum to all or any of the objects contemplated, and in such proportions as their judgments may dictate. Those who may wish to make this distribution without any reference to what others may do, could send a memorandum of the sums to be given to the respective objects. Let all give something—the poor widow her cents—the man of competence his dollars—the man of wealth his hundreds or thousands of dollars. Let the stock of benevolence to be raised be one in which every Christian will be a shareholder. It is a safe investment. It is treasure laid up in heaven. A stock that will never fall—one that will pay a hundredfold in the present life, and still more in a future world.

That the plan suggested above may be better understood, we give an example of the manner in which the book might be prepared, and in which it is likely it would be filled up:

Annual amount of contributions for benevolent purposes in the congregation of —

The importance of benevolent objects strikes Christian people differently. Some view the work of domestic missions as of more importance than that of foreign missions. Others again, in view of the vast amount of means employed in Christian lands, and the utter destitution of the heathen, and the fact that so much is done for the one cause more than for the other, feel disposed to contribute all to foreign missions. The plan we have proposed would meet the wishes of all. As every man purposeth in his heart, so he could give. There need be no invidious comparisons made. All can do something, and in the way they may think proper. Every subscriber can have an opportunity of modifying his subscription annually. Those whose means have been reduced can lessen their subscription, if they feel so disposed, while others, whom the Lord hath prospered, may have an opportunity of increasing their thank-offering to his service. The names of all communicants should be written down in the book, as an intimation that something, less or more, is expected from all—and if they come not forward voluntarily, they should be visited by a committee. Those who are not communicants should have an opportunity of contributing to the cause. The children of the congregation might have a juvenile missionary society, auxiliary to the congregation, or they should be encouraged to make private contributions, as individuals, or in the Sabbath schools. One or two days in the year could be appointed to pay subscriptions, and the deacons of the church could receive them, and attend to this whole business. Of course, any congregation adopting this plan could enlarge or diminish the objects of benevolence to suit themselves; but all that is done should be reported annually to presbytery, and by presbytery to synod. This plan, if we mistake not, would draw forth the benevolence of the churches in a better way than any that has heretofore been adopted. It would make every minister and session agents for the cause, and save a great amount of labour and expense that is now incurred; while it would bring into the treasury of the Lord an amount of funds of which we have now but little conception. The church would not, as now, be acting from impulses received at distant periods, and of momentary duration, but, like the human body in a healthy state, her pulsations would be regular. The blood brought to the heart through a thousand secret channels, and in a constant stream, would be sent out in all directions, to give life and vigour to the whole system. She might then expect that the King of Zion would approve of her sacrifices, and bless her efforts for the conversion of the world. Will not all ministers and sessions try this plan, which is so simple in itself, and so likely to produce the happiest results? C.

SACRED MUSIC.

MR. EDITOR:—The remarks made in a late number of the Banner relative to Sacred Music have given me great pleasure. I see no reason why the advocates of Scripture Psalmody should be behind in applying to it the sweet and harmonious sounds which the voice is capable of producing. I have long wished to see some well directed effort made to diffuse among our people a practical knowledge of music, since very little can be obtained by the usual mode of instruction.

Mr. J. B. Aikin, (whose work on the subject was noticed with commendation in the last number of the Banner,) has done much to extend a knowledge of music by forming a system of notation which obviates a great number of the difficulties by which many have hitherto been deterred from attempting the study. Every one at all acquainted with the science of music must know how unintelligible written music is without a long course of study; but this new system, to use the words of Dr. Parker, is capable of conveying in a few days such a knowledge as would require several months in the usual mode of instruction; in the language of Dr. Newton of Mississippi, it is indeed “the only consistent and intelligible system that has ever been devised.”

The plan adopted by our brethren in Dr. McLeod’s congregation in New York is worthy of praise, yet I think it would be much better to publish separately a small collection of tunes in Mr. Aikin’s notation along with suitable elementary instructions. They could be furnished at a very low price, and might be introduced into every congregation, and I feel confident that the ignorance which now so lamentably prevails, would disappear, and instead of the monotonous drone which we so often hear, and which is calculated to prevent, not to animate devotion, we would be delighted with “grave, sweet melody,” accordant with the physical endowments which our Creator has bestowed upon us, and honouring to him whom we adore. Individuals of different ages and sexes would each have their appropriate part in the exercises, and the lad with his sweet alto voice, the female with the soprano, or leading melody, the adult males with the bass, or, if of a shriller kind, the tenor, would all unite harmoniously in the praise of God. Inharmonious and discordant tones would no longer interfere with each other and disturb the mind; the heart would be disposed to unite with pleasure in singing the divine praises, and He who has given us so much reason to show forth the glory of his name, and who certainly has not left it optional or a matter of indifference, how any more than what we sing to his praise, would be honoured with the outward and audible evidence of our veneration, as well as with the inward and spiritual devotions of our hearts.

HINTS ON HEALTH.

Avoid excess of food, as the principal cause of dyspepsia. Five or six hours should elapse between meals. Do not hurry from dinner to business; rest a while afterward. Never eat things out of season, nor much of dishes to which you are unaccustomed. Much liquid at dinner delays digestion. Avoid intemperance. Water is the most wholesome beverage. Fermented liquors are highly injurious. Useful exertion is indispensable to health and happiness. Muscular exercise, well regulated, is conducive to longevity. The sedentary should walk whenever they have an opportunity. Never continue exercise after it has become painful. Standing at a high desk to write when fatigued with sitting, will be found highly beneficial to literary men. The constant use of soft stuffed seats is injurious. Rooms in which the sedentary are employed, should be warmed by fires in open grates, which assist ventilation; not by steam, hot water, gas, or close ovens. Never stand or sit with your back to the fire. Mental excitement is one of the most prevalent causes of disease, producing dyspepsia, monomania, and insanity. Few things tend more to the preservation of health, and the prolongation of life, than the maintenance of a calm, clear, and contented state of mind, and the cultivation of feelings of affection. Mental inactivity is scarcely less injurious than excessive exercise, giving rise to hypochondriasis. In the choice of professions, the talents, dispositions, and natural bent of mind of the individuals ought to be studied.—Curtis on the Preservation of Health.

MERLE D'AUBIGNE A REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN.

By the following article, which we find in a late number of the Scottish Guardian, it will be seen that the celebrated Dr. Merle D'Aubigne, the author of the well known history of the Reformation, claims to be a Reformed Presbyterian. Of course, we do not suppose he means a member of our particular denomination, whose very name may be perhaps unknown to him, though with the principles and struggles of our covenanting ancestors he is very familiar. We refer to his letter merely as an illustration of the comprehensive and liberal character of the name which we bear, and which might serve to designate all Christian churches which are Calvinistic in their doctrine and Presbyterian in their discipline. The time, we hope, is not far distant, when their increased conformity to the Scriptural model will render all such one, under whatever name.

MERLE D'AUBIGNE.—In the last number of the Evangelical Christendom we observe a letter from this celebrated historian, in which he complains of having been represented in that periodical as an Independent, and loudly proclaims himself an out and out Presbyterian. We give the following extract:

“One thing I know, to wit, that with the help of God, I shall never be a member or a minister of any other than the Reformed Church: I must even go further and say, of the Reformed Presbyterian Church—the Church of my fathers—the Church of my Reformers. I love my Episcopalian brethren; I love my Congregationalist brethren; I am happy to be of one heart with them in Christ our Lord. But I cannot be changed to an Episcopalian, notwithstanding some amiable and gentle insinuations; I cannot be changed into a Congregationalist, notwithstanding the indication of your European intelligence. I am not fond of those 'waves driven with the wind and tossed,' and I remember the apostolic exhortation—'Let us hold fast our profession.' I am, therefore, and I will, Deo juvante, remain till the end, and by grace only, first of all a Christian, then a Reformed Christian, and thirdly, a Presbyterian—one without bigotry, but without wavering. The brethren of the Free Church of Scotland are now independent of the State and of the Established General Assembly, and yet it cannot be said that they belong to the Independent Church."

WHAT TEMPERANCE SOCIETIES HAVE DONE.—There are now, says the Albany Spectator, more than 1,500,000 people in the United States who abstain from the use of ardent spirits, and from furnishing it to others; more than 5,000 Temperance Societies, embracing more than 600,000 members. More than 2000 distilleries have been stopped; more than 5000 merchants have ceased from the traffic. It is estimated that 30,000 persons are now sober, who, had it not been for the Temperance Societies, would have been sots; and that at least 20,000 families are now in ease and comfort, who would otherwise have been in poverty and disgraced by drunken inmates.

Ecclesiastical Intelligence.

EASTERN REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN SYNOD—IRELAND.

We have been kindly permitted to publish the following extracts of a recent letter from Rev. J. Nevin. The prosperity which appears to attend the operations of our Irish brethren amidst the general depression of the country, furnishes reason for great gratitude to our heavenly Father, while it also evinces the existence of a strong and healthy spiritual life in the ministers and members of the church. May they all continue richly to receive the divine blessing, which truly enricheth, and wherewith there is added no sorrow.

"I am glad to be able to inform you that our sustentation-fund scheme has succeeded beyond our expectations. We had commenced the experiment in very unpropitious circumstances—in a season of unsurpassed distress in Ireland. We had to contend against long established usages, and prejudices strengthened by them in the minds of our own people, and against the influence of a pernicious example from endowed and established churches around us; and though we have met with little direct opposition, yet we had to endure not a little of the passive resistance of apathy and indifference. Still we have succeeded in raising £80 a-piece to our settled ministers, and £50 each to our preachers.

"At the synod, in Derry, in July, I was appointed to visit the congregations, and co-operate with the ministers and elders in the formation of missionary associations among the youth. I have been through the congregations of the Belfast Presbytery, and the matter has every where been taken up with considerable spirit. In looking at the state of our youth, and observing that numbers were leaving for other denominations, or to walk no more with the friends of Jesus in any connexion; and that others were growing up in comparative ignorance and indifference; and some had grown to be men and women without seeking the privileges of the church, I was led, upon consultation with others, to suggest the formation of juvenile classes in each congregation, and am happy to say, that this is a measure now pretty generally adopted. In each congregation there are to be two classes, a senior and a junior. The senior consisting of such non-communicants as should be in the enjoyment of the full privileges of the church; and, the junior, of persons younger than these. These classes to be regularly and systematically attended to by ministers and elders, as it may be arranged, and at such times, morning, evening, or interval on the Sabbath, as may be agreed upon by the sessions, and only to be held for a short time, say half an hour, at first, so as not to exhaust patience or throw obstacles in the way of those at a distance being present. In the Belfast Presbytery the senior or communicants' class embraces, in some congregations, twenty, in others, thirty, and in one seventy-three names in the list, and the junior class still more. In three of the societies here, Lorker, Glencar, and Letterkenny, we have got fourteen names for the senior and twenty-eight for the junior. The other societies are yet to be visited. We have got eighteen collectors in these three societies, which collectors we are employing, as far as our means will enable us, in the work of tract distribution, supplying them with missionary, temperance and religious tracts. By the juvenile classes we aim at training our youth to think upon their obligations, and to feel them—and by our missionary associations and operations we wish to get the habit formed of carrying out these obligations in a practical way. We trust that such an organization, by the divine blessing accompanying it, will tell upon the intelligence, piety, zeal and usefulness of the rising generation in our church. Already, indeed, I can perceive it telling in several localities of our church, in the deeper interest it has excited in young minds in the cause of the Redeemer.

"There is one small congregation, (in Ballymoney,) consisting of forty members, which has raised £40 for our sustentation-fund; £11 some shillings for our missionary fund; £20 of a special collection on one occasion, and £5 on another, during the last year. I have been present, lately, at the annual meeting (a tea-party,) of that congregation, and the happiness that seemed to be enjoyed by all present demonstrated the connexion established between duty and privilege. When we get all the congregations working, we expect to be able to supply our vacancies and missionary stations without drawing upon our sustentation fund at all for the support of our probationers.

"In this congregation your absence is sadly felt; but there are a goodly number of youth who, by the system of training we aim at, may by and by, make up the loss sustained by the congregation, to some extent.

We are engaged in working out a most interesting experiment for the church in this country. Our Regium Donum brethren are looking on with deep interest. Some of them would wish to see us sink, but others, I have no doubt, are anxious for our success, as a great means of emancipating the church. If we can succeed in establishing, by our example, the truth that the gospel has a self-supporting power, and a self-extending power, then Regium Donum and the establishment will be more imperiled by our success than by any act or measure brought to bear against them for ages past. Our success will have far more weight than that of the Free Church, for they are a larger and wealthier body, we a small and poor body; and therefore our success will be more remarkable, and will tell more against these state allowances than if we were to talk against them for a century. Already has our example been held up to the Assembly as a model for their imitation—and from quarter to be least of all expected as willing to create it, namely, the government itself!

“The ministers of the Assembly had asked the government for the Regium Donum this year without the people being required to pay, as formerly, £35 of stipends, and politely hinted the necessity of an augmentation of the bounty. The government refused the request, and referred them to the fact that notwithstanding the pressure of the times, the Eastern Reformed Presbyterian Church has greatly increased its stipends.’ The government report shows that forty-one furthings—head is the amount of stipend paid by the people of the Assembly for the support of the gospel. The correspondence of the government with the Assembly has been published and circulated far and wide; and in England, Ireland, and Scotland its contents have been extensively discussed, greatly to the mortification of our brethren of the Assembly; for neither the Derry Standard nor the Banner of Ulster has spoken upon the subject at all. The government report and correspondence has been published and commented on by the Whig and News Letter, by the Scotsman, Nonconformist, and Christian Witness, and the London Chronicle says ‘The disclosures made in it of the Irish Presbyterian Church have given a heavy blow to endowments.’”

REV. R. J. BLACK.

It gives us great pleasure to be able to state that Rev. R. J. Black, who was obliged to leave his congregation on account of ill health, has arrived in Trinidad, West Indies, the place of his destination. His health was very much improved, and he anticipated a reunion with his flock about the beginning of the month of May. In our next number we expect to publish some interesting communications which have been received from him.

Foreign Missions.

MR. CAMPBELL'S TOUR.

Rev. Mr. Campbell has commenced his missionary tour, as announced in our last number. He has visited Milton, Pa., where he met with the kindest reception and encouraging success. When last heard from, he had reached Pittsburgh, and had been preaching to large assemblies, who evinced much interest in the cause, and from whom it was expected he would meet with substantial aid. The stage in which he was travelling had been overturned, but he had escaped without the slightest injury. He proposes to prosecute his tour according to the arrangement already published, and it is hoped he will everywhere be “received with gladness, and esteemed very highly in love for his work’s sake.”

THE PROPOSED EFFORT.

It is important that all the friends of missions in our church should understand correctly the nature of the effort in which the Executive Committee of the Board are now engaged. At the last meeting of Synod, the application to be sent to India by Messrs. Hill and Woodside was approved by Synod, and, without a single dissenting voice the Board were directed to ascertain if the means required could be procured, and if so, that the candidates should be sent out. The committee have been prosecuting the work which Synod assigned to them. Having appointed Mr. Campbell their agent for the purpose, he has been most zealously and diligently, and we are happy to be able to add, most successfully engaged in procuring subscriptions both for the outfit and the annual salaries. As yet, however, we cannot tell whether the amount needed can be obtained, although there is good reason to suppose it will. While, therefore, the experiment has been in progress, no engagement has been made with the candidates, nor has the church been in any way committed or pledged. The state of the case is, simply, if the means be obtained, the men will be sent; if not, we cannot send them. It is hoped that all the true friends of missions among us will give their aid, as by the amount and the speediness of their contributions, the question will be determined. When we reflect how many millions of our fellow-men are perishing for lack of knowledge, can we withhold our aid? While we feel it to be our imperative duty to support the church at home, we should not forget that the heathen are far more destitute than any in our own land, and should not be neglected. But we do not regard any thing done for foreign missions as being taken away from home operations, but as something extra which the church is well able to afford, and which, in its reflex influence, will greatly benefit the church in our own land. Let us prove the LORd, and see if he will not pour out a blessing so great that there shall not be room to receive it.

NOVA SCOTIA.

This peninsula, about two hundred and eighty miles long, and seventy-five miles broad, settled principally by a hardy, frugal, and enterprising people,—a large number being emigrants from Ireland and Scotland,—presents a very interesting field of missionary operations, and a considerable time ago attracted the attention of our brethren of the Irish Reformed Presbyterian Church. About twenty years since, Rev. Alexander Clarke was sent out by that Synod, and during that time he has been labouring with great diligence and success. On his arrival in his present field of labour, he found there but one professed Covenanter, and not a Presbyterian Church of any kind in two entire counties. At present, there are many stations where preaching is regularly maintained, and four houses of worship, with a fifth in progress, and near two hundred communicants. Mr. Clarke still stands alone, and is not able to supply the pressing and promising calls made for ministerial services. A wide door and an effectual is opened in this region, and we hope some will be found willing to enter. The developments of Divine Providence seem to authorize the church to say, "Whom shall we send, and who will go for us?" Is there any one who will reply "Here am I, send me?"

For the Young.

HOW TO DO GOOD.—HINTS FOR THE YOUNG.

When our blessed Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ came from heaven to earth to save sinners, he went about doing good. All that love him wish to be like him, and to do good.

Perhaps you will say, "I hope to do good when I grow up; but what can I do now, when I am but a little child?"

If I tell you, will you try? If not, I would advise you to pass over this article for the present, and to keep it quite safe until you can make up your mind; for the Bible says, "To him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin." You will try? Then I will tell you how a child may do good.

Do you not know some poor man living near you who cannot read? He sits all day by the fire-side, for he is infirm, and not able to work. Poor man, the hours pass away heavily, for his wife has enough to do to mind the house, and his children are at work, so that he has no one to be with him, to talk to him, or to comfort him.

When you are at home, after school, say, "Please, dear mother, may I go and see the poor man at —, or the sick child at —, or the poor woman that keeps her bed at —." Then, if you have leave, go and take your Bible, and ask if you may read to them. Be careful to read very slowly and distinctly. O! how glad it would make many a heavy heart, if once or twice in the week you would try to do good in this way!

There is another way to do good. You know that there are some places in the world where the people worship idols, and where they know nothing about the Lord Jesus Christ, the only Saviour of sinners. Now cannot you do something to send missionaries and Bibles to these poor heathen? Can you not get a little purse, and call it your missionary purse, and when you get any money given to you, put it into this purse for the heathen, and see if you cannot get some persons to give you something for this purpose?

But I will tell you another way in which you may do good. Most likely you know some children in your street who do not go to Sabbath school; say to them, "We are so happy at our Sabbath school: I wish you would come with me. Our minister comes to see us, and our teacher is very kind. Shall I go in and ask at your house whether you may come to school with me, and then I can call for you in the morning as I go by?"

Perhaps in this way you might bring some children to school, who, if left to themselves, would grow up ignorant, and idle, and wicked.

Trying to do good to others is the right way to make one-self happy; for it is very sad to idle away the hours which will never return again. Your teacher will tell you how you may do good at school; but, after all, home is the place where most good may be done. To obey a parent is to do good; to be kind to a brother or a sister is to do good; even to play kindly, and at the proper time, is to do good. So you see it is quite in the power of a very little child to do good. In short, if the matter be ever so small, "to do the right thing in the right way" is to do good.

I have said a few words about the right thing, now a few words concerning the right way. By the right way I do not mean the "best method," though this is important, but that a "new heart and a right spirit" are the most needful of all; for the "Lord looketh on the heart." Pray then earnestly that the Holy Spirit of God may dwell in you, for without him you can do nothing that is good.

Notices of New Publications.

Memoirs of Rev. Thomas Halyburton, Professor of Divinity in the University of St. Andrew's, with an Appendix, embracing an Account of the Church of Scotland during his times. Issued by the Committee of the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland. Edinburgh, pp. 320. 12mo. For sale by the Presbyterian Board of Publication, price 44 cents.

The biography of eminent individuals is both interesting and useful. Principles are presented not in an abstract form, but in connexion with conduct, and we are thus better able to understand and also to apply them. The lives of genuine believers, who are the excellent of the earth, possess peculiar attractions for all who are endeavouring to be followers of those who through faith and patience inherit the promises, and their memoirs are read with greater attention and profit when they contain not merely the details of outward conduct, but also unveil the inner man. The disclosures which are thus made of the spiritual exercises of the heart under the influences of the divine SPIRIT, are calculated to enlighten the ignorant, to undeceive those who are cherishing false hopes, and to encourage those who are sincerely and earnestly seeking eternal life. The desponding believer who has been depressed with a view of his corruption and guilt, will find that all hearts are alike, and that no strange thing happens to him when he is thus tried; while the means which have brought peace and joy to one will suggest to another what course he should pursue. The book of which the title is given above is a very valuable experimental guide. It is the biography, we might almost say the autobiography, of an eminent saint; and while perhaps, in some places, the style and language might have been amended to suit a more refined age, it forms an excellent closet companion, and we hope will be procured and read by all.

Germany, England, and Scotland. By J. H. Merle D'Aubigné, D. D. New York, Carter. Pp. 371. 12mo.

The History of the Reformation, by Dr. Merle D'Aubigné is so well known and so greatly admired, that any thing from his pen needs no recommendation. This work is an account of a tour which he made, a few years ago, at the time when the disruption of the Scotch Established Church took place, and the Free Church was formed. The principal part of the volume is devoted to this event, which is traced to its origin, and shown to be the proper development of the genuine principles of the old Covenanters. The work, unlike most travelling recollections, is not made up of such information as may be obtained from guide-books, and similar sources, but is full of the most interesting reflections on men, manners, principles, events, &c., written in a kind and liberal Christian spirit, and with the philosophic discrimination which the author possesses in such an eminent degree. The chapter on Germany was to us particularly interesting, from the fact that a distinct, full and accurate account of the religious state of that country has been so hard to get. In an appendix there is an account of late movements in the Russo-Greek church, in connexion with the Lutherans and Moravians. The whole work is instructive and agreeable.

The Highland Pastor; a Sequel to George Somerville. Phila., Am. S. S. Union. Pp. 197. 18mo.

This is an excellent work, showing how much good may be done even in a retired situation, if there is a willing mind. We wish all our readers would peruse it, as it would tend to lead them to greater activity in every good word and work. For young ministers and for old ones too, it contains very valuable hints, and we do not hesitate to recommend it, even to those engaged in so high an office, since the works published by the Union are nearly all of such a nature as not to be beneath the attention of the oldest, while not above the capacity of the youngest.

An Exposition of the Assembly's Catechism, with Practical Inferences from each Question. By Rev. J. Flavel. Phila., W. S. Young. Pp. 246. 12mo. Price 38 cts. single; $4, per doz.

We are glad to see an American edition of this excellent and rare work. The name of its author, so well known for his "Touchstone," and "Keeping the Heart," excites expectations of its excellence which a close inspection will not disappoint. Questions are asked on each answer in the Shorter Catechism, and the important truths deduced and exhibited are established by passages of scripture. The work is well suited to Sabbath schools and Bible classes. The introduction and notes of the American editor are judicious and appropriate, and add much to its value.

The Duty of Prayer Recommended, with some thoughts upon societies for Prayer and Religious Conference. By Alexander Pringle. Second American Edition. Philadelphia, Wm. S. Young. Pp. 72. 12mo. Price 12½ cts.

This tract contains a great amount of valuable matter. It treats briefly of ejaculatory, secret, family, public, and social prayer, and presents many excellent suggestions. The chapter on social prayer, containing observations on its propriety and advantages, with some judicious rules for the regulation of fellowship meetings is especially important, since this very useful and divinely appointed means of grace is now so lamentably neglected.

Remember Eli; a Solemn Call to Parents. By Rev. R. M. M'Cheyne. Presbyterian Board of Publication. Pp. 12. 18mo. Price two cents each, single, $1,60 per 100.

This affectionate and solemn call upon parents to attend to their duties to their children was published in the Banner for January, 1847, and will doubtless be well remembered by all who read it. It is written with that "unction" for which its writer was so remarkable. At present, when so many parents act as if their children had no souls, as if there was no heaven, no place of future, endless misery, its earnest warnings are much needed. We wish every parent would read it.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSIONS.

THE MEDIATOR OF THE BETTER COVENANT.

The distance between the Creator and the creatures he has made, ever has been, and always must be infinite. In the case of holy beings, however, this distance, while it would excite the deepest solemnity and veneration, would not make them reluctant to approach their God. But in the case of sinful creatures it is different: the idea of coming into the presence of a Being of perfect holiness and unlimited power, is dreadful. Hence we read that the devils fear and tremble, and we find, when our first parents had fallen from their original purity, they "hid themselves from the presence of the Lord." To this same feeling also, we must ascribe the numerous Deities and demi-gods which the heathen interposed between themselves and the Supreme Being; and we find the same feeling displayed in the church of Rome, which has so many mediators between God and man. The superstitious reverence which some Protestants pay to the ministerial order, arises, in some measure at least, from the operation of the same principle.

Now, while the Scriptures recognise the existence of such a feeling in the human mind, and hence the need of some party to come in between the sinner, and a holy, but offended God, they tell us of but "one Mediator between God and man, the man CHRIST JESUS." "He is the Mediator of the better covenant." (Heb. ix. 6.)

The term mediator means a person who comes in the midst, one who stands between two parties. The word is not found in the Old Testament Scriptures, although in the Greek translation it is used for that Hebrew word which we translate "days-man." Job ix. 33. It is found frequently in the New Testament. (1 Tim. ii. 5; Heb. viii. 6; ix. 15; xii. 24; Gal. iii. 19, 20.) In every instance but the two last mentioned, it is applied to CHRIST. The apostle Paul expressly calls "Jesus, the Mediator of the new Covenant." Heb. xiii. 15.

There is, indeed, in the nature of the term, nothing which confines the mediatorial office to one individual. Any person who endeavours to reconcile two of his fellow-men who have been at variance, is a mediator between them; and any one who is commissioned as a messenger from God to man to declare to sinners the will of the Supreme Being, and call upon them to be reconciled to their Maker, is a mediator between God and man. Hence we find the term applied to Moses, as in

Gal. iii. 19, 20, where the apostle has been speaking of the covenant made with Israel at Sinai, and says that "it was ordained by angels in the hands of a Mediator," meaning, as is generally supposed, that Moses was a mediator because he came between God and the Israelites on that occasion. It has, however, been affirmed that CHRIST was a Mediator only in the same sense as Moses, or any of the prophets that sustained this character, that is, because he, like they, was a messenger from God to man. But the apostle Paul plainly teaches us that there was something special in his mediatorial office—that He possessed something in that capacity which distinguished him from all other mediators;—he tells, (1 Tim. ii. 5,) "There is one Mediator between God and man." If Moses, and Elijah, and Daniel were mediators in the same sense as CHRIST, how could there have been but one Mediator? There must have been many mediators.

In what then consists the difference between the LORD JESUS CHRIST as Mediator, and others who have borne that name? We think not so much in the general design of their mission, since in the case of all, the object was to reconcile man to God, but in something connected with the person who bore the office. The mediatorial person of the LORD JESUS CHRIST was different from that of any other Mediator.

He possessed a divine nature. The Scriptures in almost innumerable passages represent him as divine: thus, John i. 1, "The Word," JESUS CHRIST, "was God," 1 Tim. iv. 16, "God was manifest in the flesh." All divine attributes are ascribed to him. We must set aside the plainest meaning of words, if we deny the doctrine that JESUS CHRIST was divine. But it is equally true that he possessed also a human nature. The fact is proved in the terms applied to him, as when he is called "the man, CHRIST JESUS," when it is said, the "Word was made flesh," and by the many evidences his history presents that he exercised the various properties peculiar to the human mind and the human body. He perceived, understood, remembered—he was pleased and displeased—he approved and condemned—he was hungry, and athirst, and weary—he partook of food—he slept. It is certain that his body was not a mere phantom, but a true body, connected with a reasonable soul.

But while "he was made like to his brethren," one thing is excepted, "he was without sin." The guilt and corruption derived from man's apostacy in Eden, did not descend to him, because it was by extraordinary generation he was brought into the world, and being born of the HOLY GHOST he was "a holy" person, Luke i. 35. His whole character, as well as the express declarations of the Scriptures, prove that "he did no sin, neither was any guile found in his mouth." 1 Pet. ii. 22.

Yet while our blessed Saviour possessed two distinct natures, he had but one, a divine person. There is indeed an absurdity in the idea of two persons. If there is but one CHRIST—but one Mediator, of course there must be but one person. The necessity of the case, too, requires us to admit this: the divine person, the second person of the Trinity, could not divest himself of his Essential Deity, he must necessarily continue to exist, and to exist as a divine person; nor could a human person be united with the divine person, there would then be a new son in the Godhead, a new Divinity. Besides, if the person was human, how could the infinite wrath of God have been endured, and what right could one, who as a creature, if human, was already under law, have to suffer on behalf of others? So absurd is the tenet that it is wonderful any have ever maintained it.

We do not, indeed, know the nature of the union of the divine and human natures in the one divine person. It is a mystery beyond human, probably beyond all created comprehension—let us not “break through to gaze.” Where angels veil their faces with their wings, let us not proudly attempt to understand. Enough is known to convince us of the excellency of his person, and that he is, indeed, worthy of the highest homage, love, and service of all intelligent creatures.

“YE SHALL NOT SURELY DIE.”

A SHORT SERMON, BY REV. LEMUEL HAYNES.

The Holy Scriptures are a peculiar fund of instruction. They inform us of the origin of creation; of the primitive state of man; of his fall, or apostacy from God. It appears that he was placed in the garden of Eden, with full liberty to regale himself with all the delicious fruits that were to be found, except what grew on one tree; if he ate of that, he should surely die, was the declaration of the Almighty.

Happy were the human pair amid this delightful paradise, until a certain Preacher, in his journey, came that way, and disturbed their peace and tranquillity by endeavouring to reverse the prohibition of the Almighty, as in our text—“Ye shall not surely die.”

“She pluck’d, she ate;
Earth felt the wound; and nature from her seat,
Sighing through all her works, gave signs of woe
That all was lost.”—MILTON.

We may attend to the character of the preacher—to the doctrine inculcated—to the hearer addressed—to the medium or instrument of the preaching.

1. As to the PREACHER, I would observe, he has many names given him in the sacred writings: the most common is the Devil. That it was he that disturbed the happiness of our first parents is evident from 2 Cor. xi. 3, and many other passages of Scripture. He was once an angel of light, and knew better than to preach such doctrine; he did violence to his own reason.

But to be a little more particular, let it be observed,

1. He is an old preacher. He lived about one thousand seven hundred years before Abraham—above two thousand four hundred and thirty years before Moses—four thousand and four years before Christ. It is now five thousand eight hundred and nine years since he commenced preaching. By this time he must have acquired great skill in the art.

2. He is a very cunning, artful preacher. When Elymas, the sorcerer, came to turn away people from the faith, he is said to be full of all subtlety, and a child of the devil—not only because he was an enemy of all righteousness, but on account of his carnal cunning and craftiness.

3. He is a very laborious, unwearied preacher. He has been in the ministry almost six thousand years, and yet his zeal is not in the least abated. The apostle Peter compares him to a roaring lion, walk- ing about, seeking whom he may devour. When God inquired of this persevering preacher, Job ii. 2, "From whence camest thou?" he "answered the Lord, and said, From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it." He is far from being circumscribed within the narrow limits of parish, state, or continental lines; but his haunt and travel is very large and extensive.

4. He is a heterogeneous preacher, if I may so express myself.—He makes use of a Bible when he holds forth, as in his sermon to our Saviour, Matt. iv. 6. He mixes truth with error, in order to make it go well, or to carry his point.

5. He is a very presumptuous preacher. Notwithstanding God had declared in the most plain and positive terms, "Thou shalt surely die,"—or, "In dying thou shalt die,"—yet this audacious wretch had the impudence to confront Omnipotence, and say, "Ye shall not surely die!"

6. He is a very successful preacher. He draws a great number after him. No preacher can command hearers like him. He was successful with our first parents—with the old world. Noah once preached to those spirits that are now in the prison of hell, and told them from God that they should surely die; but this preacher came along and declared the contrary—"Ye shall not surely die." The greater part, it seems, believed him, and went to destruction. So it was with Sodom and Gomorrah—Lot preached to them; the substance of which was, "Up, get ye out of this place; for the Lord will destroy this city." Gen. xix. 14. But this old declaimer told them, No danger! no danger! "Ye shall not surely die." To which they generally gave heed; and Lot seemed to them as one who mocked—they believed the Universal preacher, and were consumed—agreeably to the declaration of the apostle Jude, "Sodom and Gomorrah, and the cities about them, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire."

II. Let us attend to THE DOCTRINE inculcated by this preacher, "Ye shall not surely die." Bold assertion! without a single argument to support it. The death contained in the threatening was doubtless eternal death; as nothing but this would express God's feelings towards sin, or render an infinite atonement necessary. If it were temporal death, and this was the curse of the law, then believers are not delivered from it, as Paul asserts that they are. Galatians iii. 13. What Satan meant to preach was, that there is no hell, and that the wages of sin is not death, but eternal life.

III. We shall now take notice of the hearer addressed by this preacher. This we have in the context—"And the serpent said unto the woman, Ye shall not surely die." That Eve had not so much experience as Adam, is evident; and so she was not equally able to withstand temptation. This doubtless was a reason why the tempter chose her, with whom he might hope to be successful. Probably he took a time when she was separated from her husband.

That this preacher has had the greatest success in the dark and ignorant parts of the earth, is evident; his kingdom is a kingdom of darkness. He is a great enemy to light. St. Paul gives us some account of him in his day, 2 Tim. iii. 6, "For of this sort are they which creep into houses, and lead captive silly women, laden with sins, led away with divers lusts." The same apostle observes, Rom. xvi. 17, 18, "Now, I beseech you, brethren, mark them which cause divisions and offences contrary to the doctrine which ye have learned, and avoid them. For they that are such, serve not our Lord Jesus Christ, but their own belly; and by good words and fair speeches deceive the hearts of the simple."

IV. The instrument or medium made use of by the preacher will now be considered. This we have in the context—"And the SERPENT said unto the woman, Ye shall not surely die." But how came the devil to preach through the serpent?

1. To save his own character, and the better to carry his point.—Had the devil come to our first parents personally and unmasked, they would have more easily seen the deception. The reality of a future punishment is at times so clearly impressed on the human mind, that even Satan is constrained to own that there is a hell, although at other times he denies it. He does not wish to have it known that he is a liar; therefore he conceals himself, that he may the better accomplish his designs and save his own character.

2. The devil is an enemy to all good, to all happiness and excellence. He is opposed to the happiness of the brutes. He took delight in tormenting the swine. The serpent, before he set up preaching universal salvation, was a wise, beautiful, and happy creature; but now his glory is departed. "And the Lord said unto the serpent, Because thou hast done this, thou art cursed above all cattle, and above every beast of the field; upon thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life." There is therefore a kind of duplicate cunning in the matter—Satan gets the preacher and hearers also.

"And is not this triumphant treachery,
And more than simple conquest in the foe?"—YOUNG.

3. Another reason why Satan employs instruments in his service is, because his empire is large, and he cannot be every where himself.

4. He has a large number at his command that love and approve of his work, delight in building up his kingdom, and stand ready to go at his call.

INFERENCES.—1. The devil is not dead, but still lives, and is able to preach as well as ever, "Ye shall not surely die."

2. Universal Salvation is no new-fangled scheme, but can boast of great antiquity.

3. See a reason why it ought to be rejected, because it is an ancient devilish doctrine.

4. See one reason why it is that Satan is such a mortal enemy to the Bible, and to all who preach the Gospel, because of that injunction, Mark xvi. 15, 16—"And he said unto them, Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned."

5. See whence it was that Satan exerted himself so much to convince our first parents that there was no hell, because the denunciation of the Almighty was true, and he was afraid that Adam and Eve would continue in the belief of it. Were there no proof of future punishment, or were it only a temporary evil, Satan would not be so busy in trying to convince men that there is none. It is his nature and element to lie. "When he speaketh a lie, he speaketh of his own, for he is a liar, and the father of it." John viii. 44.

6. We infer that ministers should not be proud of their preaching. If they preach the true Gospel, they only in substance repeat Christ's sermons. If they preach "Ye shall not surely die," they only make use of the devil's old notes that he delivered six thousand years ago.

7. It is probable that the doctrine of Universal Salvation will still prevail, since this preacher is yet alive, and not in the least superannuated; and every effort against him only enrages him more and more, and excites him to new inventions and exertions to build up his cause.

To close the subject. As the author of the foregoing discourse has confined himself wholly to the character of Satan, he trusts no one will feel personally injured by this short sermon. But should any imbibe a degree of friendship for this aged deceiver, and think that I have not treated this Universal preacher with that respect and veneration that he justly deserves, let them be so kind as to point it out, and I will most cheerfully retract; for it has ever been a maxim with me, "Render unto all their dues."

GAMING.

BY DR. J. M. MASON.

Gaming has always had an evil reputation in all civilized countries, especially such as have been enlightened by the Christian revelation. It is both curious and instructive to mark the gradations of this sentiment. Gamesters themselves, in whom the avaricious lust has not quite overpowered both integrity and shame, know and feel that their occupation is vile: for they study secrecy, not merely to elude the penal statutes of the law, but also to save appearances among men better than themselves. Fame, low as is her credit for veracity, has put less truth into her tattle, than is usual even with her, if there are not in this very city of New York, gentlemen, and ladies too, who consume their midnights over the fascinating chance, amid piles of money; but who could never meet, in broad day, the infamy which confronts an avowed gambler.

This, it may be said, is referrible to that wholesome discipline by which public opinion coerces the impudence of vice. For the most part, it is so. But public opinion is an effect; and like all other effects, must have a cause. Set the gamblers aside, and there remains a large body of sober, discreet, members of the community, who never gamble; who view gaming for money as altogether unjustifiable; as a system of rapacity and plunder; and would, on no account whatever, so far degrade themselves in their own eyes as to pollute their hands with the product of the gaming board. Yet a game of chance, detached from such applications of it, they will not stigmatize as immoral. How did they arrive at the distinction? How will they show that a thing lawful for the purposes of amusement, may not be lawful for the purposes of emolument also? Why should that be ill-gotten, which is not gotten by ill means? Why should an hour or two spent at the card table, gratis, be consistent with virtue; and that same time spent in the same employment be condemned as criminal, the moment it profits one's purse? Making money is not vicious: by the terms of the argument, cards and dice are not vicious; and yet making money by cards or dice is accounted vicious by such a strong and general coincidence of opinion, as imposes law upon society. What is there, then, to render the combination immoral? It cannot be mere excess of ardour in the pursuit of lucre. Labour may be excessive; enterprise may be excessive; economy may be excessive; yet economy, enterprise, and labour, are not immoral methods of acquiring property. If the dreadful consequences which, in all ages, have followed the spirit of gaming be assigned as the reason, we ask, why these dreadful consequences have followed? In the government of God evil consequences are the punishment of evil deeds. The loss, dishonour, and wretchedness, which sooner or later overtake the wicked, are the natural penalties by which he chastises sin, vindicates the goodness of his law, and proclaims his determination to enforce its authority. The universe cannot produce an example of a train of miseries associated, in every age, in every country, in every state of society, with any action or set of actions, in which there is no abuse of some divine institution. Thus, falsehood, debauchery, covetousness, dishonesty, revenge, and a thousand other vices, will all be found, upon close examination, to be abuses of God's institutions; and their deplorable effects to be the punishments which he has annexed to them respectively.

Now as the fact is incontestable, that no curses are more conspicuous or regular, than those which come down upon the head of the gambler, the inference is irrefragable, that gaming must be a most provoking abuse of some divine institution. What is it? We answer, the lot. This solution alone goes to the bottom of the difficulty. This alone explains the moral phenomena which invariably attend the system of gaming. An ordinance which God has appointed for the holy and reverend acknowledgment of his superintendence over the affairs of men, has been perverted to the ends, first of amusement, and then of lucre. This perversion he resents and punishes. It will be a pitiful evasion to plead instances of persons who play with moderation, as invalidating our general argument. There are degrees of transgression and of correction. "Lust, when it hath conceived, bringeth forth sin;" but it is not till "sin is finished" that it "bringeth forth death." And the death which smites the perfected sin, is only smiting the progeny of the parturient lust. The game of chance, and downright gambling, are but different stages of the same iniquity. They have always been co-existent; if not in the same individual, yet certainly in the same community. Let the former take its course, and the latter inevitably follows. So, when the spirit of gambling, which is the matured offspring of the game of chance, suffers the pains of divine displeasure, the blow is aimed at both together. It is the principle which the "governor among the nations" is judging. If he strike it chiefly in its most depraved state, and most offensive form, he does not indicate that in its earlier states and less ruinous connexion he tolerates it as innocent; but gives another document that he is "long-suffering," and "slow to anger." If this conclusion be at any time reversed, it is only a new fact in the history of an old imposture; *because sentence against an evil work is not executed SPEEDILY, therefore the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil.**

All this, we are sensible, will be laughed to scorn, by those who "like not to retain God in their knowledge." We leave them to their propensities and their reward. Judgments are prepared for SCORNERS, and stripes for the back of FOOLS.† But to those who have never weighed the subject seriously, or who are "halting between two opinions," as to the lawfulness or unlawfulness of the games in question, we address ourselves with better hope. They will not contemn, as unworthy of their regard, the reasonings which have already been submitted to them. They will hardly suppose that moralists, divines, and statesmen—Jews, Greeks, and Romans—political legislatures, and ecclesiastical councils—public principle, and private virtue, would all unite in reprobating an innocent amusement. But they have united in reprobating games of chance. A combination which seems impossible unless upon the ground of some common and strong conviction of their intrinsic immorality.

That the gospel of Jesus Christ has divinely illuminated the doctrine of morals, nothing but a profligate warfare against truth will deny. Where that gospel reigns in its purest influence; rectifying speculative and practical error; setting the heart at liberty from the bondage of depravity; and imparting a quick sensibility to the conscience, games of chance are always held in the worst repute. So long as a man continues profane and wicked, he can generally game himself, and make companions of those who do. But when "he turns from his vanities to serve the living God;" when he ceases to have "fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness;" when his delights are with the saints, with the excellent of the earth; and, in the hope of seeing Jesus as he is, he "purifies himself, even as he is pure," he cannot easily fail to throw away his cards and his dice. There have been, and there are, professors of religion who retain a predilection for these amusements; but they are not, and never have been, noted for circumspect and exemplary Christians. Go the whole round of those numerous circles which encompass the card table. You will find selections of all sorts, from low vulgarity up to accomplished fashion—from the refuse of the grog-shop, up to the most brilliant assemblage of the drawing-room; but if you fall in with a single card-party, composed of those who "worship God in spirit and in truth;" who remember that they were "redeemed from their VAIN CONVERSATION, with the precious blood of Christ;" and who are constrained by his love, to "live, not unto themselves, but unto him who died for them and rose again;"—if you fall in with a single card-party composed of such Christians, (and they are the only ones who shall see God,) we will give up the cause.

What shall we say to these things? Shall we say that a point which appears so serious to the very best of the human race, is not worth our attention? Shall we say that in deciding on the lawfulness or unlawfulness of a particular set of actions, we will prefer the judgment of the thoughtless, the profane, the abandoned, to the judgment of them who "fear God and keep his commandments?" Shall we say that his church, in which his presence dwells, and his mercies are dispensed, is a worse guide in morals, than the "world which lieth in wickedness?" Shall we say, that the Spirit and grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, teach his people to cherish an unconquerable antipathy against practices which are not forbidden by his law? Who, that has not parted with reverence for whatever is most holy, and just, and good, will embrace the affirmative? And who, that vindicates the game of chance, does not embrace it?

The reader perceives that the immorality which we attribute to games of hazard, does not arise from circumstances; but is essential to their nature. We pronounce them immoral and unlawful, precisely on the ground of their abuse and profanation of the lot, which is an institution of God for special religious and moral purposes. We have introduced a view of their effects no further than was necessary for the prosecution of this argument. Not that we think these effects of trifling moment. They are of great and terrible moment. They should never be forgotten by any who incline to more indulgence than severity toward the games. By the light of the penalty men often learn to read the law. An ear deaf to the voice of religion, may sometimes listen to the admonitions of prudence. An eye which sees no vice, may discern meanness; and the fear of disgrace or loss may control those who are intractable by piety.

For the sake of such, and for the confirmation of those who already obey the dictates of a well-informed conscience, we shall give in our next, a sketch of some evils incident to games of chance.

DO YOU PRAY IN YOUR FAMILY?

There are families that call not on the name of the Lord. Nor is it a new thing. There were such so long ago as when Jeremiah lived. He takes notice of them. He has a prayer about them. It seems he was divinely inspired to call down the indignation of the Lord upon such families. "Pour out thy fury," he says, "upon the families that call not on thy name." I would not like to have been a member of one of those families; and much less the head of one of them. It must have been very offensive to the Lord that there were families in which he was not acknowledged and worshipped. And if there were such families among the heathen nations that offended him, how much more must it have displeased him that there should be such families even among his people Israel! families that did not in the family capacity invoke him! I do not believe it is. Families are now under as great obligations to God as ever they were.

Some persons ask why we insist on family prayer as a duty. They say we cannot produce any precept enjoining it. That is true enough. But I wonder if that is not a duty, the omission of which is the subject of prophetic denunciation. I wonder if that is not by implication commanded, the neglect of which brings down the wrath of God on those guilty of the neglect. There are some things so manifestly reasonable, and of such self-evident obligation, that they need no law expressly enjoining them. It is not necessary that they should be taught in so many words.

But if we have no express precept on the subject, we have pretty good examples in favour of it. I suspect Abraham, who was so careful to instruct his household in the way of the Lord, did not neglect to pray with them. And David, I am quite confident, prayed in his family. It is said of him on one occasion, that "he returned to bless his household." No doubt there were both prayer and praise in that family. Certainly Joshua must have prayed in his house. How otherwise could he have fulfilled his resolution that his house as well as himself should serve the Lord? What! resolve that his house should serve the Lord, and not join with them in supplication for the grace to serve him! That is not at all likely.

Now I would ask if it is not proper and right that every head of a family should adopt the resolution of him who said, "as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord." But can there be religion in a house without prayer? Is there not inconsistency in saying, "I and my family will serve God, but we will have no family altar nor offering?" Is not prayer an essential part of the service of God? I wonder if any one ever lived who supposed that family prayer was not more pleasing to God than the omission of it. I wonder if any one ever omitted it for fear of being guilty of will-worship, or through dread that it might for some reason offend God? I wonder if the practice of family prayer ever distressed any conscience. The omission of it has troubled many.

It is admitted, I believe, to be the will of God that we should pray to him socially. The Lord's prayer was constructed for social use. The disciples were directed to use it when they should pray together; and it is accordingly in the plural number: not my Father, but our Father. Now, is God to be socially worshipped, and yet not worshipped in that first, most permanent, and most interesting form of society—the form of society instituted by God himself—the family? Is that to be believed? But the Lord's prayer seems not only intended for social, but for daily use. "Give us this day our daily bread" is one of its petitions. It does not contemplate the morrow. It asks supplies but for one day. Now if, as it appears from that reasoning, social prayer should be daily, where but in the family, the society which is abiding, and which a single roof covers, can it with propriety be daily? Should there be public religious services daily, or daily prayer-meetings for this purpose? Then, how suitable it is that those who together share their daily bread, should together daily ask it.

How reasonable and comely is household religion—family worship! Common blessings, such as families daily share, call for common thanksgivings. Common wants, such as families together feel, call for common supplications. Is it not fit that families, in retiring to rest at night, should together commit themselves to the divine keeping; and in the morning unite in praising God for having been their protector? It is a clear case, it seems to me. Besides, fathers are directed to bring up their children "in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." But can they do this while they pray not with them and for them? I do not know how we are to comply with the apostolic exhortation to pray "every where" unless we pray in the family, as well as under other circumstances.

Is any one in doubt whether the practice or omission of family prayer will be the more pleasing subject of retrospect from the dying bed or the eternal world? Parents should not forget, that presently will come the long deferred and greatly dreaded season of taking the last look and the last leave of those whom their decease is to make orphans. Often, what a sweet thought it will be to enter into the dying meditation, that they have been in the daily habit of bowing down with their children in prayer, and commending them to the care and grace of their heavenly Father, and that they may enjoy the confident hope that he will infinitely more than supply the paternal place which they are to leave vacant.

But what need of more argument? I suspect every body secretly admits the obligation of family prayer. I judge so from the trouble many are at to apologize for the neglect. It tries them not a little to satisfy even themselves with an excuse. The usual plea is inability. They have not the gift, they say. What gift? Can they not collect their family together night and morning? Have they not so much authority in their own house as that? And then can they not read a portion of Scripture to them; and kneeling down, express their common desires to God? If they cannot frame a prayer at the moment, yet can they not use a form? It requires no great gift to read a prayer in an audible voice. But what if it be hard at first, it will soon be easy, if persevered in. The most of those who make this apology, presume on their inability. They say they cannot before they have tried. But until they have tried, they do not know whether they can or not. What if some have tried once and failed. One failure should not dishearten them, nor two, nor even twenty. Demosthenes tried speaking several times before he became an orator. Besides, how do those who presume on their inability to conduct family worship, know what assistance they might receive from God, if they were to make an humble and faithful experiment.

If any one shall condescend to read this, who does not pray in his family, I advise him to commence immediately. He knows that he will never be sorry for it, if he does; but he is not so sure that he may not be sorry for it, if he does not. If there were no other reason in favour of the practice, this alone would be sufficient. I think it is JAY who says that a family without prayer is like a house without a roof—it has no protection. Who would like to live in such a house?—Ne vins.

GOVERNMENT OF THE THOUGHTS.

The government of the thoughts is a much neglected duty. Thought is the spring of action. Holy affections are strengthened by virtuous thoughts and meditations; and countless sins are committed by the indulgence of impure, or sensual, or resentful thoughts. Think it not therefore a matter of small importance, what are the thoughts which fill your mind during your busy or your lonely hours. Consider that God observes your every thought. "The Lord looketh at the heart, and understandeth your thoughts afar off." The blessed Saviour also asserts, that the greatest crimes may be perpetrated in the secret chambers of the imagination; for "whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her, hath already committed adultery with her in his heart." The indulgence of evil thoughts is represented as descriptive of those who are hastening to perdition. "The wicked will not seek after God: God is not in all his thoughts." Hence their thoughts are declared to be hateful to the heart-searching God. "The thoughts of the wicked are an abomination to the Lord." "A heart that deviseth wicked imaginations, God hateth." Such thoughts need repentance and forgiveness. "Repent therefore of this thy wickedness," said the Apostle Peter, "and pray God, if perhaps the thought of thine heart may be forgiven thee." Those who wish for holiness and happiness, are exhorted to forsake evil thoughts. "Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts."

On the other hand, to indulge pious thoughts is represented as descriptive of piety. "I will sing praises unto my God, my meditation of him shall be sweet." "Blessed is the man whose delight is in the law of the Lord, and in his law doth he meditate day and night." To have the thoughts frequently occupied with divine subjects, was required from the people of God under the old dispensation; and reason and Scripture may convince us that it is not less important under the new. The Apostle

Paul, inspired by the Holy Spirit, directed Timothy to meditate on these things, and to give himself to meditation and to prayer. Peter, the favoured disciple of the Lord of glory, not long before he quitted this world, wrote his second epistle, that his beloved friends might be stirred up to have those things which belonged to their eternal peace "ALWAYS IN REMEMBRANCE." If, after all these testimonies to the importance of repressing evil thoughts, and of cherishing those of a holy and pious nature, more were necessary, you have it in the declaration of the blessed God, that "a book of remembrance was written before him for them that feared the Lord, and that THOUGHT UPON HIS NAME. They shall be mine, saith the Lord of hosts, in the day when I make up my jewels."

To assist in governing the thoughts, it is a highly useful practice in the morning to fix upon some part of the divine word, though it should be but a single verse, which may furnish matter for meditation at leisure intervals during the day. Such a practice will store the mind with Scriptural knowledge, will greatly promote pious feeling, and will lead to enlarged views of the wisdom and loving-kindness of the Lord; if one day in a believer's life can be spent with God, every day may; and who at the close of life will regret such exertions to promote in his own soul a spirit of piety and of meetness for eternal glory?

Biographical Sketches.

GEORGE BUCHANAN.

GEORGE BUCHANAN was born in the parish of Killearn and county of Stirling, then forming part of Lennoxshire, in a rustic hamlet, situated on the banks of the river Blane, about the beginning of February, 1506. His family was rather ancient than opulent. His father died of stone, in the flower of his age, and his grandfather, who was yet alive, becoming insolvent, the family, which was but poor before, was now reduced almost to the extremity of want. Yet such was the frugal care of his mother, Agnes Herriot, that she brought up five sons and three daughters to men and women's estate. Of the five sons, George was one. His uncle, James Herriot, perceiving his promising talents, evinced even at the country school, took him from thence and sent him to Paris. [1520.] There he applied himself to his studies, and especially to poetry, having partly a natural genius for it, and partly out of necessity, it being one of the tasks propounded to the students. Before he had been there two years, his uncle died, and he himself fell dangerously sick; and being in extreme want, he was forced to go home to his friends [1522.] After his return to Scotland, he spent almost a year in improving his health; he then went into the army with some French auxiliaries newly arrived in Scotland, [1523] to learn the military art. But that expedition having proved fruitless, and these forces being reduced by the deep snow of a very severe winter, he relapsed into such an illness as confined him all that season to his bed. Early in the spring, he was sent to St. Andrews, to hear the lectures of John Major; who, though very old, read logic, or rather, sophistry in that university. The summer after, [1526] he accompanied him into France; and there he imbibed the tenets of the Lutheran sect, which then began to increase. He struggled with the difficulties of fortune almost two years, and at last was admitted into the college of St. Barbe, where he was professor of grammar for almost three years. During that time, Gilbert Kennedy, Earl of Cassilis, one of the young Scottish nobles, being in that country [1527] was much taken with his ingenuity and acquaintance; so that he entertained him for five years, and brought him back with him into Scotland.

Afterwards having a mind to return to Paris to his old studies, he was detained by the King, and made tutor to James, his natural son. In the mean time, an elegy, made by him at leisure hours, came into the hands of the Franciscans. In it he represented himself as solicited in a dream, by St. Francis, to enter into his order; and having in one or two passages reflected on them very severely, these ghostly fathers, notwithstanding their profession of meekness and humility, resented more keenly than men having obtained such a character for piety ought to have done, so small an occasion of offence. But finding no just grounds for their unbounded fury, they attacked him upon the score of religion; which was their common way of terrifying those who incurred their displeasure. Thus, whilst they indulged their impotent malice, they made him, who was not well affected to them before, a still greater enemy to their licentiousness, and rendered him still more partial to the Lutheran cause. In the mean time, [1537] the King, with Magdalene his wife, came from France, not with the good will of the priesthood; who were afraid that the royal lady, having been bred up under her aunt, the queen of Navarre, should attempt some innovation in religion. But this fear soon vanished upon her death, which followed shortly after.

Next there arose jealousies at Court about some of the nobility, who were thought to have conspired against his Majesty, and in that matter, the King being persuaded that the Franciscans dealt insincerely, commanded Buchanan, who was then at Court, though ignorant of the disgusts between him and that order, to write a satire upon them. He was loath to offend either party; and therefore, though he made a poem, it was but short, and such as might admit of a doubtful interpretation, and thus satisfied neither the King, who would have a sharp and stinging invective, nor yet the fathers, who looked on it as a capital offence, to have any thing said about them in the least degree dishonourable. So that, receiving a second command to write more pungently against them, he began that poem, which now bears the title of the Franciscan, and gave it to the King.* But shortly after, [1539] learning from his friends at Court, that Cardinal Beaton sought his life, and had offered the King a sum of money, as a price for his head, he, on being apprehended, escaped out of prison, and fled to England.† But there also, things were in such confusion, that on the very same day, and almost with one and the same fire, the men of both factions, Protestants and Papists, were burnt; Henry VIII. in his old age, being more intent on his own security, than the purity or reformation of religion. This uncertainty of affairs in England, seconded by his former acquaintance with the French, and the courtesy natural to them, drew him again into that kingdom.

On his arrival in Paris, he found Cardinal Beaton, his bitterest enemy, in the character of ambassador there: so that, to withdraw himself from his fury, at the invitation of Andrew Govean, he went to Bourdeaux. There he taught three years in the schools, which were erected at the public cost, and in that time he composed four tragedies, which were afterwards published at different times. But that which he wrote first, called the Baptist, was printed last, and next to it the Medea of Euripides. He wrote these in compliance with the custom of the school, which required that a play should be produced annually, that the acting of them might wean the youth from the allegories, then in vogue on the continent, and bring them back, as much as possible, to a just imitation of the ancients. Succeeding in these far beyond his hopes, he took more pains in composing his other two tragedies, Jephthes and Alcestes; for he thought that they would fall under a severer scrutiny by the learned. And yet, during this time, he was, by no means, free from trouble; but was harassed by the menaces of the Cardinal on the one side, and of the Francis-

* This is a severe satire against the monks and friars. The following extract is from The Protestant, being part of a translation, by the Rev. John Graham, Rector of Magilligan, Ireland:—

To purge from superstition all the land—
From Christian churches, heathen priests expel,
Can best unravel mysteries divine.”

† “In the midst of these evils,” says Knox, “he (the King) caused to put hands on that notable man, Mr. George Buchanan; but by the merciful providence of God he escaped the rage of those that sought his life, although with great difficulty, and remains alive to this day (1566), to the glory of God, the great honour of this nation, and to the comfort of those who delight in learning and virtue.”—Hist. cans on the other. For the Cardinal had written letters to the Archbishop of Bourdeaux, desiring that he might be apprehended; but providentially these letters fell into the hands of Buchanan's best friends. However, the death of the King of Scots, [1542,] and the plague, which then raged over all Guienne, dispelled this fear.

In the mean time, an express came to Govean from the King of Portugal, commanding him to return, and bring with him some men learned in the Greek and Latin tongues; that they might teach the liberal arts, and especially the principles of the Aristotelian philosophy, in those schools which, with great care and expense he was then erecting. Buchanan, being addressed on the subject, readily consented to go for one. For, whilst he saw that the whole of Europe besides, was either actually engaged in foreign or domestic wars, or just upon the point of being so, Portugal, in his opinion, was likely to be free from such tumults and combustions; and besides, his companions in the expedition were such, that they seemed rather his acquaintances and familiar friends, than strangers or aliens to him. There were many of them who had been his intimates for several years, and who are well known to the world by their learned works, as Nicholaus Gruchius, Gulielmus Garentæus, Jacobus Tevius, and Elias Venetus, and for this reason he not only himself became one of their society, but also persuaded his brother Patrick to do the same. And truly at first the matter succeeded excellently well; but, in the midst of the enterprise, Govean was carried off by a sudden death, a circumstance which proved greatly prejudicial to his companions.

Immediately on his decease [1548,] their enemies endeavoured first to insnare them by treachery, and soon after openly and violently attacked them: and having employed agents and judges who were exceedingly hostile to the accused, they laid hold of three of them, and haled them to prison. From thence, after a long and loathsome confinement, they were brought out to make their defences, but, after many bitter taunts, were remanded again; no accuser having appeared in court against them. Over Buchanan, in particular, they insulted most bitterly, as being a stranger; and knowing also, that he had few friends in that country, who would either rejoice in his prosperity, sympathize with his sorrows, or revenge the wrongs which were offered to him.

The chief crime laid to his charge, was the writing of his poem against the Franciscans, which, before leaving France, he had taken care to get excused to the King of Portugal, and of which his accusers were almost entirely ignorant, since he had only parted with one copy of it to the King of Scots, by whose command he wrote it. They farther objected "his eating flesh in Lent;" though there is not a man in all Spain but uses the same liberty. And besides, it was urged that he had passed some sharp remarks upon the monks; which, however, nobody but a monk himself could well except against. Moreover, they took it heinously amiss, that in familiar discourse with some young Portuguese gentlemen, upon mention being made of the eucharist, he affirmed, that, in his opinion, Austin was most inclined to the party condemned by the church of Rome. And two other persons, as came to his knowledge some years after, viz. John Talpin, a Norman, and John Ferrerius, a Piedmontese, witnessed against him, that they had heard, from several creditable persons, "That he was not orthodox as to the Romish faith and religion." But to return to the narrative:

After having wearied both themselves and him for nearly a year and a half, the inquisitors at last, that they might not seem to have causelessly harassed a man of some name and note in the world, shut him up for some months in a monastery, there to be more strictly disciplined and instructed by the monks; who, to give them their due, though very ignorant in all matters of religion, were men, otherwise, neither bad in their morals, nor rude in their behaviour. During this time [1551] it was, that he translated the principal part of David's Psalms into Latin verse.

At length he was set at liberty; and, upon requesting permission and passports to return to France, the King desired him to remain in Portugal, and mean time allotted him a small sum for daily necessities and expenses, till some better provision might be made for his subsistence. But, tired with the delay, and being put off to no certain time, nor on any sure grounds of hope, and having got the opportunity of a passage in a ship then riding in the bay of Lisbon, he went over into England. In that country he made but a short stay, even though fair offers were made him; for he saw that all things were in hurry and tumult, under a very young King; the nobles being at variance with one another; and the minds of the com-ons yet in a ferment, on account of their recent civil commotions [1552.] He therefore returned into France, and arrived about the time that the siege of Metz was raised, [1553.] and was in a manner compelled by his friends to write a poem relating to that siege; which he did with reluctance, being unwilling to interfere with several of his acquaintances, and especially with Melinus Sangelasius, who had just composed a learned and elegant eulogy on the subject.

IN HEAVEN THERE'S REST.

"In heaven there's rest!"—that thought hath a power
To scatter the shades of life's dreariest hour;
Like a sunbeam, it dawns on the stormy sky,
Like the first glimpse of home to a traveller's eye;
'Tis the balm of the heart, of sorrow the cure,
The hope that deceives not, the promise that's sure.
How sweet to the weary—"In heaven there's rest!"
The tears are all dried from the eyes of the blessed,
And the smiles that succeed, are so dazzling and bright,
That none but a spirit could dwell in their light;
O! not like the smiles that glow on the cheek
But to hide the deep anguish no language may speak.
"In heaven there's rest!"—Earth's happiest hour
Fades softly away like a morning flower;
There, fadeless the bowers, unclouded the skies;—
There, joy hath no end, and time never flies;—
There, nature is freed from its earliest stain;—
There, love hath no sorrows, and life hath no pain!
"In heaven there's rest!"—O how deep that repose!
Life's bitterness passed with its follies and woes,
Its passions all hushed like the waves of the deep,
When tempests expire, and winds are asleep,
And only soft airs and sweet odours arise,
Like the evening incense that soars to the skies.
Those sounds breathe sweet music,—“In heaven there's rest!”
I long to escape to that land of the blessed,
Inspired by the prospect, through life's busy day,
To act and to suffer, to watch and to pray;
Then gladly exchange, when the summons is given,
The tumults of earth for the calmness of heaven!

Romanism.

[For the Banner of the Covenant.]

ROMANISM A NOVELTY IN IRELAND.

(Concluded.)

But we have another fact worth noticing. It is well known that there was a long dispute in the church of Rome relative to the proper time of celebrating Easter. We shall show from the testimony of Bede's ecclesiastical history, (liber iii. caput 26) the part which Ireland took in that controversy. A synod was assembled at Whitby, in Yorkshire, A. D. 664, about the time when Rome was making most strenuous efforts to possess universal dominion. And at this synod Bishop Coleman thus delivered his opinion in audience of them all: "Our Fathers and their predecessors, who were manifestly inspired by the Holy Ghost as Columbkil was, did ordain that Easter should be celebrated upon the Lord's day that fell upon the fourteenth moon following the example of John the apostle and evangelist who leaned upon the breast of our Lord at his last supper, and was called the lover of our Lord. He celebrated Easter on the fourteenth moon, and we with the same confidence, celebrate the same, as his disciple Polycarpus and others did, neither dare we for our parts, neither will we change this." Now this dispute began about the year 633, and the question was not finally settled until about the year 710, nearly 278 years after the arrival of St. Patrick on the Irish shores as a preacher of the gospel, and is it not a remarkable fact that the Irish clergy of that day, in defending the ecclesiastical usages and rules of their church, and in resisting the pretensions of an emissary of the Pontiff who contended for his master's authority, instead of drawing his authority from Rome or the customs introduced by St. Patrick, did not so much as once mention his name, although nearly three centuries had added antiquity to his mission? Nay, even farther, they rejected the proposed Romish innovations respecting the feast of Easter, administering of baptism, and the mode of tonsure, solely on the authority of St. John, and St. Columbkil, and that the venerable Bede, one of the most accredited historians of the Romish church, and himself a member of it, should make no mention whatever of the influence of St. Patrick or their deference to the See of Rome?

The decision of this council was made and delivered by king Oswin whom Austin the monk had so terrified that he feared, if he refused to accede, St. Peter would turn him back from the gates of heaven; but so discontented were St. Coleman and the Irish clergy with the result that he resigned the See of Lindisfame and returned home, taking with him all his Irish followers. And connected with this, there is a fact which Bede distinctly asserts and Moore admits, that before the arrival of Austin in England, which was about the year 596, the British and Irish churches agreed in several points of discipline and doctrine in which they differed diametrically from the church of Rome, and that they adhered to those points of discipline and doctrine in obedience of her authority, and were quite independent of her control. (Bede, Lib. I. c. 27.)

Assuredly the doctrine of Romish supremacy and infallibility was not then sworn to by the Irish clergy, nor did they entertain the uncharitable dogma, that there was no salvation out of the pale of Rome's boasted universal church. Moore has tried to soften down this Pascal dispute, and to show that it was carried on in a tolerant spirit. The falsity of this statement, the undoubted authority of Bede shall determine; showing on the part of the Irish and British churches a decided and firm attachment to their primitive and independent discipline, and fierceness and intolerance on the part of Rome. Bede presents us with a letter written A. D. 609, and directed from Laurentius Mellitus and Justus, (who had been sent from Rome to England to assist Austin,) to the Scots that inhabit Ireland." In this they wrote thus: "But knowing the Britons, we thought the Scots were better than they. But we have learned by Bishop Daganus coming into this island, and Columbanus the abbot coming into France, that these differ nothing from the Britons in their conversation. For bishop Daganus coming into us would not only not eat with us, but would not eat his meat in the house in which we were." To this remarkable passage Moore refers in the 270th page of his Irish history; but as usual, so quotes it as to keep out of view the real bearing and force of the passage. Now in substance it affords us the following material information: first, the unity of the British and Irish churches in this matter—and in the next place, it gives us an interesting and instructive detail of the mode in which Austin's efforts to press upon them the supreme authority of the court of Rome, was received. We shall farther prove this by some extracts taken from Stapleton's translation of Bede, printed at St. Omers, A. D. 1622, Lib. II. c. 2. The British priests assembled in a synod had acknowledged the preaching of Austin to be the true way of righteousness, but "they said that they could not alter and change their old customs and ordinances without the consent of the clergy and people; they desired, therefore, that they might have a second synod of a greater multitude. Previously to this second meeting it had been agreed by the British bishops and clergy to form their opinions of Austin and his mission from his demeanour towards them. He was permitted to enter first into the place where the synod were to meet, and they on entering were thus to judge of him according to the following advice: "If, when ye approach near, he ariseth courteously to you, think he is the servant of Christ, and so hear ye him obediently; but if he despise you, nor will vouchsafe to rise at your presence, which are the more in number, let him likewise be despised of you," and truly they did so. For it happened that when they came thither, St. Austin was already there, and sat in his chair, which, when they saw, straight having wrath, they noted him of pride, and therefore endeavoured to overthwart and gainsay what he proposed. He (Austin) told them that "if they would agree with Rome in the time of Easter, the ministrie of baptisme according to the Romish churches, &c., all your other ceremonies, rites and fashions, and customs, though they be contrary to ours, yet we will willingly suffer them." But they answered, "that they would doe none of the things requested; neither would they compte him for their Archbishop, saying with themselves, Nay, if he would not so much as rise to us, trulie the more we should now subject ourselves to him, the more he would hereafter despise us and set us at naught." In consequence of this, Austin departed, announcing against them the vengeance of Heaven, which afterwards, as Bede informs us, was fully wreaked on them by Edilfred, an English prince, when "foule slaughter of that unfaithful and naughty people took place." "It is reported (says the historian) that there were slain in the warre, of them that came to praie, about 2,200 men, and only fiftie to have escaped by flight." Thus the ancient British church standing the brunt of the battle, resisted even unto death the arrogant attempts which Rome made to impose on them her supremacy. Thus her ministers and members counted not their lives dear unto them, that they might preserve the independency of their church, but shed the blood in defence of its truth and religious freedom.

Another document is here worthy of our attention. It is found in the original Welch language, among the concilia of Wilkins, V. i. p. 26. It is styled in Latin, "Responsio Abbatis Bangor, ad Augustinum Monachum petentem Subjectionem Ecclesiæ Romanæ,"—The answer of the Abbot of Bangor to Austin the monk, seeking subjection to the church of Rome.

"Be it known, and without doubt, unto you, that we all are, and every one of us, obedient servants to the church of God, and to the pope of Rome, and to every true Christian and godly, to love every one in his degree with perfect charity, and to help every one of them by word and deed, to be the children of God, and other obedience than this I do not know due to him whom you name to be pope, nor to be father of fathers to be claimed, and to be demanded, and this obedience we are ready to give and pay to him and to every Christian continually." Such were the meek Christians who were thus cruelly butchered through the intolerant influence of a proud bigot. Who that reads these documents would not sympathize with Taliessin, the ancient bard of the Britons, in his zealous strain written shortly after this period

"Woe be to that Priest yborne
That will not cleanly weed his corne
And preach his charge among.
Woe be to that Shepherd, I say,
That will not watch his fold alway,
As to his office doth belong.
Woe be to him that doth not keep
From Romish wolves his sheep
With staff and weapon strong."

Was not Romanism a novelty in England and Ireland in the days to which the foregoing refers?

ROUSSELL'S PICTURE.

In our last volume we published translations of several of the Tracts on Romanism, written by NAPOLEON ROUSSELL, one of the most talented, diligent and pious ministers of the French Evangelical Church. In a late No. of the Presbyterian we find the following description of a picture he made, representing forcibly the errors of Popery. It appears that the Government prohibited its publication, while attacks on Protestantism in a similar manner were issued without restraint. Let us hope that the civil liberty which appears now to be established in France, may be accompanied by religious freedom, and that the truth will be left free to combat error of every kind.

The following extract from a letter of M. Roussell, in the Archives du Christianisme, will lend confirmation to certain points of my two foregoing letters, and will make you acquainted with a very ingenious little piece of work, which that witty controversialist has just produced, but which our Government prohibits him from publishing in France.

PARIS, January 7, 1848.

"How unlucky I am! If I publish a tract, I am summoned before the king's attorney. If I open a place of worship, they prosecute me. If I write a letter to the priests, they send me before the grand jury. This time, I wished to do as little as is possible for me; I insculped a picture; and they refuse me license to publish it. Here is the fact.

"I caused the interior of a Roman Catholic church to be engraved, with all the apparatus of confessionals, statues, pictures, chaplets, &c. No harm thus far, thought I, in the eyes of our most Catholic government. Afterward, I attached to each of these objects a biblical sentence. Who could complain of this, without condemning himself? Nothing, therefore, appeared to me more innocent than a church in which, on all sides, is inscribed the word of God; the more so, because I endeavoured to put each inscription in connexion with the object which it accompanied. On the statue itself, I engraved: 'Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image.' (Ex. xx.) On the picture of the Virgin interceding, I put: 'There is but one intercessor, namely, Jesus Christ.' On the box in behalf of souls in purgatory, this exclamation of St. Peter: 'Thy money perish with thee, because thou hast thought that the gift of God may be purchased with money.' The priest saying mass, in Latin, walks on these lines in the form of a stair: 'I had rather speak five words in the church so as to be understood, than ten thousand in an unknown tongue.' A placarded door has for caption: A mandate concerning Lent; and for the order: 'Whatsoever is sold in the shambles, eat, asking no question from scruple of conscience.' Further distant, the Tariff of Prices, which is this: 'Freely ye have received, freely give.' At the other extreme, a man is counting his beads, kneeling on a bench, on which is this inscription: 'When ye pray, use not vain repetitions as the heathen do.' The tabernacle containing some dozens of Jesus Christs, presents on its door these words of the Saviour: 'If any man say unto you, Lo, here is Christ, believe it not.' 'Whom the heaven must receive until the times of restitution of all things.' But this, I imagine, will be sufficient to give you an idea of my engraving, and to show you that my passages are well chosen. I shall even own to you, that I have the weakness to look upon my work as a little chef-d'œuvre.

"Well, would you believe it? That engraving, containing but the simple interior of a church, and some sentences from the Bible, was not allowed to be published!

Anti-Slavery.

INCREASE OF THE SLAVE TRADE.

The following extracts from a letter from a Baptist missionary in Jamaica, will surprise and deeply pain many of the friends of the oppressed African who have been supposing that the evil and horrors of slavery were diminished. Such details, however, tend to show that the only effectual means of the suppression of the slave trade is the prohibition of the slave market. As long as men will buy their fellow-beings, there will be persons who will sell them. How painful is it that the influence of the Christian church, which might remove this dreadful evil, in so many instances, especially in our own land, sustains it.

Kingston, Jamaica, Feb. 10, 1848.

The injustice and horrors of the African slave-trade, have for many years ceased to occupy the attention of the public, it having been generally supposed that the governments of England and the United States were employing effective measures for the suppression of the traffic. But the fact has now become too glaring to be questioned or overlooked, that the slave-trade is not suppressed, nor even diminished. The obstacles interposed to its progress have not equalled the encouragements to its prosecution. The scenes of wrong and outrage which sickened the heart of Cowper, which touched as with a burning coal the lips of Wilberforce, which roused the great body of the British nation to so many remonstrances and appeals, and which finally moved the British government to measures so important and expensive,—those scenes are, at this very day, re-enacted and multiplied with astonishing energy, and with almost entire impunity. According to the international treaties, to which the Brazilian government pledged its faith and honour, the importation of slaves into Brazil should have entirely ceased in 1830; but, so far from this is the fact, that for several years past, the most important article of imports into the cities of Rio Janeiro and Bahia has been slaves from the coast of Africa. Several thousand three hundred and thirty-eight slaves have been known to be imported into the Brazils in a single week. More than 50,000 have been imported in one season into the one city of Rio. And so prosperous has been the trade during the last year, that at Bahia three large steamers with engines of from 200 to 300 horse power, have been fitted out for its more efficient prosecution. One of them has already been on the coast of Africa, where she embarked nine hundred slaves, and escaped from an English brig of war, as might have been expected, by steaming away from her during a calm.

There is every prospect of a large addition to this number of slave steamers. The English market, undoubtedly the most important sugar market in the world, is now open to the reception of the foreign and slave-grown product, and on terms so liberal, that the planters in the British colonies, who are confined to free labour, have, to a great extent, ceased to cultivate; so that Brazil and Cuba are able quite to monopolize the trade. With this growing demand, and these increased facilities, the Brazilians have a boundless extent of fertile and unoccupied land, admirably suited for the growth of sugar, coffee, and other important staples. This, and the sparseness of the population, constitute a strong temptation to enrich themselves by employing more land, and importing more slaves; while the limited extent of the voyage, and the numerous ports by which they may enter Brazil securely, afford them every encouragement and most certain prospects of success.

The importation of slaves into Cuba, is scarcely less unrestricted. Such is the severity of labour exacted from field hands, in that island, that five years, on an average, wear them out, and the places of those who are thus sacrificed, are constantly supplied by fresh importations. The Spanish government is known to be acting with the greatest duplicity. It is stated that the Governor of Cuba receives a tribute for every slave landed in that island!

It should be remembered, that with this accursed traffic are still associated all the horrors of the middle passage. At a public meeting held in this city a few weeks since, Mr. Borthwick, member of Pa liament, and long noted as a friend of the planters, even when they were slave-holders, made this statement: that out of 130,000, known to have been shipped from the coast of Africa in one year, only 60,000 reached their destination. Thus, every year, are thousands of lives sacrificed, with the most terrible sufferings, in the crowded dungeons of slave ships. Mr. B. well exclaimed, Oh, the vast depths of the ocean will bear awful witness against the vile perpetrators of these horrid crimes, when the sea shall give up its dead! Several incidents were related at this meeting illustrating the unparalleled cruelty exercised by the masters of these vessels. In one instance, the officers imagined that the slaves were contemplating a mutiny, and they ordered the crew to open the gratings and fire indiscriminately among them. In another, under like circumstances, the men were ordered to pull up the slaves that were nearest the hatches and hang them at the yard-arm; and not only this, the inhuman monsters directed that their feet be cut off at the ankles, for the purpose of pelting those who were below! In another case, the prisoners complained that they were dying from suffocation, and that the dead were companioned with the living, some holding the dead locked in their arms. The wail of the father for his child was unnoticed; the mother's grief was treated with contempt, until the clamour became so loud that something must be done to still their cries; and then they were taken one after another, the living and the dead, and thrown into the sea, until the disturbance was quelled.

These acts of wanton and hellish cruelty are still practised on the Atlantic ocean every month and every day—'that ocean of which Britain boasts herself the queen.' How far Britain is responsible for the continuance of the traffic and its crimes, is certainly a question of no ordinary interest.

While the trade is prosecuted with so much vigour, it is not to be expected that slavery itself will become in any respect a milder or more merciful system. And there is abundant evidence that the severities attending it were never more terrible than at the present moment. It is stated here; that while the planters of this island used to be satisfied with one hogshead of sugar from each slave, the planters of Cuba now require three hogsheads from each person in their estates. As many as five hundred males are ganged together, deprived entirely of the society of females, for the simple purpose of exacting from them the utmost amount of labour. The effect of this upon their happiness and morals must be terrible. Englishmen, who are suspected of the slightest hostility to slavery, are refused passports to travel in Cuba. Even Mr. Borthwick has been denied a passport by the Spanish Consul in this city. They are unwilling that intelligent foreigners should see the working of the abominable system which they maintain.

Such are some of the facts exhibiting the present condition of slavery and the slave-trade. They show not only the entire inefficiency of the measures hitherto employed by the British government, but also the increased profitableness of slave-labour in those countries where it is still relied on as the great means for accumulating wealth. What is the cause of this? The startling fact is, the British nation has not only failed to carry out her plan, but she actually pays a bounty on slave labour, and so encourages the system and the trade. She has opened her markets to the slave-holder, and given him every advantage to compete successfully with her own colonists. She thus invites him to extend and aggravate his oppressions, and rewards him for doing so. She is not only unjust to her own subjects, but aids rather than hinders the wrongs and afflictions of Africa. The price of colonial sugar has been reduced from 30 to 50 per cent., while that of slave-grown produce has been increased about 40 per cent. In 1845, the prices of sugar in Cuba was from eight to nine shillings per 100 lbs., and cultivation languished. During the last year the prices have been from 16s. to 18s. The value of landed and slave property has been raised to a proportionate extent.

How is it possible that those changes should not give a mighty impetus to the traffic in human flesh, and to the horrors of slavery? Is it not a fundamental principle in political economy, that the extension and propagation of any system is the exact ratio of its profitableness? So long then as Great Britain is the greatest sugar market in the world, and admits slave-grown sugar on the same terms as she admits the produce of her own free subjects, she aids to sustain the system of slavery. Still it is not to be denied that the British nation has proved, by its former noble acts, its abhorrence of the system; and we doubt not that abhorrence still exists. Some, who are themselves Englishmen, charge the nation with hypocrisy. Probably the more correct term is culpable inconsiderateness; at least, this is sufficiently severe to be well received. It is yet in her power to stop the progress of this great evil and reduce again the profitableness of slavery. It is hoped she will do it.

The people of this island are very generally sensible to the true state of the case, and petitions to the government on the subject of the slave trade are in circulation. The subject, as all must see, is closely identified with the interests of the British colonies, and it would be strange indeed, if what comes so near to the people here, and has so much to do with their own cultivation and commerce, did not attract their attention. The subject is one of immense and pressing moment, and must appear so to every friend of humanity, in both Europe and America. The lethargy of anti-slavery Englishmen arises from the popularity of the free-trade principle, to which many abolitionists have committed themselves so fully, that now they know not what to do. But there are other plans for diminishing the profitableness of slavery without interfering at all with free-trade; and some of these, it is our purpose to notice in another letter.

Truly yours,

H. A. GRAVES.

WONDERS OF CREATION.

The late Dr. Chalmers in his Astronomical Sermons, remarks: "While the telescope enables us to see a system in every star, the microscope unfolds to us a world in every atom. The one shows us the insignificance of the world we inhabit; the other redeems it from that insignificance—presenting us a universe in the compass of a point, where the Almighty Ruler of all things finds room for the exercise of his attributes." Recent discoveries in Geology have brought to view a great multitude of facts, truly wonderful—especially respecting the state of animated creation many centuries past. While on the one hand it is found, by the remains of some ancient animals, that they were larger than any now living upon the earth, on the other hand, microstopic animals, almost inconceivably small, yet possessing mouths, teeth, stomachs, muscles, wings, glands, eyes, and other organs, are not only found in a fossil state, but forming rocks and soil for miles in extent. Chalk, and even flint, and some of the gems, are found to a great extent to be composed of animalcula. A cubic inch of iron ore is said to contain the remains of one billion of living, acting, reproducing beings. Professor Hitchcock states, that the silicious marl found under peat swamps in New England, appears to be made up almost entirely of the skeletons of animals. It is also said that a thousand millions of these animals would, together, form a mass no larger than a grain of sand.

MICROSCOPIC WONDERS.

Upon examining the edge of a very sharp lancet with a microscope, it will appear as broad as the back of a knife, rough, uneven, full of notches and furrows. An exceedingly small needle resembles a rough iron bar.

But the sting of a bee, seen through the same instrument, exhibits every where a most beautiful polish, without the least flaw, blemish or inequality, and it ends in a point too fine to be discerned. The threads of a fine lawn seem coarser than the yarn with which ropes are made for anchors. But a silk-worm's web appears perfectly smooth and shining, and every where equal. The smallest dot that can be made with a pen, appears irregular and uneven; but the little specks on the wings or bodies of insects are found to be most accurately circular. The finest miniature paintings appear before the microscope ragged and uneven, entirely devoid of beauty, either in the drawing or colouring. The most even and beautiful varnishes will be found to be mere roughness. But the nearer we examine the works of God, even in the least productions, the more sensible shall we be of his wisdom and power. In the numberless species of insects, what proportionate exactness, uniformity and symmetry do we perceive in all organs! what profusion of colouring! azure, green, and vermilion; gold, silver, pearls, rubies, and diamonds, fringe and embroidery, on their bodies, wings, heads, and every part! how high the finishing! how inimitable the polish we every where behold!

FACTS ABOUT DIGESTION.

Many popular notions about different articles of food (and there are few subjects upon which people indulge more notions,) are totally disproved by scientific facts. We propose to write down a few well established truths respecting the relative quantity of nutriment in different kinds of food, and the relative time occupied in their digestion.

In the first place, however, we would remind our readers, that it is by no means the article containing the greatest proportion of nutritious substance, which takes soonest the form of blood and other necessary elements of animal life. Neither is the most physical strength supplied by the articles containing the most nutriment. Nuts are almost entirely composed of nutritious material, oil; potatoes contain eighty-eight parts of waste matter to twelve of nutriment. Yet the latter imparts far more strength to the body than the former. Bread is more nutritious than meat; but meat is stimulating as well as nutritive; and is supposed to strengthen the bodily functions more than bread.

Another important fact to be remembered in this connexion is, that all stomachs are not alike, and that the calculations given below are applicable to a healthy stomach. What proportion of healthy stomachs may be in the world, we do not know ; but the probability is, that in the majority of cases, food is not digested as rapidly as here stated. In some stomachs, food of a particular kind ferments, which interferes with complete digestion. This happens most frequently with regard to vegetables—saw-dust doctors to the contrary notwithstanding.

In general, however, the most nutritious and most easily digested are the best for health and strength.

Wheat is the most nutritious of all substances except oil ; containing ninety-five parts of nutriment to five waste matter. Dry peas, nuts, and barley, are nearly as nutritious as wheat. Garden vegetables stand lowest on the list, inasmuch as they contain, when fresh, a large proportion of water. The quantity of waste matter is more than eight-tenths of the whole. Only one-fourth of a cucumber is capable of being converted into nutriment. The nutritious part of the different meats varies from one-fifth to one-eighth of the whole. Veal is the most nutritious ; mutton next ; then chicken ; then beef ; last pork. Fruits vary between two and three-tenths of nutritious matter, and their order is as follows, the most nutritious being placed first : plums, grapes, apricots, cherries, peaches, gooseberries, apples, strawberries, melons. Milk contains less than one-tenth of nutritious matter, as it is mainly composed of water.

Of all the articles of food, boiled rice is digested in the shortest time—an hour. As it also contains eight-tenths of nutritious matter, it is a valuable substance of diet. Tripe and pig's feet (strange to tell) are digested as rapidly. Apples, if sweet and ripe, are next in order. Venison is digested almost as soon as apples. Roasted potatoes are digested in half the time required by the same vegetable boiled which occupy three hours and a half—more than beef or mutton! Bread occupies three hours and a quarter. Stewed oysters and boiled eggs are digested in three hours and a half—an hour more than is required by the same article, raw. Turkey and goose are converted in two hours and a quarter—an hour and a half sooner than chicken.

Roasted veal, pork, and salted beef occupy five hours and a half—the longest of all articles of food.—Hartford Review.

GOOD BYE.

There is hardly a greater perversion of the meaning of a phrase in the English language than is contained in the words so often used at parting with friends, "Good bye"—words which in themselves have no signification whatever. In olden times it was customary among pious people, when parting from those they loved or respected, to commend them to the protection of God. The phrase in French was "à Dieu"—to God—anglice, "adieu"—and used by thousands without a knowledge of its meaning. And the old English form of expression, "God be with you"—a most beautiful phrase when taking leave of a friend—is altogether discarded ; "Good bye," a corruption of this phrase, has usurped its place.—Boston Journal.

THE REGIUM DONUM.

Our readers, we suppose, are generally aware that the ministers of the Irish Presbyterian Church receive from the British government an annual grant of £75, called the Regium Donum, or Royal Bounty. This, however, is paid only to such congregations as contribute themselves £35. In consequence of the increased price of food, and the general impoverishment of the country, Rev. Dr. Morgan, as Moderator of the Assembly, lately applied to the government that the obligation to raise £35 should be rescinded. We have been favoured with a copy of the Londonderry Journal, in which we find the correspondence on the subject. The following extracts from the reply of the government, declining the application, are very interesting. We would call attention particularly to the honourable mention of the Eastern Ref. Pres. Synod.

Amount contributed for the support of the ministers, in the Irish Presbyterian Church, from each individual.

“A return is annexed (the first of the kind,) showing the population and payments of every congregation belonging to the General Assembly, being the body on whose behalf Dr. Morgan applied. In this there are 451 congregations accounted for, paying altogether £18,441 of stipend, or about £40 a-year each. The number of families is stated to be 85,850, and, multiplying them by five, (which is about the truth,) the total number of persons will be 432,250. And, if the aggregate stipend be divided by them, the average payment, by each individual, to his minister, is forty-one farthings a-year. The population connected with the General Assembly has been frequently affirmed, by parties representing it, to be five, six, and even eight hundred thousand. The materials for the present census have, however, been furnished to me by the several presbyteries; and, should they have inadvertently made an under statement, any increase of numbers must proportionably diminish even the very low average rate of payment given above.—No doubt there are many poor in so large a denomination; but as is known to every one acquainted with Ulster, there are also great numbers of prosperous, wealthy families. It is, however, unquestionable, that for about the last forty years, no class of Christians have been in the habit of paying so little to their ministers as the laity of the several Presbyterian synods, endowed by parliamentary grant; and, did the same parties reside in Scotland, England, or any where except in Ireland, they would have to contribute a far larger amount.

Churches declining the Bounty.

“There are three small Presbyterian bodies in Ulster, who accept no royal bounty; and their congregations, which are suffering under the same difficulties as their neighbours, pay more than double the average stipend of the endowed congregations. One of these bodies, called the Eastern Reformed Synod, has indeed largely increased its stipend this year. Other protestant dissenters, (not of the presbyterian denomination,) in despite of all local pressure, likewise pay, towards their own religious interests, a much greater average sum than the Presbyterians of the Synods receiving parliamentary support.

Comparative amount paid to ministers.

“Allusions are made, in Dr. Morgan’s letter, to an increase of the bounty, from the inadequacy of £75 to maintain the ministers, during the present high price of provisions. To many similar communications from other quarters, I have pointed out, as an answer, the payments of the congregations to their ministers, when contrasted with all around them; for, while in the commonest hedge or infant school, the children give each a penny a week, the presbyterian ministers, for affording religious instruction, do not receive from their people at the rate of even one farthing a-week. Other denominations are taxed for a parliamentary grant, to enable the Presbyterian laity to support their ministers; and by additional taxation, still farther to relieve that laity who contribute so little to this object themselves, would be unjust to those other denominations who have entirely to pay their own ministers, and do it liberally and cheerfully."

Foreign Missions.

THE REV. J. R. CAMPBELL.

Our readers have been informed of Mr. Campbell's return to this country from the Lodian Mission, with his family, on account of the serious ill health of Mrs. Campbell. We are thankful now to mention that she has become so far restored to health, as to authorize their return to their field of labour; and it is expected that they will sail again for India in the ensuing summer, probably accompanied by some other missionaries.

In the meantime Mr. Campbell is on a tour in the West, to visit as many of the churches of the Reformed Presbyterian body as his time will permit. We doubt not that he will meet with a cordial welcome also from such churches of our own body, as may have an opportunity of hearing his testimony concerning the missionary work in India.

The relations of the Rev. Messrs. Campbell and Caldwell to the General Assembly's Board are, we believe, well understood by our churches. Their union with our brethren is a missionary, and not an ecclesiastical one—formed under the Western Foreign Missionary Soc. It has proved to themselves and the other missionaries, a pleasant, and we doubt not, a useful connection in the Lord's work. And the Reformed Presbyterian Church, of which they are worthy ministers and missionaries, has evinced a great degree of liberality and Christian spirit in contributing to their support and that of their important work.

In addition to the preceding friendly notice from the Foreign Missionary Chronicle, the organ of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, we are pleased to be able to state, that Mr. Campbell has been zealously and diligently engaged in the prosecution of his missionary tour, and that he has every where met with the kindest reception, while his success in collecting funds has been remarkably great. His visit has been productive of much good, and his work of faith and labour of love will, we hope, be long remembered.

RECENT INTELLIGENCE.

INDIA: LODIANA MISSIONS.—Letters from this mission have been received, dated to the 20th of December last. The English school at Lodiana had been re-opened with the usual attendance. The Orphan school at Lodiana and Saharunpur had received several orphans, some months previous, the children of native soldiers who had perished in Afghanistan. Towards their support, the sum of three thousand rupees was paid over to the mission by Col. Lawrence, English Political resident at Lahore, by whose kind and generous efforts this arrangement was effected. These orphan children are spoken of as very grateful for their new homes. Attention was still given to the sick and infirm poor at Lodiana, but a medical missionary is greatly desired by the brethren, for this, and other missionary work. The Rev. A. Rudolph, who has charge of the English school and the medical establishment, thus closes his letter: "The preaching of the Gospel in the bazaar, as well as in our church and chapels, claims much of our time, and I look upon it as the most important of all our labours. The other things are to be considered only as auxiliaries. The Gospel evidently undermines the foundations of heathenism and Mohammedanism, and though we may not be permitted to see it, the time will come when the Lord shall overthrow both."—The Rev. J. H. Morrison and his family had reached Delhi, on their way to Sabathu.

INDIA: ALLAHABAD MISSION.—Letters have been received from Allahabad, dated to the 20th of December. The annual examination of the college was held on the 10th of that month, in the presence of a number of English residents, and about fifty native gentlemen, who all expressed great satisfaction at the result. The college had one hundred and fifty students in attendance during the last year. Two of the students have expressed to their preceptors much seriousness of feeling on religious subjects. The letter containing an account of this examination, and the present state of the mission college, did not come to hand in time for this number of the Chronicle; but we may here express the wishes of the brethren, that this important institution should be often remembered in the prayers of the churches.

THE CONVERSION OF THE WORLD PRACTICABLE.

It has been shown to be practicable to Christianize all nations by the simple process of Christian instruction. We do not refer here to that experiment which was made with so glorious a success, when the apostles and the primitive evangelists went every where preaching the word; we refer only to the history of modern missions, when we say, that experiments have proved the practicability of converting the world by the simple process of Christian instruction. Missionaries have already gone to all sorts of men; and every where they have had success enough, at least to show that they are engaged in a practicable enterprise. Do you ask whether China can be penetrated, and whether the Chinese can be taught the lessons of the gospel? While you ask, China is penetrated; Chinese Christians are at this moment spreading abroad among their countrymen the knowledge of the gospel. Do you ask whether the Hindoo can be Christianized,—the Brahmin, proud, learned, shrewd, and disputatious,—the Soodra, degraded to the dust,—both bound, as it were, hand and foot with iron fetters of caste? The Hindoo has been converted; the Brahmin and Soodra have been cleansed by a holier ablation than the waters of the Ganges, and, sitting together at the table of the Lord, have eaten of one bread, and drunk of one cup, in remembrance of Jesus. Do you ask whether the fierce red man of the American forest can be subdued, and tamed, and humanized? The gospel has tamed him; and you may see him sitting at the feet of Jesus, clothed, and in his right mind. The indolent, voluptuous, cruel savage of the Pacific,—he too has felt the power of the gospel; and O, what wonders has the gospel wrought among those isles that gem the bosom of the southern deep! What more desperate experiment can there be? Go to frozen Labrador,—go where, under the rigour of a polar sky, the dwarfish Greenlander maintains a precarious existence amid the everlasting conflict of the elements,—there the experiment has been tried; and there the wretched native, sitting in his snow-built cabin, through the long, dark watches of his sunless winter, has rejoiced in the splendour of the Sun of righteousness. And, to add one more particular to this recital, the African, about whom philosophers have sometimes doubted whether he is human, has been sought out by the officiousness of Christian love; and he too is a witness, that the world can be evangelized. The wild negro, the Hottentot, has come and built his hut by the mission-house, and has learned at once the arts of civilization and the virtues of the gospel. If any man would learn whether the conversion of the whole world by the simple process of instruction, is practicable, let him learn what has been done in Southern Africa. There the experiment has been tried more fairly, more thoroughly, and perhaps, on the whole, in circumstances more unfavourable to success than any where else. And there, what triumphs has the missionary achieved! What a work is the missionary there carrying forward! The simple and humble efforts of the Christian teacher have extended the gospel, more or less thoroughly, over a wide tract, beginning at the cape of Good Hope, and extending far into the continent. Village after village has been planted in the deep kloofs, and by the rivers; tribe after tribe has thrown off the filthy dress of sheep-skin, and with it the brutal manners of savage life,—has learned to cultivate the soil, and to make the wilderness a fruitful field,—has recovered its plundered rights from the grasp of oppression,—has acquired the use of letters,—has received the word of life, and the institutions of Christianity,—has been brought completely within the pale of Christendom. The change in them has been so signal, so manifestly for the better, that the report of it has travelled to distant tribes; and barbarous chieftains, men of plunder and of blood, have despatched messengers from afar, begging for missionaries. With such facts as these in view, we feel that the work of converting the world has been begun, and that experiment has shown it to be practicable.—Christian Spectator.

THE POWER OF CASTE.

You may have heard, or have read, what the caste of India is. You may have read of Brahmins; but I fear, from all that I have been able to ascertain since my arrival in this country, that it is as yet comparatively little that people know about these things in England. In reference to caste, I will give you an illustration, and you will see how it bears on the conversion of the heathen to Christianity in one solitary case. I baptized a man some years ago, and took the means to ascertain how many individuals were placed out of caste by that one conversion. You will be astonished to hear that the number was four hundred and sixty-one! The Brahmins took good care to ascertain all the ramifications of this man's family connexions, and found them out to the extent of his very Scotch cousins. There is nothing left untouched; and it is not merely the man himself that is put out of caste, but it is every one of his connexions.

I will relate very briefly a case that occurred a few years ago in connexion with the conversion of one of our native converts, now living and adorning the Gospel. This young man was then sixteen years of age, the legal age at which Hindoos can be baptized. In his own country he was in point of rank equal to an Earl in England. He had four large landed properties, and was possessed in his own person of fifty-five thousand pounds. We placed this position before him in every light of difficulty we could conceive. We said, "Here are enlightened and educated Brahmins, as they call themselves. They are adopting all the habits of the Europeans, rolling in their barouches, and living like princes. You can imitate that example if you remain a liberal Hindoo; but if you put on Christ, all this must be sacrificed. Look at it."

His father was dead, but he had a mother who loved him with all the tenderness of which a mother's heart is capable. Indeed, I have seldom seen more tenderness gushing from a mother's heart, than from her's. She loved him as a mother will love her only son. When we placed before him all these difficulties, he said, "I put the whole in one scale, and I put Christ in the other, and they are lighter than vanity. If you," addressing himself to me, "will not baptize me, I will go to another." He was baptized, and he is now a common writer in the treasury of Calcutta, in the receipt of about thirty rupees [fifteen dollars] per month.

When I was leaving Calcutta, I shook hands with him upon the beach for the last time; and when I looked upon him I wept, and he wept too. He said, "After all I have sacrificed, are you going to leave me?" I looked at him and said, "Is it come to this, then? Did you make those sacrifices for me?" He replied, "It is enough; I sacrificed them for the Master." Ah! how few there are in England who have such a sacrifice for Christ as that! We talk of our guineas, as we put them on the plate, as a sacrifice. We talk of our ten pounds and twenty pounds as munificent donations. But look at this. Fifty-five thousand pounds and four estates! Look at the loss of all rank and title. The day only before his conversion, he would have been worshipped by the highest Brahmin in the country; the day after, the meanest servant in my house would not have performed the meanest office for him!—Rev. CHINA.

Letters from the celebrated Mr. Gutzlaff, missionary and Consul-General of England in "the Celestial empire," have been received at Munich. They are dated from Hong-Kong, and give an account of the labours of that eminent individual, which approach the marvellous. He has just terminated a voluminous history of the Chinese empire, and has sent the manuscript of it to M. Cotta, the publisher, at Stuttgart. He has published at Hong-Kong, a Universal Geography in the Chinese language, with sixty large maps. He has recently begun to compose a complete dictionary of the Chinese language, which will, he says, absorb all his leisure for the next three years. It is only in his leisure hours that he can occupy himself with literary and scientific labours, all the rest of his time being devoted to his missionary labours and his consular duties. Mr. Gutzlaff announces that he has addressed some long memoirs on the geography of China to the Geographical Society of London, which it is expected will shortly be published. Mr. Gutzlaff still maintains that Christianity and European civilization can only be successfully propagated in China by the Chinese themselves. He has accordingly founded a Chinese Society which already possesses six hundred members, many of whom are mandarins, and some native savans of the first rank. This Society employs its efforts on all the countries situated to the south of the river Jang-tse-Kiang, and it has already published a great number of popular works.—Galignani.

SANDWICH ISLANDS.

From the last accounts received at the Mission Rooms from these Islands, it appears the natives are engaging with increased energy, in building school houses and meeting-houses, and raising funds for the support of teachers—both religious and school teachers,—and actually contributing money to aid in sending the blessings of Christianity to more destitute parts of the world. On the island of Molokai, the native Christians, during the past year, have received between eight and nine hundred dollars for these benevolent purposes, besides erecting three new meeting-houses on their Island. At Waimea, Island of Hawaii, Mr. Lyons reports as under his charge, sixteen churches, containing about two thousand members, twenty-one common schools, with about one thousand pupils, and the greater part of the children in Sabbath schools.

In the public schools of these Islands, according to the report of Mr. Richards, the Minister of Public Instruction, the number of pupils is 18,644. The number of ordained clergymen, 43; of whom 26 are Protestants, and 17 Catholics. Besides these, who are all foreigners, there are seven Natives (Protestants,) who have been licensed to preach the Gospel. Within the last year or two the population has slightly increased; but taking a period of ten years together, it has diminished.

ROCK PRAIRIE, WISCONSIN TERRITORY.

We have lately had the pleasure of receiving from an esteemed brother in the West, who has been in missionary labours exceedingly abundant—having, within a few years, been the means of forming four new congregations,—a brief account of a recent visit to Rock Prairie, Wisconsin Ter.

“Our new congregation there,” says Mr. M., “continues in a most prosperous condition. Had we an active, efficient, and godly minister placed there, the field would be ours; and, under the divine blessing, Rock Prairie congregation might soon be numbered among our strongest western churches. The people there are ready and anxious to make a call. A meeting with that object in view, was held during my late visit there; but, after calm deliberation, it was deemed prudent to postpone definite action.” . . . “I really believe there are but few places in our church where a mission could do more good. I am still alone in this vast north-western field, so far as missionary labours are concerned, and would therefore most earnestly plead for one or more to come over and help. The language of our Lord has peculiar emphasis when applied to this region. The harvest truly is plenteous, but the labourers are few. Will not the united and fervent prayer of the church be answered by the Lord of the harvest? We were delighted to hear the good tidings contained in the December No. of the Banner in reference to the numerical increase of our Zion in the East; and we feel assured that if the appropriate means are employed in this region, similar causes of grateful rejoicing would be abundant. At home matters are moving along pleasantly. In reference to our church, we have abundant reason to say, in the language of Samuel, ‘Hitherto hath the Lord helped us.’”

THE THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

Another session of our school of the prophets has just closed, and it is the testimony of all who witnessed its concluding exercises, and who have any remembrance of its past history, that its condition is more flourishing than at any former period. Thirteen* students have been enjoying its advantages during the season, and pleasing evidence has been given of talent, application, and that essential to ministerial character, ardent piety. Of the students, two have been already licensed, and another recommended for licensure at the first meeting of the Philadelphia Presbytery. The remainder are classified according to their merits.

The public exercises of the young men were universally remarked to be of a very superior order. And the reports of the professors respecting their deportment, assiduity, and success in literary and theological acquisitions, were entirely satisfactory. It is undoubtedly a token for good to the church that so many of her youth are devoting themselves to the sacred ministry in her communion. Taking this into view, along with the greatly increased opportunities of church extension which are now every where presenting themselves, an evident call is made upon the church to foster and encourage her seminary. The ministry should encourage it, as the hope of the church. Here are to be found those who may be expected to enter upon the fields which they open, and to take their places when called to their reward. And all who love the church of their fathers and of their own affections should encourage it; for here are educated, to preach the gospel and maintain the principles of the reformation, their own sons, and others devoted to the service of Jesus Christ.

As all would desire to keep up the standard of ministerial character, let them support the professors and superintendents of the seminary, as they are labouring for its interests.

The only drawback in all this scene of encouragement witnessed at the late meeting, was found in the fact that the small sum pledged by way of acknowledgment, to the senior professor was not paid. It will not be forgotten that Synod entered into a solemn engagement, when the professorship of theology was accepted, to pay a certain annual amount to the occupant of that chair. The presbyteries are responsible for its stated collection and transmission. May be it is forgotten because it is so small. If hundreds, nay thousands can be collected for other and new objects, shall old obligations remain undischarged? We trust this will not be the case. We take the liberty of commending the whole subject to the conscience and heart of the church. A SUPERINTENDENT.

TREASURER'S NOTICE.

The treasurer of Synod reports an arrearage of 155 dollars against the Seminary fund. This includes seventy-two dollars due on last year's account. All the presbyteries, except the Northern, are delinquent. We trust it is only needful to call attention to the fact to have the deficiency remedied. N.

ORDINATION AND INSTALLATION OF MR. W. STERRETT.

Mr. William Sterrett having accepted the call addressed to him by the Second Reformed Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, a meeting of the Reformed Presbytery of Philadelphia was held on Friday, April 7th, 1848, to attend to his ordination and installation. The sermon was preached by the Moderator of Presbytery, from 1 Tim. iii. 1, "This is a true saying, If a man desire the office of a bishop, he desireth a good work." The Rev. Dr. Wylie proposed the prescribed questions, and, after the ordination prayer, which was made by Rev. Dr. Crawford, addressed the pastor. The charge to the people was delivered by the Moderator of Presbytery, and the concluding prayer was offered by Rev. Dr. McLeod. The congregation was dismissed with the apostolic benediction pronounced by their newly ordained pastor. The services, which were of a very interesting character, were waited upon by a large assembly. We are happy to be able to state, that the prospects of usefulness and success presented to the highly-esteemed brother who has been thus set apart to the pastoral office, are very encouraging.

CHURCH EXTENSION—REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, BROOKLYN, L. I.

On the 31st of March last, a petition signed by sixty-two persons, residents of the city of Brooklyn, New York, was presented to the Northern Reformed Presbytery, asking an organization as a church under their care. The petition was granted, and a committee of Presbytery appointed to carry it into effect. The members were received according to the due order. Messrs. Thomas M'Burney, James Smith, and Robert Boggs, were ordained to the office of ruling elders, and the organization thus completed. The nucleus around which this interesting church has been so speedily gathered was composed of a small colony from Dr. McLeod's church, New York. Others of like principles and spirit have gathered around them, and thus, in less than three months from the commencement of the movement, the organization has been secured. This result has been greatly furthered by the assiduous, earnest, and most acceptable efforts of Mr. David J. Patterson, who has been supplying there for some time past.

May this new congregation prove a blessed and fruitful branch of the reformation vine.

Obituaries.

It is with deep sorrow that we announce the death of Rev. Dr. Paul, of Carrickfergus, Ireland, who has been so long and so extensively known as a most able champion for truth—truly a defender of the faith. Last December he was attacked with a paralytic stroke, from which he never recovered, although he was not removed until the 16th of March. The following letter from an elder of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, in Belfast, gives a very interesting account of the closing scenes of his life.

Belfast, 3 Donegall Place, March 17th, 1848.

REV. AND DEAR SIR:—It is my painful duty to inform you of the death of our dear friend, DR. PAUL. This melancholy event took place yesterday morning, at ten o'clock. About ten weeks ago, he was seized with paralysis, when sitting in his own parlour, conversing with his family, about nine o'clock in the evening. He was entirely deprived of the use of his left side, but was mercifully spared the entire use of his speech, and of his mental faculties till the last, which he used with as much vigour and energy, when his little strength permitted, as he ever did in his life. He never complained of pain or sickness, but every one who visited him found him rejoicing in the goodness of God, and on the last Sabbath he spent on earth, he said he found so much refreshed from the repose of the past night, that he felt as if he could almost walk up to Loughmorne. I think I never enjoyed such a privilege on earth, and perhaps never will again, as when visiting that good man. On one occasion, especially, by his own particular desire and appointment, I, with another friend or two, from Belfast, met a few of his elders and friends from Loughmorne, in his room, and spent some hours in religious exercises. It was a day long to be remembered. He mentioned to us a portion of psalmody he wished sung. He spoke much respecting the Evangelical Alliance, in London, and said he never witnessed such a scene on earth, nor would again, till he would witness something similar in heaven, as when that great assembly joined their hearts and their voices in the praise of God. When parting with him in the evening I said I was afraid we had wearied him, by continuing too long. He said, "No, not at all," that he "felt greatly refreshed," and that "he had never spent a happier day;" it had been to him "quite a jubilee." And I never will forget the solemn manner in which he prayed for a blessing on us when parting.

Thus he has lived, and thus he died, rejoicing in the goodness and glory of his divine master. The press here are vieing with each other, trying, as it were, who can say most in his praise, even those who were opposed to him on political grounds; for he never was afraid to avow his principles, and defend them, too, on every fitting occasion.

REV. G. T. EWING.

With great regret we record the death of the Rev. G. T. Ewing, who had been for several years past the respected, useful, and very successful pastor of the second Reformed Presbyterian Church, Pittsburgh. This melancholy event occurred on board the Steamboat General Pike, about 100 miles above New Orleans, to which place Mr. Ewing was going with the intention of making a sea voyage for the benefit of his health, which had been lately much impaired. His affectionate wife was with him during his last moments which her assiduous attentions rendered less painful than would otherwise have been the case. When removals of the kind we have recorded are occurring at home and abroad, how solemnly are the living admonished of their duty, and how emphatically is the question presented, Who will take up the fallen standards?

RETURN OF REV. R. J. BLACK.

We are gratified in being able to announce the safe return of Rev. R. J. Black. He arrived in this city on the 24th of April, in much improved health. We hope a long course of usefulness is before him.

Anti-Slavery.

AN EXPOSTULATION WITH THOSE CHRISTIANS AND CHRISTIAN CHURCHES, IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, THAT ARE IMPLICATED IN THE SIN OF SLAVEHOLDING, BY A COMMITTEE OF THE SYNOD OF THE REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN SCOTLAND.

“Remember them that are in bonds, as bound with them.”—HEB. xiii. 1.

“At EDINBURGH, the sixth day of July, eighteen hundred and forty-seven, SESSION II.”

“The Synod of the Reformed Presbyterian Church resolved that a brief, but earnest expostulation and remonstrance on the subject of American slavery, be addressed, in the name of this church, to all Christians and Christian churches in America, who are directly, or indirectly, implicated in the sin of slaveholding, and that the following members be a committee for preparing the expostulation, communicating it to the parties concerned, and giving it as wide circulation as possible,—viz.: Professor Symington, D.D., Rev. Peter Macindoe, D.D., Rev. William Symington, D.D., Rev. Stewart Bates, D.D., Rev. Thomas Neilson, and Rev. John Graham. Dr. Macindoe, Convener.”

JOHN M'DERMID, MODERATOR,
ARCHD. M. ROGERSON, CLERK.

DEAR BRETHREN,—In proceeding to address you on the subject of slavery, still prevalent among you, we are very desirous that our motives and feelings should not be misunderstood. We can assure you that, unless our hearts greatly deceive us, we cherish none but the most friendly feelings toward you individually, with whatever denominations you are connected, and none but the warmest wishes for the growing prosperity, happiness, and honour of your great country.

We are well aware, that belonging as we do to a foreign nation, we are taking an unusual liberty when we venture to address you on any one of your national institutions. But this is a liberty which, we think, we can vindicate on the principles of our common Christianity, and which we are quite willing you also should use in reference to any great evil in our land which you may consider us slow in removing. We admit, we lament, there are evils in our political and ecclesiastical systems which have long been our reproach—evils on account of which enlightened, religious, and liberal Britons may well hang their heads and blush in presence of their American brethren. Against those evils the church to which we belong has, from the very beginning, endeavoured to contend with a degree of freedom that has exposed her in some quarters to the charge of being too particular and too scrupulous in her testimony. We should not at all be offended, but very well pleased, if you, in the same spirit in which we now address you, were to send to the British churches such a remonstrance against the evils in question, as would encourage the hearts and strengthen the hands of all who are now sighing for their removal. Why should not the followers of Jesus and the friends of man, in different lands, be disposed, in the exercise of fraternal affection and mutual courtesy, to act on the Christian principle of "comforting one another," "admonishing one another," and even "reproving one another," especially at a crisis when the common enemy is sparing no efforts by which he may uphold and extend the baleful influence of error and ungodliness, of superstition and tyranny!

Nor, in referring to the practice of slaveholding, as still existing among you, would we indulge any other than a kind and charitable spirit toward those by whom in any way it is upheld and perpetuated. We own no sympathy with those, whether your own countrymen or ours, who have allowed themselves, on any occasion, to substitute fabrications for facts, revilings for reasonings; and who have sought to rouse the passions by fierce invectives, rather than to convince the understanding by correct statements, and win the heart by Christian appeals. We have always felt, that whatever be the degree in which you are deserving of blame, you are entitled to justice, candour, and kindness. We are fully persuaded that the advocacy of the natural rights and varied interests of the slaves will be conducted in the best temper and with the greatest success, by making allowance for the difficulties with which you have to struggle, when you would seek the abolition of a system that is interwoven with early prejudices and sanctioned by bad laws. If, therefore, any harsh expression should escape us, or any apparent want of kindly feeling be betrayed in the following address, you may rest assured the fault lies in the execution, not in the intention,—that nothing can be farther from our thoughts than any word or deed that can by possibility give well-grounded offence to any party implicated in evils which they themselves cannot fail to lament, and over which the most eminent Christians and the most enlightened patriots have long mourned.

You will bear with us then, dear brethren, when, at the outset, we express our opinion—an opinion not rashly formed, nor wantonly uttered—that you are still implicated in many of the evils of slavery. That there are many Christians and several churches in your land who are endeavouring to keep themselves free from these, as far as their relation to the commonwealth will allow, we well know, and sincerely rejoice. But we cannot cast our eyes over the southern states without seeing other denominations and other individuals pursuing a course which involves them in much guilt, and exposes them to merited reproach. We mean yourselves. How can you on the one hand, consider the commands of your divine Lord to "love your neighbour as yourselves," to "do to others whatsoever ye would that they should do to you," to "remember them that are in bonds," &c., and on the other, look to that injured race whose groans have so often pierced your ears, and whose sufferings ought to have drawn tears from every eye, without feeling sorrow and shame at having countenanced a system that inflicts so many wrongs, and occasions so many pangs? With all the earnestness consistent with due respect,—in the name of the meek and merciful Redeemer whom you profess to follow,—for the honour of that religion which proclaims liberty to the captives, comfort to the mourners, deliverance to the oppressed, and good-will to all,—we would beseech you to consider, in the sight of God and in the light of heaven, how far you are abetting slavery in the following particulars.

1. Have you ever given a full and faithful exposure of the unsound and iniquitous principle upon which the whole system is based? We believe not. That principle, disguise it as you will, is nothing less than this,—that man may innocently hold property in man; in other words, that one man may, by force, reduce any number of his unoffending fellow-men to the condition of mere chattels, which he may hold, or sell, or barter, or treat in any way he pleases for his own pecuniary advantage. And is this a principle that deserves the least countenance from freemen? Ought it to find an asylum in the bosoms, and an apology from the lips of American freemen? Does not your own “Declaration of Independence” emphatically announce these memorable truths,—“that all men are created equal,—that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights,—that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness,—that to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men?” Do not your soundest jurists teach that every man, whatever be the colour of his skin, or the form of his features, is entitled to dispose of his labour in whatever market and on whatever terms he pleases? Above all, do not the benevolent spirit and the moral precepts of the gospel forbid you to place others in a condition in which you yourself would not wish to be put, and to subject them to treatment which, were it inflicted on yourselves, would be resented as an outrage on your essential rights, and an invasion of your Christian privileges? It is all very well to admit, as you are ready to do, that there are many things about slavery which you cannot justify and will not palliate; but why not condemn the principle itself? It is going a certain length in the right direction to confess that some of the laws are very bad, some of the masters very cruel, and some of the slaves are subjected to hardships that cannot be too deeply lamented; but why not assail the system out of which these evils necessarily grow? None know better than yourselves that the clear, vigorous, uncompromising exposure of a bad principle is worth volumes of the most eloquent denunciation on the practical evils to which it leads. Tear up by the roots that upas tree which has spread its branches over so many parts of your rich soil, and you will no longer suffer from its withering shade or from its poisonous fruits.

Are you maintaining a full and faithful testimony against the practical evils of the system? You will not deny that every church, true to the trust she has received from her Lord, will endeavour to act the part of an intelligent, impartial, unfaltering witness for God, by protesting, in an open manner, against such evils as she cannot by her immediate action remove. This may expose her to reproach from private parties, and even to the resentment of the governing authorities; but the promised presence and approbation of her Head should make her bold in the denunciation of flagrant wrongs. But what testimony worthy of the name have you ever issued against the enormous evils of slavery?* Have you not evinced a disposition rather to palliate these when they have been brought forward by conscientious opponents?—Have you not been very forward to apologize for the legalized severities of which masters have been guilty, and to screen them from the censures which they deserved? A living author* asks, "What witness has yet been borne by the church in these slave states, against this almost universal sin? How has she fulfilled her vocation? She raises no voice against this predominant evil; she palliates it in theory, and in practice she shares in it. The mildest and the most conscientious of the bishops of the south are slaveholders themselves. What has been her conduct? If we seek to test the real power over men's hearts, by asking what her influence has been, we shall rate it low indeed. No voice has come forth from her. The bishops of the north sit in open convention with the slaveholding brethren; and no canon proclaims it contrary to the discipline of their church to hold property in man, and treat him as a chattel." Another writer† gives this humiliating picture: "Of the Presbyterian, as well as the other clergy of the south, some are even planters, superintending the toils of their slaves, and making purchases or effecting sales in the slave markets during the week, and preaching on Sundays whatever they can devise that is least contrary to their daily practice. I watched closely the preaching in the south—that of all denominations—to see what could be made of Christianity, 'the highest fact in the rights of man,' in such a region. The clergy were pretending to find express sanctions of slavery in the Bible, and putting words to this purpose into the mouths of public men who do not profess to remember the evidence of the Bible in any other connexion. The clergy were boasting at public meetings that there was not a periodical south of the Potomac which did not advocate slavery; and some were even setting up a magazine, whose 'fundamental principle is, that man ought to be the property of man.'—The clergy who were to be sent as delegates to the General Assembly were receiving instructions to leave the room, if the subject of slavery was mentioned, and to propose the cessation of the practice of praying for slaves."

3. Are you not to blame, also, in tamely submitting to those laws which prohibit you from teaching the slaves to read the Holy Scriptures? In favour of such laws no tongue should speak, and no pen should write. Even silence on the part of citizens involves no common guilt, and incurs no ordinary responsibility. Had these laws proceeded from the Roman pontiffs, who have ever been hostile to the freedom of the human mind and the dissemination of the sacred writings, they would not have excited our surprise; but issuing, as they do, from legislatures, the members of which were elected by Protestants, they may well awaken our astonishment as well as our regret.—How arrogant—no less than impious—the attempt to avert the light of heaven on its way to the be-clouded minds of perishing sinners!—Yet is this done, in several of the southern states, under the authority of statutes to which heavy penalties are annexed;‡ and, so far as we know, no adequate effort has ever been made by the members of the churches in those states to have these unrighteous enactments done away. Well might one of your own judges§ exclaim, "In vain has

† Miss Martineau.

‡ "In North Carolina, to teach a slave to read or write, or to sell or give him any book (the Bible not excepted,) is punished with thirty-nine lashes, or imprisonment, if the offender be a free negro; but if a white, then with a fine of two hundred dollars."

§ Judge Jay.

the Redeemer of the world given the command to preach the gospel to every creature; his professed disciples in the slave states have issued a counter order, and have by their laws incapacitated two millions of their fellow-men from complying with the injunction, 'Search the scriptures.' Not only are the slaves debarred from reading the wonderful things of God—they are practically prevented, with few exceptions, from even hearing of them." No less humiliating is the confession of one of your own divines,* who says, "Those laws have been enacted on the principle, that they are necessary to perpetuate the system; that there is no other way of preserving the slaves in subordination; that were they allowed to be acquainted with the Bible, it would make them restless and dissatisfied, and would tend to the ultimate subversion of the whole system. It is understood every where in the slaveholding states, that nothing would be more fatal to the existence of slavery there, than to establish a system of common school instruction; and that the whole institution would be perilled, if all the slaves were taught to read the Bible." How must good men feel, so long as they are under the tyranny of such execrable laws?—Must not their own hearts reproach them, and their very countenances redden with shame, if they are not using their utmost influence, through every possible channel, to have the foul stain wiped away from the national character?

4. Are not many of your ministers guilty of countenancing slavery by the way in which they corrupt and mutilate the ordinance of marriage? Marriage, in every civilized country, in every free state, is contracted for life. So long as the parties are spared, they cannot be lawfully separated, except on one ground; and that is a crime which never fails to be fatal to the happiness and the hopes of which the union is designed to be productive. But how inferior the sort of connexion that takes place among the slaves, under the desecrated, the dishonoured name of marriage! In how many cases are husbands and wives torn asunder, after a brief intercourse, without the least fault on the part of either, and contrary to their deeply cherished wishes and loudly expressed entreaties! The warmest affection may have subsisted between them; the tenderest sympathies may have soothed their feelings under their nameless oppressions; and when they look around on the little children whom Providence has cast on their care, they cannot but feel an intense desire to live together still, that they may watch over their young and interesting charge. But the inhumanity of your laws will not permit this. The closest bonds must be severed, the tenderest feelings violated, and all the endearments of domestic life sacrificed, at the bidding of a master, whose heart the bitterest wailings cannot touch, whose purpose the strongest arguments cannot shake, and whose conscience the most earnest appeals cannot awaken. Nor do we blame the masters alone. We cannot help saying that our brethren in the ministry, who lend themselves to the mutilation of an ordinance which God himself has appointed, deserve no small blame. Could we imagine that any thing we can write on this topic has any chance of arresting their attention, we would ask them, "how can you so far prostitute the office you fill, as to mutilate a contract so sacred as marriage, accompanied with a religious sanction! In marrying two whites, you are accustomed, most properly, to bind them for the whole period of their natural lives, and to cheer them with the prospect of that happiness to which they are looking forward, being as lasting as their own existence. But when you come to marry two blacks, though they have originally the same feelings as those of a fairer complexion and a finer mould, do you not pursue a different course? Instead of asking them to vow that they will live together till the decease of one of the parties; instead of pronouncing the solemn mandate which came from the lips of God himself, 'what God has joined together, let no man put asunder,' do you not bind them for such a length of time only as their owner may find conducive to his pecuniary interest, or compatible with his commercial engagements? And what is this but making yourselves accessory to a species of concubinage by which, to an enormous extent, the claims of sound principles are opposed, the interests of pure morality are destroyed, and the feelings of attached families cruelly wounded?"

5. Are not those churches implicated in the sin of slave-holding, that admit the proprietors of slaves to full communion? We are aware we are now entering on very delicate ground. We cannot, however, flinch from the position which every branch of the Reformed Presbyterian church has maintained for nearly fifty years. After a renewed examination of the whole subject, again urged on our attention by occurrences which we did not originate; after perusing with some care the principal publications that have appeared on both sides, in the course of these few years, we feel our previous convictions only strengthened, and experience the pleasing consciousness that we are supporting a principle which will one day commend itself to the sound judgment and good feeling of all true Christians. Do not, we pray you, mistake our meaning. We bring no charge against the general character of that large and influential class who are called slave-holders. That they are kind in their dispositions, courteous in their manners, correct in their habits, just in their dealings, and honourable in their bearing, may be all true. That some of them may be even sincere Christians, having the grace of God in their hearts, and his image impressed on their characters, we have no wish to dispute. The determination of such a question does not belong to us, or to any other party on earth. But we are dealing with a matter that does come within our province, when we reiterate the principle, that no amount of inward piety, and no correctness of general behaviour, will warrant the admission to the enjoyment of full fellowship of a person who, in regard to even one flagrant and scandalous evil is pursuing a course inconsistent with his religious profession. Now, we cannot look upon slave-holding, even by itself, as any thing less than an actual immorality,—a censurable offence. Apart altogether from the numerous evils which accompany it wherever it exists, it involves a principle of robbery which can never be too fully exposed, nor too loudly condemned. Is it not robbery to deprive fellow-creatures of those natural rights which they have received from their Maker, which they have not forfeited by crime, and without which they cannot maintain the moral bearing, nor enjoy the precious privileges that become free citizens? Even one of your own churches has admitted this in a judicial deed.* "We regard all who are concerned in bringing any of the human race into slavery, or in retaining them—all who keep, sell, or buy slaves, as manstealers, guilty of the highest kind of theft, and as sinners of the first rank." And, if the masters among you are to be regarded as "manstealers, guilty of the highest kind of theft, as sinners of the first rank," ought they to be received into full communion? Is not this to throw down the fences which the Saviour has erected around his church, and to allow the very worst characters to enjoy the privileges which he intended only for his genuine disciples? Is not this to encourage them in their sinful practices? Would it not be an act of the greatest kindness to themselves, to warn them of the extent to which they are offending God, and exposing their own souls to hazard? And would not their exclusion from the fellowship of the church, till they gave evidence of their repentance, by "loosing the bands of wickedness, undoing the heavy burdens, and letting the oppressed go free," be an excellent mean, under the divine blessing, of awakening their minds to a due sense of that particular sin, on account of which they are excluded, and leading them to the adoption of a course consistent with the great principles of justice, benevolence, and good policy?

6. What can we think of those American churches that are in the habit of keeping gangs of slaves for the purpose of hiring them out to those who may wish to purchase their services for limited periods? We cannot conceive of any practice more incongruous than this. Were a congregation to keep a number of horses or oxen for a similar use, we cannot tell how much its spirituality would be endangered, and its name tarnished. How much more must these evils be incurred, when professing Christians so shockingly degrade their fellow-creatures, endowed with the same faculties and feelings, and destined to the same immortality with themselves! Yet is this done, we are assured, in not a few congregations, who thus increase the funds from which they pay stipends to their ministers, and meet other ecclesiastical demands. What a revolting species of traffic for a church! How impossible it must be for her to bear any thing like adequate testimony against an evil, from participating in which she derives a considerable portion of her revenues! With what consistency can her ministers utter one word against the fundamental principle and the practical evils of a system from which they draw a portion of their emoluments!

Biographical Sketches.

GEORGE BUCHANAN.

(Concluded.)

To the French, at this period of his life, Buchanan was much attached, and they, with their characteristic vanity, wished to lay claim to him as their own; his reputation as a poet having now shed a glory around the land of his birth. The warmth of his attachment he expressed in a poem, which he wrote on the occasion of his arrival in France, where he soon after was appointed a regent of the college of Bonconit.

From thence [1553] he was called into Italy, by Charles de Cosse of Brescia, who then, with much reputation and success, governed in the French and Genoese countries about the Po, and lived with him and his son Timoleon, sometimes in Italy, and sometimes in France: he remained for about five years, till the year 1560. A great part of this time he spent in the study of the Holy Scriptures, that so he might be able to form a more correct judgment of the controversies in religion, which employed the thoughts, and occupied the time of most of the men of those days. And these disputes being then a little silenced in Scotland, when that kingdom was freed from the tyranny of the Guises of France; he at length returned thither, and became a member of the reformed church of Scotland.

The date of his return cannot be exactly ascertained. But it was certainly about the year 1560. Some of his early writings he now, as it were, redeemed from shipwreck, collected and published. The rest, which were scattered up and down in the hands of his friends, he committed to the disposal of Providence. Shortly after, he was made choice of by the young Queen, on her arrival from France, to assist and direct her classical studies; and so much does he seem to have been impressed with her insinuating manners and elegant accomplishments, as to have given vent to his admiration, by dedicating to her the first complete edition of his Psalms. Nor does it appear that she was altogether insensible to his merits, for we find she rewarded him for his services, by conferring upon him [1564] the temporalities of Crossraguell Abbey. His steady attachment, however, to the reformed religion and the liberties of his country, rendered him directly opposed to her favourite designs and her ruling passions, and led him to cultivate the friendship of those who afterwards placed themselves in array against her.

Accordingly, during this same year, we find he prepared for the press a collection of his Satires, in which he employed his keenest irony against the fooleries and impurities of the Popish church, and having finished his Franciscanus, dedicated it to his friend and patron, the Earl of Moray. Two years after [1566,] a vacancy having occurred, he was presented by that nobleman, as prior of St. Andrew's, to the principality of one of the colleges in that city.

He now, of course, gave up his connexion with the court, and removed his residence thither; and the chamber which, as principal of St. Leonards, he is said to have occupied, is yet shown to the curious, and is supposed to have undergone but little transformation. In this office, he delivered occasional prelections in Theology, and gave ample proofs of his acquaintance with the Scriptures; and not only in the university, but throughout the church, his character stood high. Though never either rector or dean of the Faculty of Arts, his name occurs three times in the record of 1567-8-9, as one of the dean's assessors, and, from the year 1563 to 1567, he had the honour of a seat in the General Assembly as a Doctor, was a constant member of its most important committees, and in the last of these years was chosen Moderator.

He was now called from the calm pursuits of the scholar, poet, and theologian, to mingle in the arena of civil politics. After the defeat of the Queen at Langside, and her unhappy flight into England, the Regent was forced by his circumstances to undertake the ungracious task of appearing as the accuser of his sister and sovereign; and in the performance of this painful duty was assisted by Buchanan, who attended him to the conferences at York and Westminster [1568-9,] and drew up in Latin, "A Detection of the Doings of Mary, Queen of Scots." He has also, but erroneously, been supposed to be the author of another Latin treatise on the same subject, "Actio contra Mariam," and on account of it has suffered much undeserved reproach; but this, in reality, was produced by one of the satellites of Elizabeth, and contains sentiments the very reverse of Buchanan's. The Detection, which was strictly an official paper, as originally written by him was a concise historical deduction of facts, such as was absolutely necessary for understanding the subject, and vindicating the nobles in their proceedings against the Queen.

Upon the death of the Regent, which happened soon after, dreading the prevailing influence and ambitious views of the house of Hamilton, he wrote and printed his "Admonition to the true Lords, maintainers of justice and obedience to the King's Grace;" a tract, having in view to rouse the nobility to repress the disorderly, to punish the abettors of sedition, and to protect the young King from the dangers which threatened his life.

It would also appear, that having, during the Regency of Moray, been for a short period Director of Chancery, he was, under that of Lennox, in the year 1570, appointed Lord Privy Seal. In the same year, too, he was intrusted with the important charge of educating the young King, now in his fourth year, a charge, which all will acknowledge his fitness to undertake, and his fidelity in executing, and which he would have fulfilled with much more success, had those who were associated with him been equally faithful. As being Lord Privy Seal, he was entitled to a seat in Parliament, and was appointed a commissioner on several important occasions. In 1578, he formed one of a commission, including many of the most illustrious for rank or talent in Scotland, appointed to examine and digest the laws of the land. He was also included in two commissions respecting education; and also in one for examining a "Book of the Policy of the Kirk." During the time that Morton was displaced from the office of Regent, he was, moreover, associated with other officers of State, appointed by the Privy Council to advise and direct the young monarch: an office which soon became unnecessary by the Earl's return to power. But amidst all these varied avocations, his whole soul seems to have been intensely bent on forming the mind of his royal pupil to those maxims of government and those principles of character on which the dignity and happiness of a first Magistrate essentially depend. On this subject, his bold and independent, and almost prophetic address to him in dedicating the Baptistes, in 1576, ought not to be passed over. "This circumstance," says he, "may seem to bear a more particular reference to you, that it clearly discloses the punishment of tyrants, and the misery which awaits them when their prosperity seems at its height. That you should now acquire such knowledge, I consider as not only expedient but even necessary, in order that you may early begin to hate whatever you ought to shun. I therefore wish this work to remain as a witness to posterity, that if, impelled by evil counselors, and suffering the licentiousness of royalty to prevail over a virtuous education, you should hereafter be guilty of any improper conduct, the fault may be imputed, not to your preceptors, but to you, who have not obeyed their salutary admonitions."

In similar language, and with increasing anxiety, did he, three years afterwards, inscribe to him the most important of all his writings, except his History, the treatise, De jure Regni apud Scotos: "I have deemed," says the venerable teacher, "this publication expedient, that it may at once testify my zeal for your service, and admonish you of your duty to the community." Then, after some compliments to his docility, he adds: "Yet am I compelled to entertain some slight degree of suspicion, lest evil communication, the alluring nurse of the vices, should lend an unhappy impulse to your still tender mind; especially as I am not ignorant with what facility the external senses yield to seduction. I have therefore sent you this treatise, not only as an advice, but even as an importunate, and sometimes impudent, exhorter, to direct you, at this critical period of life, safely past the dangerous rocks of adulation; not merely to point out the path, but to keep you in it, and if you should deviate, to reprove and reclaim your wanderings; which monitor if you obey, you will ensure tranquillity to yourself and your family, and transmit your glory to the most remote posterity."

This treatise, originally written as a defence of the friends of freedom in their treatment of the Queen, is not confined to the merely local and temporary question as to the murder of her husband, and her liability to punishment; but considers, in all its bearings, the broad, but delicate subject of allegiance, and has in view to show, that only a good government has a right to support, and that a bad one ought to be resisted.

Now advanced to his 74th year, he was induced, in compliance with the solicitations of his friends, to write a short account of his life, which, marked as it is by his characteristic manliness and simplicity, is, so far as it goes, followed throughout in the present memoir.

An instance of his kindness to an humble scholar, who about this time solicited his revival of a work, and which has been recorded to his honour, seems to fix his residence at Stirling. From a letter, however, still extant, addressed by him to Beza, and the last that he wrote, it would appear he shortly after removed to Edinburgh. It is dated Edinburgh, 15th July, 1581. His history, on which he had employed for twenty years, what leisure he could command, was now at press, and excited, as might be supposed, a considerable share of interest and attention. Out of a desire to see it, and also to inquire after his health, his cousin, Thomas Buchanan, together with Andrew and James Melville, then at St. Andrew's, paid him a visit; in his account of which, the latter has related a circumstance which strikingly displays his strength of mind, and decision of character, even to the last. On requesting him to alter a passage, at which they thought the King might be offended, he replied by the question, "Tell me if I have told the truth." "Yes," said his cousin, "I think so." "Then," said he, "I will abide his feud, and all his kin's: pray, pray to God for me, and let Him direct all."

This visit he survived about a twelvemonth, and it would have been gratifying to know, whether he ever received any mark of gratitude or kindness from his royal pupil during the whole of his protracted illness: presumptions are against it. Thunanus informs us that James required his preceptor to retract what he had written with so much freedom respecting the Queen, his mother, and leave to posterity some formal testimony of his compunction. He at first returned an evasive answer, but being afterwards importuned by repeated messages, he made this final declaration:—That he would not recall what he had written in the full conviction of its truth; but that after his decease, it would be in the King's power to adopt such measures with regard to his writings as he might judge expedient. He, however, admonished him to proceed with mature deliberation; and to reflect, that although God had intrusted supreme power to kings, yet that truth, which derives its strength from God, is as superior to their control as God is superior to man.

Tradition adds, that about this time, in one of the several messages he sent to him, the King required his presence at court, within twenty days, under pain of his displeasure; but that he, finding his death approaching, sent him back a letter of admonition relative to the government of his kingdom, and well-being of his people; and told him that he could run the hazard of his Majesty's displeasure without danger; for that "by the time limited, he would be where few kings or great men should be honoured to enter." At reading which, it is said, the King wept.

It is uncertain whether he lived to see his great work published; he was, however, spared the pain of seeing the attempts of his ungrateful pupil to suppress it, and what would have been more galling to his virtuous spirit, the sycophancy of a Scottish Parliament seconding the wishes of an undisguised, but happily a weak despot, in a country, heretofore the land of freedom. He expired on the morning of Friday, the 28th of September, 1582, a little before five o'clock, at the age of seventy-six years, and nearly eight months: his last moments were tranquil, and when visited by John Davidson, he expressed his sole reliance to be upon the blood of Christ. He was buried on Saturday, in the Grey Friars' church-yard, a great company of the faithful attending his funeral; and he who had raised an imperishable monument to the name of Scotland, has been allowed to remain without any other than a 'Through-stone' to mark his grave, of which the inscription, if it ever had one, was illegible more than a century ago. An obelisk, however, has lately been raised by subscription, to his memory, at the village of Killearn.

His whole property at his death consisted of one hundred pounds, arrears, due upon his pension of Crossraguell; and it is said he was buried at the expense of the city of Edinburgh, having, before his decease, ordered his servants to distribute to the poor a small sum he had in his house, and which was too trifling for any other purpose.

A skull, so thin as to be transparent, is still shown in the Edinburgh museum, as that of Buchanan, and is usually contrasted with that of an idiot's, which is remarkably thick; its history, however, is somewhat doubtful.

"Buchanan," says an eloquent living writer, "shared, with his most eminent compatriots, a fate to which his high talents and exemplary virtues equally entitled him; he was loved with the fondest enthusiasm by his friends, and followed with the keenest animosity by his enemies; for his friends were the friends of virtue, and his traducers a crowd of court sycophants, whose hatred is his highest praise. His countenance and manners were somewhat austere, but his heart was warm and kind; his conversation fascinating. He possessed, in an uncommon degree, the power of attracting around him the most eminent men of the countries in which he resided, and the still more uncommon faculty of retaining their admiration and friendship. His integrity was unbending, and his veracity unimpeachable. He was a patriot in the purest sense of the word. Perceiving early in life the necessity, he shared in the dangers of the Reformation, and having carefully examined, he ardently embraced the doctrines of the Reformed. His piety seems to have been sincere and solid; it accompanied him through life, and supported him in death.

As a Latin poet, he was styled, by his friend Stephanus, the first of the age in which he lived, and all his cotemporaries acknowledged this supremacy, which their posterity have confirmed. As a political writer, he stands distinguished not more for the boldness than the soundness of his opinions, and if he was vehement, the errors which he combated were strongly intrenched behind prejudice and interest, and would have mocked the assault of a puny arm. As a historian, his eloquence is unequalled among modern, and he rivals rather than imitates the most splendid of ancient writers. If he had a bias, it was uniformly on the side of virtue and freedom; nor is his indignation ever pointed but against tyranny, irreligion, and vice.

He has been accused of ingratitude to Mary, but it remains to be proved that she ever did more than pay him for his services; and it is certain that, till he believed her guilty of murder and adultery, he remained her friend; and his having been at one time her classical tutor, however this might aggravate the poignancy of his feelings on her fall, could never be a sufficient reason to an honest man for becoming the apologist of conduct, which his duty to his country compelled him to condemn."

"He was a man," says Sir James Melville, "of notable endowments, great learning, and an excellent Latin poet; he was much honoured in foreign countries, pleasant in conversation, into which he happily introduced short moral maxims, which his invention readily supplied him with upon any emergency." His works that are now extant make two folio volumes. The pamphlets, going under the title of the Witty Exploits of George Buchanan, seem to be spurious; although it is certain he pronounced many witty sayings, of which a great number never were committed to writing.—Scottish Worthies.

Practical Essays.

EVILS INCIDENT TO GAMES OF CHANCE.

BY DR. J. M. MASON.

The mischiefs attendant upon gaming, can be viewed in no other light than of penalties which God inflicts for the violation of his law. On the confirmed gamester we do not hope to make an impression. An understanding so blighted; a conscience so seared; a heart so cold, so selfish, and so hard, as enter into the composition of his character, render him deaf to remonstrance, and put him, for the most part, out of the reach of reform. But they who hate gaming, while they love the game; who play freely for amusement, while they would, on no account, play for lucre; and who would shudder at the thought of promoting either vice or misery, are entreated to reflect whether there be not such evils connected with the game of chance, even in its least exceptionable form, and with its best limitations, as require them to abstain from it altogether.

1. A most unprofitable consumption of time, is, by general consent, among the fruits of the card-table and the dice-board.

Those relaxations and exercises which are necessary to health, to spirits, and to activity, ordinarily carry with them their own restriction. Bodily weariness, or the cessation of that charm which, for a short period, the mind perceives in occupations calculated to relieve it from its pressure, are of themselves an admonition that the end is answered; that the recreation is over; and that we must return to the business of life. But there is, in the very nature of the game of chance, a perpetual and increasing incitement. It tempts, fascinates, absorbs. The glass runs out unheeded: hour is added to hour; and the party rises fatigued and exhausted. Exceptions there doubtless are; but that such is the tendency of the game, and such its very frequent effect, cannot well be denied. Let the reader pause. Let him ask himself whether this is an appropriation of time fit for one who means either to obey God, or do good to man? Let him ask, whether whole afternoons or evenings, thus expended, belong to the "redeeming of time;" or will afford a peaceful retrospect on the bed of death? Add up the moments which are squandered at the card-table, without the least imaginable benefit to body, soul, or to society: look at their sum: see how much thou mightest have lived in them to thyself, to thy friends, to God; and remember that it is all lost, worse than lost, from those days for every one of which thou must give an account.

2. An inseparable concomitant of the card-table is intellectual dissipation.

The writer of these remarks numbers it among the mercies of God that he has seldom, very seldom indeed, been placed in circumstances which compelled him to witness the operation of cards or dice on the minds of those engaged. He has seen enough, however, to satisfy him perfectly of their baneful influence. Can any thing be more debasing or contemptible, than that men and women qualified to bear a respectable part in conversation, and even to adorn the social circle, should descend from the elevation of their own good sense to the level of every stupid thing, male and female, that can giggle or swear over a pack of cards. Religion out of the question, this is no scene for understanding. Leave it to the coxcomb and the coquette, to the sharper and the fool; but let not a man or woman of cultivated mind be dishonoured by taking a hand. The very atmosphere which surrounds them is poison, at once to the intellect and the heart. It were much to be wished, that some who have imperceptibly learned to degrade their lips with the jargon of the gamester, could occasionally get such a reproof as the celebrated Locke administered to certain British noblemen. "One day, three or four of these lords having met at lord Ashley's, when Mr. Locke was there, after some compliments, cards were brought in before scarce any conversation had passed between them. Mr. Locke looked upon them for some time, while they were at play; and, taking his pocket-book began to write with great attention. One of the lords observing him asked him what he was writing? 'My lord,' says he, 'I am endeavouring to profit, as far as I am able, in your company: for having waited with impatience for the honour of being in an assembly of the greatest geniuses of this age, and at last having obtained the good fortune, I thought I could not do better than write down your conversation; and indeed I have set down the substance of what has been said for this hour or two.' Mr. Locke had no occasion to read much of this conversation; those noble persons saw the ridicule of it; and diverted themselves with improving the jest. They quitted their play, and entering into rational discourse, spent the rest of their time in a manner more suitable to their character."* If a similar record were made of the conversation of our card parties, and published to the world, the ridicule would be intolerable: and if it should not deter men and women of sense from play forever afterwards, it would at least show how perfectly, for the sake of this paltry pastime, they confound themselves with the most arrant fools in nature.

"When blockheads," says a writer who will not be accused of bigotry "rattle the dice-box, when fellows of vulgar and base minds sit up whole nights contemplating the turn of a card, their stupid occupation is in character: but whenever a cultivated understanding stoops to the tyranny of so vile a passion, the friend to mankind sees the injury to society with that sort of aggravation as would attend the taking of his purse on the highway, if, upon the seizure of the felon, he were unexpectedly to discover the person of a judge."†

3. Play for amusement leads to, and perpetuates, the whole system of gaming for money.

Very few, if any, learn to play with the design of becoming gamblers. But the progress to this issue is both natural and common. Knowledge of cards is only a polite accomplishment, and an occasional hand no more than mere civility. What was acquiescence in the first stage, becomes choice in the second, and passion in the third. A cent, a sixpence, or a quarter dollar, merely to keep up the spirit of the game, is all that many plead for or allow. The sum is indeed too trifling to be an objection: but are they aware of the principle? Do not the languor of the game without, and its animation with, the aid of this pecuniary stimulus, very strongly mark its tendency? Is not here the commencement of a course which carries the adventurer along, with accelerated step, to deep and fatal stakes? Let it not be said that the sober circles which are the object of these strictures, never permit, and would be among the first to resist, such extremes. They put, it seems, a rolling body on the top of a declivity, set it a-going, and stop it before it reaches the bottom! An admirable expedient! Is there no danger of its slipping through their hands, or of acquiring a velocity which they cannot check? There is a much better method—Never set it on the declivity at all! Plainly. Can these moderate and cautious players be sure that none of those whom they train up to what they term innocent pastime, shall ever fall in with others who have less scruple? Have they never heard of a youth who received the rudiments of his gaming education from his circumspect friends, becoming, in consequence of this very acquisition, the companion of vile associates, and the victim of their crimes? Have they never heard of an unhappy fair one, initiated in the mystery of the card table under her father's roof, being hurried away with the maddening fascination, till her virtue and her peace were the price of redemption for her forfeited purse?

Such things have been, and such things may again be. The very possibility of their recurrence should inspire every one who values honour, truth, and purity, with a detestation of the sports which conduct to them; and impel him to lift up his voice and his example against their introduction or use, in any shape or any circumstances. The amusement which they can afford will be a miserable compensation for a ruined wife or daughter, son or brother, or sister. Considering the snares which beset the inexperienced foot, all the vigilance of parents and friends is little enough to keep our youth, the hope of our land, from error and harm.

It is neither right nor kind; it is wrong, and sinful, and cruel, to fit them for the most profligate company and deeds. Nothing does this more effectually than an acquaintance with games of chance. For there is no dissipated assemblage to which it is not a recommendation. To have the dearest parts of ourselves in a state of complete readiness for the most alluring temptation to the worst of crimes, is, to say the least of it, notwithstanding every safeguard, a most dangerous qualification. Keep them ignorant of cards and dice, and you erect the strongest human barrier against the seductions of gaming. Teach them the art, and that barrier is thrown down; thrown down by your own hands; thrown down to the breaking of your own heart: and when the destruction to which you yourself have been accessory, overtakes your children, you sit down and vent the bitterness of your soul in unavailing complaint. The benefits of gaming, none but a villain or a fool will undertake to display! Its mischiefs are palpable, horrible, endless! Its history is written in tears and blood. Its vouchers are the most fell passions of the human heart; and the most fearful excesses of human depravity. And yet, while facts which ought to send alarm and abhorrence along every shivering nerve, are repeating their admonitions every hour, parents—parents professing themselves Christians, do, both by example and precept, put their own children directly into the gambler's path! And as if the temptations which assault the age of puberty were too few, too feeble, or too tardy, parents themselves anticipate the work of corruption; antedate the progress of sin, and apply their own ingenuity to help in bringing forward their children to a forced maturity of vice. We cannot exempt from this censure, any who permit gaming, under whatever form or pretext, in their houses, and who do not discountenance it in their offspring or others subjected to them, by their severest displeasure. It admits not of dispute, that if the orderly and reputable members of society were utterly to discard the game of chance, gambling would soon be destroyed or confined to the spendthrift and the thief. But how can we hope for such a blessed reformation, when, besides notorious gaming-houses, many who figure in the higher classes of society play, and play deep, in their own houses. Could these public and private seminaries of all that is base and abominable, be exposed at one view to the eye, we will not say of a Christian, but of a political moralist, he would almost despair of our country. The rage for play was lately* so great in the city of New York that public prints ascribed the desertion of the theatre, to the multitude of gambling parties! A rare account of the virtue taught and learned at the theatre, we must own! We ask a plain question. Had cards and dice not been reputable as an amusement, could they ever have become so general as a vice? And is it to be wondered at, that those places of vile resort, the public gaming-houses, should be crowded with our youth? Is it not a perfectly natural consequence of play among heads of families merely to relieve a tedious hour, that children, apprentices, and servants should pursue the practice further, and at last plunder parents and masters, to meet the demands of the card-table and the billiard room? The number of those fine young gentlemen who have nothing to do; heirs of estates, with pockets full of money; lawyers and merchants' clerks; idlers who, by a sad misnomer, are nicknamed students; beaux, whose greatest adroitness is shown in keeping out of the hands of the bailiff at the suit of tailors, and shoemakers, and washer-women; et id genus omne, which flock about the gaming-houses, is incredible to those who have no opportunities of observing them. But it is not more lamentable than true that from 9 in the morning till 11 at night, and often much later, these nuisances are attended by a succession of youth. Some spend there the chief part of the 24 hours; and there are always adepts in iniquity to decoy the inexperienced and uncorrupted. Why is the suppression of these enormities so difficult? Why are laws so easily, so openly, and so impudently evaded? One reason is plain—Gaming grows less infamous. It grows less infamous, because respectable people of both sexes game. The number of gamblers is so great, because they are kept in countenance by so many who play only for amusement. Let the experiment be fairly tried. Let the latter give up their sport; and we shall soon see multitudes of the former give up their lust. The community would speedily be rid of legions of those fiends who now haunt its retreats, and prey upon its strength. That immovable selfishness; that cold-blooded malignity; that hardened impiety; that fell desperation, ready for fraud, for robbery, for murder, or for suicide, which form the character of a finished gamester, impose upon every man a solemn obligation to resist the gaming system in all its parts and progress. Every man whom the extinction of virtuous feeling has not prepared for adding to the dishonour and the miseries of human life, will perceive the obligation in proportion as he reasons correctly, and applies the discoveries of his understanding to the regulation of his conduct. All our principles on this subject are false and all our deductions from them impertinent, or it follows, that every one who plays at cards or dice is responsible, to the whole extent of the influence of his example in preserving the knowledge and practice of gaming, for all its tremendous effects on body and soul, on property, character, and happiness—on the best interests of his fellow-creatures here, and on their best hopes for the eternal world.

RULES FOR THE HOUSE OF GOD.

Walk softly to your seat.

Spend a few moments in silent prayer. This will solemnize and prepare the heart for a welcome reception of God's truth. The habit of gazing about on entering the house of God, as is the manner of some, is not only indecorous, but tends to dissipate the mind.

In singing, unite with the whole congregation; lift your heart to God in heaven.

Singing is a solemn act of worship to God, in which all should participate.

(Every pew should be amply furnished with Bibles and Psalm books.)

Position in prayer. This should be uniform. The uncouth and disorderly practice of some standing, some sitting, and some kneeling, as in some congregations, cannot be too severely censured. The most appropriate and scriptural positions for rebel, hell-deserving sinners, in approaching the great God, are kneeling and prostration; but these positions cannot always be observed, for the following reasons:

1. Pews or slips are often so constructed as to render kneeling very difficult; and

2. The floors of some churches are so completely saturated (often swimming) with tobacco juice, it would be extremely dangerous, even for gentlemen (to say nothing of ladies) to kneel during the solemn season of prayer.

Sitting during public or social prayer we deem highly censurable.—Would we approach even an earthly prince in this idle position?—How then, the King of kings—the Lord of hosts? Rise up, then, before God, rise up—close your eyes. “Stand in awe, sin not.” If prayers are what they should be, short, animated, spiritual, and to the point, every one may endure the fatigue of standing.* No public prayer should exceed ten minutes; five, in most cases, would be preferable. Solomon's prayer on the dedication of the temple, (which, by-the-by, is the longest on record in the Bible,) did not exceed eight minutes. All the examples of prayer given by inspiration are short—very short and graphic.

When the text is announced from the pulpit, turn to it in your Bible, observe not merely the passage, but also the connexion. In like manner when the Bible is read, follow the reader.

* Aged and infirm persons are exempt; they ought to sit.

When a passage of Scripture is cited in the course of the sermon, turn to the place in your Bible.

During the whole sermon let your attention be fixed; be unwilling to lose a single thought.

When the benediction is pronounced, remain a few moments for silent prayer. Not a pew door should be opened, not a hat, glove or cloak should be taken; not a foot moved. How shocking and unseemly, to see many adjusting their cloaks or over-coats; searching for their hats, canes; opening the doors of pews, &c., during the pronunciation of the blessing! Is not this outrageous, perfectly sacrilegious?

(Why do not ministers train their congregations into better manners?)

In leaving the house of God, go softly, moderately; never crowd the aisles. Some people rush, literally rush from the sanctuary; scandalous!

In retiring from public worship, never put on your hat till you reach the door.

After retiring from the sanctuary, go home, meditate on the solemn truths; let the seed sown take deep root, bring forth fruit to eternal life—some thirty, some sixty, some a hundred fold.—Golden Rule.

PRAYER.—A writer very correctly remarks, God looks not at the oratory of your prayers, how elegant they may be; nor at the geometry of your prayers, how long they may be; nor at the arithmetic of your prayers, how many they may be; nor at the logic of your prayers, how methodical they may be; but the sincerity of them he looks at.

THE CALLS ARE SO MANY.

This is one of the most common complaints of those who are called upon to contribute to charitable objects: "The calls are so many," they say. Now, let us inquire into this matter.

1. Are there really so many? Reckon them up. Perhaps they are not, after all, so many as you imagine. Any thing which annoys us, at intervals, is apt to be considered as coming oftener than it really does. When a man has rent to pay, how frequently quarter day seems to come round! But it is not so with him who is the receiver. The calls are not, in fact, so many as you imagine. I asked a wealthy lady once, who thought she gave a great deal away in charity, to keep an accurate account for one year of all she gave away, particularly to the religious charities; (which are those that are most complained of,) and I predicted that she would find, at the close of the year, that her donations had been less than she had imagined. She did so, and at the end of the year came to me and said she was perfectly ashamed to find that she had spent so much and given so little. She found that the calls were not "so very many."

2. If the calls are so many, yet do not make that a reason for refusing them all. I fear that some do. But surely that the calls are so many, is no reason that you should not comply with some of them. It is only a reason why you should not comply with all. Meet one-half of them generously, if you cannot meet them all. You acknowledge that there ought to be some calls, when you complain that they are so many.

3. If the calls are many, are they more than the wants? Ought they not to be as many? Would you have the calls fewer than the wants? That would never do;—then some wants would never be supplied. Besides you should consider who makes or permits the wants—and therefore the calls—to be so many, lest your complaint casts a reflection on God. If the calls are so many—too many, and we must dispense with some, which shall they be? Widows and orphans, and the poor generally, you dare not, as you fear God, except from your charities. Will you refuse the call of the Bible agent, or the Tract agent? Will you withhold from Foreign Missions or from Home Missions, or from both? Or will you say, “We will contribute to send out and support missionaries both at home and abroad, but we will not aid in their education?” Let them get that as they can. Let them make their way through the academy, the college, and the theological seminary as they can. And let Sabbath schools establish and support themselves; and temperance agents see, since they are so much in favour of abstinence, if they cannot get along without the staff of life.” For my part, I do not know what calls to except, and therefore I judge the safer way to be to reject none.

4. If the calls are many, the expenditures are more; and we not only spend, but waste, in more ways than we give.

5. If the calls you receive are so many, suppose, in order to avoid them, that you make some. Turn agent for some society, and you shall see how much more pleasant it is to make calls than to receive them. We will excuse you from contributing, if you will solicit. But that you would not like at all. “You cannot bear begging. It is the most unpleasant thing in the world to apply to people for money.” Very well; if you decline this branch of the alternative, then do not complain of the other. If you will not turn out and make the calls, you must sit still and receive them. It is the easier part; and you ought to be good-natured when you receive one of these calls—aye and even grateful to the man who comes to you, that he affords you another opportunity of offering one of the sacrifices with which God is well pleased, without going out of your way to do it. Others must go about to do good, but you can sit still and do good.

6. If the calls are so many, this importunity will not last long. Not more than seventy or eighty years does it ever continue. If it is an annoyance, you can bear it a few years. In eternity you will never receive these nor any other calls. I knew several rich men whose last calls were made on them in 1833.

Do these calls pester you? They bless others. Yonder is a poor woman reading the Bible which your money paid for. And there is another weeping over a tract which she owes to your donation. And there is a third, blessing the good people that support domestic missions: and there is a heathen mother, who perhaps would have immolated her child, if your contribution had not helped to send her the gospel. Do you hear that young man? How well he preaches? You assisted to educate him. Dear friend, do not complain, but welcome every call; treat all the agents with civility, and do as much as you any way can for the various benevolent objects; for “the time is short,” and all the regret which your liberality will occasion you, I will consent to suffer.

NEWINS.

A GOOD REPLY.—When some objected to Whitefield, that the multitudes who attended his ministry, and experienced its blessings, were of the poorer classes of society, he replied to this objection: “I should think it no scandal (supposing it true,) to hear it affirmed, that none but the poor attended my ministry. Their souls are as precious to Jesus Christ as the souls of the greatest men. They were the poor that attended him in the days of his flesh.”

THE RESURRECTION OF THE BODY.

"With what body do they come?"

Human science has for the last half century been rapidly advancing. Scarcely any thing in the reach of mortals has been thought too obscure for her discovery, or too mighty for her grasp. One subject, however, of vital importance to our race, still baffles her most strenuous exertions. The dark chambers of the house appointed for all living, are yet unexplored. The fate of this corruptible, beyond the precincts of the grave is no less mysterious, and doubtful to reason's unassisted eye in the nineteenth century, than it was to the master spirits of former ages. In the prosecution of other inquiries the events of the past, as unerring oracles, foreshadow the distant future. But in this instance the past history, however brilliant, of the now lifeless clay, serves only to perpetuate among the living, the memory of the tenement that now mingles with its kindred dust—it tells nothing of its existence beyond the grave. The church-yard terminates the researches of the speculative philosopher. But "Life and immortality are brought to light in the gospel." "There shall be a resurrection of the dead." But, says the unbeliever, "With what body do they come?" The apostle answers, "God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him, and to every seed his own body." But the infidel will not admit the record of the sacred volume as evidence. How then are his objections to be answered? Whilst both the fact, and the manner of the resurrection, are doctrines purely of Revelation, still any objection urged against them must be capable of refutation by reason, for the Bible reveals nothing that is contrary to right reason. Therefore, we may meet the unbeliever on his own ground, and humbly, yet fearlessly, undertake to demonstrate by the scope of reason alone, the absurdity of any objections he may urge against this most consolatory doctrine of our holy religion. In this essay, we shall notice a few of the most specious of these, and attempt their refutation.

It is objected, that the doctrine that "the self-same bodies shall be raised" is unintelligible; for say the objectors, it is an admitted fact that the body is in a state of constant change, and consequently that the individual who dies at an advanced age, has had during life a number of bodies; now it is asked, which of these is alluded to, where it is said that "the self-same bodies shall be raised." This is distinctly answered by our standards, "the self-same bodies which were laid in the grave shall be raised." But it is asked again, why does that particular body constitute "his own body," rather than any of those which the soul had previously inhabited? This objection takes for granted what needs to be proved, and what in itself seems contradictory, namely, that identity of the body is subject to change. But even this unfounded assumption makes nothing for the objector. Our bodies are given us by our Creator. If God takes from us a body which we at any previous time possessed, and furnishes us with another, the body thus taken away is no more our own, than if we had never possessed it. Therefore, granting what is assumed in this objection, still it is the self-same body that was laid in the grave, that must constitute, for the reason just alluded to, "his own body," which the apostle asserts shall be given in the resurrection. Neither is it true, that upon the same principle of reasoning, the body which is separated from the soul at death ceases to be our own. So long as we are human persons we possess bodies, either organized and united to our immaterial part, or unorganized and to be so united. We have no evidence, however, that the fact assumed in this objection is true; on the contrary, we have very strong evidence, that the principle which constitutes the identity of the human body, remains permanent through life and unaffected in death. The objection, however, amounts to a denial of the identity of the human body altogether. The first question therefore to be determined, is the fact of the existence of this identity. Having settled the fact of its existence, the inquiry must be, In what does it consist? If we can ascertain this, we shall then be able at once to determine whether the doctrine that the self-same bodies shall be raised, is reasonable and probable, or absurd and impossible. A denial of the fundamental fact, that the body has an identity would inevitably lead to the most ridiculous absurdities. The human person is constituted by the union of soul and body. If either of these undergo any change, the distinct personality thus constituted ceases, and the formation of another different person is the immediate result. But if the body have no identity, it is constantly changing. Therefore, a denial of the identity of the body leads to a denial of the identity of the person, but if we are not the same persons to-day that we were yesterday, if we are not the same through life, all obligation ceases, the foundations of social and civil society are overturned, and our globe becomes a field of blood. The body, the form, has an identity. But in what does it consist? Some interpret "the self-same body" according to Mr. Locke's definition of identity, namely, "That sameness consists in self-consciousness, in the power of considering itself the same thing in different times and places. By this every one is to himself what he calls self, without considering whether that self be continued in the same or in divers substances." But this definition, we think, notwithstanding its high authority, is nevertheless incorrect. Indeed it has been consistently employed by a late writer on this subject, in defence of a heresy nearly allied to the infidel objection which we have mentioned. If identity "consists in considering itself the same thing in different times and places," then this identity and the only evidence we have of its existence are so confounded that we cannot conceive of the one as distinct from the other. It is by the exercise of memory and consciousness that we discover our identity. A year ago, for instance, I performed a certain action. At the moment of its completion, I was conscious of the fact, that such acts had been performed by me. I now know that I am the identical being who performed that act, but how do I know this? I am now conscious that my memory retains that operation of my consciousness, which was at the time the evidence I had of the fact. But according to Mr. Locke's definition these mental operations constitute my identity. The fallacy of this will appear at once by supposing the operation of memory to be suspended, in which case, although it would be impossible for me to establish my identity, I would still be the same person. Therefore, personal identity consists in something distinct from our self-consciousness. These mental exercises, then, do not constitute the identity of the person, and much less that of the body which is material and incapable of intellection. When we say, then, that "the self-same bodies shall be raised,"

we do not mean that some body in the resurrection shall be united with the disembodied spirit, and that the identity of the saint in heaven will "consist in the power of considering itself the same thing," but we mean that the very same material substance which constituted the sameness of the body in this life through all its changes, shall be re-united in the resurrection with the soul by which it is now animated. If there is a bodily identity, it must be material. It must also inhere uniformly in the same substance. A transfer of identity from one system of atoms to another, involves an absurdity too palpable to escape the detection even of the most credulous mind. Therefore, infidelity itself must be restricted in the examination of this subject, to the following proposition, namely, The identity of the body consists either in the whole of the particles of its composition, or it is restricted to some particular part. Now it is unnecessary to enter into an argument to prove that the first of these positions is incorrect, if we keep in view the distinction between the sameness of the body, and the sameness of its numerical parts. These are constantly changing. But still, so long as the connexion between the vital principle, and the material substance with which it is, mysteriously remains undissolved, the identity of the living person is preserved un mutilated and entire. As we have before proved, this identity of person proves the entire sameness of body as well as soul. Since, then, this sameness of body is preserved amidst all the fluctuations to which its tangible particles are subjected, it is evident that the identity of the body does not consist in all the particles of its composition. By "the self-same body" therefore we may understand, a material substance invisible to us in our present organization, yet remaining permanent and unaffected by all the transmutations of the particles of adhering matters with which it is surrounded. And if this be the meaning of the self-same body, is it unreasonable to believe that God shall give "to every seed his own body?" Is it unreasonable to believe that this principle, constituting the identity of the bodies that are in this life composed of extraneous particles of flesh and blood, is a germ from which, in the resurrection, God shall raise our spiritual bodies fashioned like to the glorious body of our Redeemer?

ROMANISM A NOVELTY IN IRELAND.

3. Now for the third series of historical facts which shall bring down our evidence to a still later date, namely, to the invasion of Ireland, A. D. 1172, by the English, and which will prove the efforts which Rome made to gain ecclesiastical ascendancy then. First, we shall quote an extract from one of Mr. O'Connell's speeches, in which he gives us this poetical description of the entrance of the Norman conquerors:—

"It was on the evening of the 23d of August, 1172, that the first hostile English footstep pressed the soil of Ireland! It is said to have been a sweet and mild evening, when the invading party entered the noble estuary formed by the conflux of the Suir and Nore, and the Barrow at the city of Waterford. Accursed be that day in the memory of all future generations in Ireland, when the invaders first touched our shores! They came to a nation famous for its love of learning—its piety and its heroism. They came at a period when internal dissensions separated her sons and wasted their energies. Internal traitors led on the invaders, her sons fell in no fight, her liberties were crushed in no battle, but domestic traitors and foreign invaders doomed Ireland to centuries of oppression!"

Such is his description, but who were those "internal traitors?" Romanish priests set at work by Gregory the Seventh, the celebrated and ambitious Hildebrand, for the purpose of subjugating the spiritual and temporal liberties of Ireland, and whose efforts were directed for the achieving of this object through the internal dissensions which prevailed among the princes of Ireland, which they themselves had sown! And who was it sold Ireland to the English? The faithful page of history proclaims that it was Popery, in the person of her reigning pontiff, Adrian the Fourth, who wrote a letter to Henry the Second of England on this very subject, and accompanied it with the gift of a ring (!) as a pledge of his approbation and affection. (See Rymer's Fœdera, Tom. i. p. 15.) We shall now quote the letter, or bull, which was sent with this ring to Henry the Second:

"Adrian the Bishop, a servant of the servants of God, to his dearest son in Christ Jesus, the illustrious king of England, sends greeting and apostolical benediction. The desire your magnificence expresses to extend your glory upon earth and to lay up for yourself in heaven a great reward, is very laudable and profitable for you, while as a good Catholic Prince you endeavour to enlarge the bounds of the Church, to declare the true Christian faith to ignorant and barbarous nations, and to extirpate all evil from the field of the Lord, which the better to perform you ask the advice and encouragement of the Apostolic See. In the accomplishment of this work we trust you will have, by the assistance of God, a success proportioned to the depth of counsel and discretion with which you shall proceed, forasmuch as every thing which takes its rise from the ardour of faith and love of religion is most likely to come to a good and happy end. There is indeed no doubt that (as you yourself acknowledge,) Ireland and all other islands which Christ the Sun of Righteousness has illumined, and which have received the doctrines of the Christian faith, belong of right to the jurisdiction of St. Peter, and the most holy Roman Church. Wherefore we gladly sow in them the seed of faith which is good and agreeable to God, as we know that it will be more strictly required of our conscience not to neglect it. Since then you have signified to us, most dear son in Christ, that you desire to enter into the island of Ireland, in order to subdue the people to the obedience of the laws and extirpate the vices which have there taken root, and that you are also willing to pay an annual pension to St. Peter of one penny for every house therein, and preserve the rights of the church in that land inviolate and entire, we, seconding your pious and commendable intention with the favour it deserves, and granting a benignant assent to your petition, are well pleased that for the enlargement of the bounds of the Church, for the restraint of vice, the correction of evil manners and the advancement of the Christian religion, you should enter into that island and effect what will conduct to the salvation thereof, and to the honour of God. It is likewise our desire that the people of that country should receive you with honour AND VENERATE YOU AS THEIR MASTER, provided always that the ecclesiastical rights therein remain inviolate and entire, and reserving to St. Peter and the most holy Roman Church, the annual pension of a penny from every house. If therefore you think fit to put your design in execution, endeavour studiously to instruct the nation in good morals, and do your utmost as well personally as by others whom you know from their faith and doctrine and course of life to be fit for such a work, that the Church may be there adorned, the Christian religion planted and made grow, and whatsoever appertains to the honour of God and the salvation of souls, so ordered as may entitle you to an eternal reward from God, and a glorious name upon earth."

Adrian's letter was written in the year 1155, and his Bull, like many before and since, was the main effect of a league between the Papal and Royal powers, whereby they abetted and assisted each other's usurpations; but he dying before Henry was able to effect his design, the English king obtained another Papal mandate in the form of a confirmatory letter from Alexander III., ratifying the grant of Ireland made him by Adrian, thus colouring his ambition by the pretence of religion, which hypocrisy was to be equalled by that of Rome, which covered her vindictive feelings and covetous pride under the pretence of reforming the Irish! But the arch-deceiver, Mr. O'Connell, would not tell us this.

Now after all we have heard about the faith and piety of the island of saints from ancient and modern historians, does it not sound strange in our ears that there should have been a necessity for planting and propagating the faith in it? Oh! how anxiously did Rome feel for the barbarous people of Ireland, and what a fervent desire filled her maternal bosom for their welfare, that they should thus honourably receive the king of England and reverence him as their Lord, and that he should go and subdue them to the obedience of the laws!! Is it not clear as the noonday sun that it was the defence which Ireland had made for its ancient national faith that was rankling in the heart of Rome? In the support of this we have the testimony of a papal historian, the additional evidence of two Popes, and the invasion of an English army on their shores, to prove that Ireland was not subject to the See of Rome, but that Henry entered it on the express condition of planting and enlarging the Church, and on the equally express compact of his paying from each house an annual pension of one penny to the Romish See; and do we not further see that it was a most unlawful and vindictive measure on the part of Rome, because Ireland would not allow her superiority in matters of faith and discipline, nor suffer the fetters of foreign supremacy, to be forced on the independence of her native church, to authorize (?) the troops of a Norman prince to enter a country at peace with him, with fire and sword, and that, as she pretended, for the purpose of spreading the Gospel and of annexing Ireland to the boasted universal dominion of Rome!!! Remember also that this was done at a time when Rome was most subtle, rapacious, and powerful, and when the Irish ecclesiastical polity, if not in actual debasement, was in the sorest distress, being wasted by the Danish invasion—then it was that Rome, like a vulture, pounced on her prostrate opponent—then it was that recourse was had to her long faithful favourite, the sword, for the sole purpose (as far as Romanism was concerned,) of obtaining dominion over the Irish church, and of subjugating it to the Papal supremacy, an object which years of disaster and intrigue had not been able to effect.

The Sabbath School.

SABBATH SCHOOL TEACHERS.

The first duty of a Sabbath school teacher is regular attendance. Nothing but actual necessity, or attendance upon a duty more important than that which he owes to his class and school, can be a sufficient excuse for his absence. The following are some of the evils resulting from a neglect of this duty: (1.) It is evil as an example. The scholars who are taught to regard and observe the instructions of their teacher, will also take notice of and follow his example. If he thinks lightly of the duty of regular attendance, they will do the same. It has also a pernicious influence on other teachers. If one teacher may occasionally absent himself, and leave his class to take care of themselves, or be taken care of by other teachers, why may not another? (2.) The teacher disheartens the scholars. When children devote a good portion of their time through the week to preparation for the Sabbath school lesson, and come on Sabbath morning interested in the lesson, and eager to engage in its exercises, who can tell the chagrin and disappointment with which they must look upon the vacant seat of their teacher? They are like sheep without a shepherd. It is little less than cruel to disappoint their joyous expectations. But this is looking at the evil in its mildest form. When we reflect on the loss of confidence in the teacher which is thus engendered, the carelessness in studying the lesson which it has a tendency to produce, and often disgust at the school and all its exercises, the matter assumes a more serious aspect. Oh how little does the teacher know the amount of evil which may be inflicted on multitudes of souls both for time and eternity by his want of attention to this duty.—Good Samaritan.

Domestic Circle.

MOTHERS AND CHILDREN SHOULD BE AT HOME IN THE EVENING.

In a tract recently published by the Maryland Tract Society, the following passage occurs. It contains truths that will be responded to at once by every one.

One of the grossest neglects of youth, producing incalculable mischief and ruin, is in the improper spending of the evenings. Darkness was created for quiet; home is the place of quiet. Darkness is temptation to misconduct; suffering the young to be out, when the light of day does not restrain them from misconduct, is training them to it. We have already an abundant harvest of this seeding. Riots, mobs, crimes giving fearful forebodings, are the result of youth becoming fit agents for outrage by running uncared for on evenings. What we see in these respects, is deplorable enough, but what is this compared with what we do not see;—multitudes making themselves miserable and noxious in this world—and what in the world to come?

Parents should look at the truth, that evening pleasures and recreations are often dearly purchased—the price, their own impaired comfort, and the blighted prospects of their offspring. It must be obvious, that in this matter there can be no prescribed rule. There can be no interdict of all evening recreations and employments, yet here is an evil not only destructive to youth, but planting thorns in many paths, and covering many lives with desolation. The reformation demanded must proceed from judgment and conscience, and for this purpose judgment and conscience must be enlightened. Heads of families must learn that the place on earth best adapted to a blessing is—home; and by example and wholesome restraint they must teach this truth to all under them. Especially should home, during Sabbath hours, be consecrated. Sabbath mornings and evenings are blessed indeed, when they gather the family into the circle of converse; and parents and children, masters and apprentices and servants, in the presence and by the grace of God who has made them and placed them in their respective stations, raise themselves to the exalted level of the truth, that they are invested with capacity and obligation in their respective conditions, assigned them by an all-wise Providence, to help each other onward to honour, glory, and immortality: eternal life. Souls perish in everlasting death; they perish through neglect; who would stand at the judgment of the great day under the imputation of that neglect? Do you say "Not I!"—then think of these things.

For the Young.

JAMES STEBBINS; OR, THE WAY TO BE HAPPY.

The next night, as James came into the room, his mother said to him, "I shall not inquire whether you have been happy to-day, my son, for it is evident that you have. But before I bid you good night, I wish you to tell me some of the things which have made you so."

"I will commence, then, with the morning," said James. "I started up as soon as I heard my father's voice calling me—and it did not seem half so hard as when I lay and thought about it; so I had time for a fine run in the garden, before breakfast. It was so pleasant, I thought the birds never sung so sweetly before. I did not know it was so pleasant early in the morning."

His mother smiled and said, "The boys that lie in bed till after breakfast, are not the boys that make such discoveries."

"When the breakfast bell rang," said James, "I was right glad to hear it for I had run till I was hungry."

"Did you regain your place at the head of your class?" asked his mother.

"No, mother; George Williams came very near missing a word, and for a moment I was ready to hope that he would, but then I thought of what you said, and that perhaps if he should lose his place, he would feel as bad as I did yesterday, and I was glad when he succeeded in spelling the word. When I went out, I found that one of the boys had knocked my hat off the nail in the entry. I was beginning to feel very angry, but I thought how foolish and wicked it was to get angry for such a trifle.—When I had time to think more about it, I was very glad I did not get angry with him, for I did not think he meant to knock it down. When I returned home at night, I found Lucy was very busy looking at the pictures in my new book. I wished to finish reading it, and was going to catch it from her; but she looked very unwilling to give it up just then, and I thought I would go out to do something else; so I said to her, 'Lucy, I shall want my book when I come in again, and you will make haste and get through with it, w'on't you?'"

"And Lucy said, 'Yes, James;' and when I came back again, she reached out her little hands to give me the book, and I felt very glad I had not snatched it from her."

When James had finished his story, his mother's kind look of approval, and her affectionate kiss, made his heart bound with joy. She went with him to his chamber, and knelt with him to pray that God would still help her little son to conquer all his wicked passions, that he might become a useful and happy man.

I hope my young friends will learn from the story of James, that neither pleasant weather, nor kind friends, nor any other blessings, will make them happy, if they indulge in wicked and angry passions.

THE MAGNETIC TELEGRAPH.

Along the smooth and slender wires
The sleepless heralds run,
Fast as the clear and living rays
Go streaming from the sun;
No peals or flashes heard or seen,
Their wondrous flight betray,
And yet their words are quickly felt
In cities far away.

Nor summer's heat, nor winter's hail,
Can check their rapid course;
They meet unmoved the fierce wind's rage,
The rough wave's sweeping force:
In the long night of rain and wrath,
As in the blaze of day,
They rush, with news of weal or wo,
To thousands far away.

But faster still than tidings borne
On that electric cord,
Rise the pure thoughts of him who loves
The Christian's life and Lord—
Of him who taught in smiles and tears
With fervent lips to pray,
Maintains high converse here on earth
With bright worlds far away.

Aye! though no outward wish is breathed,
Nor outward answer given,
The sighing of that humble heart
Is known and felt in heaven.
Those long frail wires may bend and break,
Those viewless heralds stay,
But Faith's last word shall reach the throne
Of God, though far away.

REPORT OF THE SCRIPTURE READER OF THE FIRST REFORMED PRESBY-TERIAN CHURCH, PHILADELPHIA.

"Be fellow helpers to the truth."—John.

It is needless in the nineteenth century, to tell professing Christians, that the age of miracles has passed away, and means have been appointed by God, and are to be used with prayer and thanksgiving, in the great work of converting the world lying in wickedness.

Doubtless no human instrumentality, however powerful, is adequate to effect the conversion of a single soul. "Of ourselves we can do nothing,"—yet it hath pleased the King and Head of Zion, in almost every instance, to accompany human instrumentality, by the gracious influences of his HOLY SPIRIT.

From a careful perusal of the history of Christianity, it appears that human effort, accompanied by divine energy, is the plan by which it hath pleased the "Wise God," to communicate the knowledge of the truth to those who sit in darkness, ready to perish for lack of that knowledge whose beginning is the fear of the Lord.

It requires no elaborate argument to prove that this same plan is the means by which God intends to extend the knowledge of himself, not only to the heathen in the lanes and alleys of our large cities, but to those dark places of the earth, characterized as the abodes of horrid cruelty, where the name of JESUS, the merciful one, has never yet been heard.

It must be evident to every Christian—nay, "to every man whose eyes are open"—that the circulation of the Bible, the establishment of Sabbath Schools, in which the elements of pure and undefiled religion are taught, the assembling of the people for prayer and Christian conference, and the faithful preaching of the Gospel, on the Sabbath, are the only means by which the moral and spiritual destitution, so prevalent, can be removed.

It is but duty to state that in the humble discharge of that office to which the subscriber has been appointed he has had experimental evidence of the truth of this principle, and in order that it may be better understood, the following facts are submitted, which show that He who rules in the armies of heaven and among men, has blessed the efforts made, by giving some degree of success to the inefficient instrumentality employed.

In Buena Vista the prayer-meeting continues to flourish, though some who attended regularly and others who took much interest in supporting it, have migrated to the West, yet notwithstanding, our numbers are increasing. The parents are not only careful to come themselves, but bring their children for the purpose of repeating psalms, which they commit during the week; as the psalm is appointed on the sabbath evening before. More than a dozen children are generally present, several of them not above five years old, and frequently they recite eight or ten stanzas.

It is truly pleasing to state, that with a few exceptions, all the persons who have attended from the beginning, with some who came more recently, have applied for connexion with the church; and nearly all have given evidence, by their punctual attendance on public worship and prayer-meetings, by their attention to family religion and other duties, that the labour expended among them has been abundantly blessed.

The following incidents, selected from many of a similar kind, may give a specimen of our labour and progress:—Visited a man in order to bring him out to the prayer-meeting; found him indifferent about such things; however, he consented to send his children to the Sabbath School. Called on him a second time, and he came to the prayer meeting. From this time we found him friendly to all our meetings. He generally attended, and on one occasion contributed liberally to the cause of missions. He was very anxious that his children should be instructed in the principles of the Reformation. After some friendly persuasion, in which his wife wisely took part, he was induced to attend the public worship in the Hall in Christian street. The last Sabbath morning he spent on earth was in this place, listening to the preached Gospel; there he discovered he was a sinner, and on his way home he expressed, to a pious neighbour, his resolution to turn from the error of his ways, and banish from his lips the inebriating cup, for this was his besetting sin. But alas, his resolution came like the last and brightest flicker of the lamp in the socket ere it goes out for ever—on this same evening he attended the prayer-meeting, and this was the last time he mingled among the living for the purpose of worshipping God in a public manner,—little we thought, that ere half a week would have rolled away, his soul would have passed from earth to the land of spirits; that his name would be no longer numbered among the living, but it was so. When we next heard of him, it was to attend his funeral. It was his desire that his children should be brought up in the principles of our church, and the widow determined not only to comply with his injunction, but to espouse the same principles herself, and was admitted to church privileges at the last communion.

Visited an elderly man and his wife; in a conversation which followed, it appeared he was brought up a covenanter in Ireland, and that many years ago, he immigrated to this country. For some time after his arrival he was so tossed about, that he had not the opportunity of attending the ordinances of the gospel; and during this time his Christian zeal became blunted, and after a time he became indifferent about his soul's interests. Soon after this he settled down, and then he determined to attend church; he did so, but there he found nothing to awaken him to a sense of duty. The sound of the organ and the light hymn music sweetly fell upon his ear, and served to lull his conscience to rest. However, sometimes the recollection of the soul-awakening Psalm of God's inditing would flit across his memory, and sometimes the deep melodious psalm tune, which he had so often heard in his "father land," at the field communion, in the congregation, or the fellowship meeting would thrill in his ear, but these recollections soon passed away, and careless habit lulled his remembrances to rest. As years rolled away, he became more careless, and finally he abandoned the house of God altogether. He told me that for the last year his foot had not been in any place of worship. Lately he has suffered much affliction, and before I left, we knelt together and presented our supplication at the throne of grace. When I was leaving, I urged him to begin family worship, which he promised faithfully to do. He came to the hall the very next Sabbath, and on the evening he attended the prayer meeting. How pleasing the hope, that God by his Spirit may incline him to return to that fold from which he has so long wandered.

Visited a young married man: found him rising from a bed of sickness. In a short conversation which ensued, I found his mind was softened by affliction. I endeavoured to direct his thoughts to Him who sends sickness as chastisement, and who in his own good time, can restore to health. His wife listened attentively. When I was about to leave him, I inquired if he had a Bible, remarking it would be a source of comfort. But there was no Bible in the house. I inquired the reason, and he told me he was too poor to buy one. I felt this much, but by the kindness of a friend, I was soon able to carry him a copy of the blessed Book, "without money and without price," and never was any thing more thankfully received: he promised to read a portion of it every day. Soon after this, he came to the prayer-meeting, and by untiring exertion, after he recovered his health, he procured clothing decent enough to appear at church, where he was to be seen regularly every Sabbath day. He applied for membership in the church, but ere the communion season came, he had migrated to the West.—We might relate many other interesting incidents, for scarcely a day passes without some occurring,—but doing so, would swell this report too much.

REPORT OF THE MOYAMENSING SABBATH SCHOOL.

The Sabbath school is in a very prosperous state. The number of pupils on the roll is nearly 100. They are under the care of a zealous and well qualified band of teachers, 12 in number, 8 being females, and the remainder males. By their punctual attendance, kind and winning deportment, and their personal visits, they have gained the affection and respect of their pupils, as well as of their parents. As many of the children were suffering for want of suitable clothing, the female teachers formed a Dorcas society, which has been the means of relieving much distress.

As the school began to assume a more regular form, it was thought proper to organize a Sabbath School Association, similar to the one already existing in the parent school, with which most of the teachers had been personally connected, and in leaving which, at the sacrifice of much personal comfort, we feel that they deserve a high encomium. Much of the good order and success of the school, are owing to Mr. Wm. McCartney, who has acted as Secretary since its organization. It is hoped that this interesting institution will receive the fostering attention of the congregation and Sabbath school from which it has derived its origin, and to which it looks for PARENTAL care.

We have experienced the want of some little attractive books for distribution among the children whom we visit, in order to bring them out on the Sabbath. They would greatly assist our progress. They would be a means of gaining the affections of many little wanderers who live in a constant profanation of the Sabbath, and who are too thoughtless and giddy to listen to the most simple arguments; nay, to reason with whom only makes them worse.

We have only been able to give part of our proceedings in this report; the history of our labours in a new field, will appear in the next

BEAUTIFUL LETTER.

We clip the following exquisitely touching letter from the Rochester Daily Advertiser. It is from a blind girl to her friend. Who but a female could write thus?

LAKE COTTAGE, November 25, 1847.

My Dear Lizzy:—It is not pleasant to be blind. My poor eyes long to look abroad upon this beautiful world, and my prisoned spirit struggles to break its darkness, and bathe again in the pure light of the upper skies. I would love dearly to bonnet and shawl myself, and go forth to breathe the air alone, and free as the breeze that fans my brow. But, as Milton once said to his favourite daughter, "It matters little whether one has a star to guide, or an angel hand to lead." And Lizzy, we must learn to bear, and blame not that which we cannot change. The journey of life is short. We may not stop here long, and sorrow and trial discipline the spirit, and educate the soul for a future life, and those upon whom we most depend we love most. A good English writer says, "Let the heart be thankful for any circumstance that proves thy friend."

Two summers have come and gone since my William died in Rochester. We brought him here and laid him down in the grave to sleep, close by the side of his childhood home, where the quick winds and white waves of Ontario come swelling to the shore; and high above its silvery bosom, clouds, dove-like, are hanging. One moon had hardly waned—the angels came again, and while I slept, darkened my weeping eyes for ever. Oh! Lizzy, was sorrow ever so deep, was misery ever so severe? Hope departed, and an unyielding blight settled on all the joys my heart had wed. "Passing away" is truly a part of earth. It lends a death-like air to our gay enjoyment, and mingles sorrow with our cup of bliss. It stops for ever our happy labours, and frustrates our choicest plans. Those whom we learn to love, die; and the cold earth presses the lips we have loved to kiss, and freezes the hearts tuned to beat in unison with our own. Lizzy, evermore I am blind and a wanderer, but not homeless. I have God, my Father; the angels for friends, and Jesus an "elder brother." The pure home in many hearts, too, are mine—dwellings dearer than all the world beside.

This morning finds me at Mr. Ledger's delightful "Lake Cottage," seated soft among the trees; where Lombardy poplars lift their tufted tops almost to prop the skies; the willow, locust, and horse chesnut, spread their branches, and flowers never cease to blossom. Maggie is my kind amanuensis. Now she reads to me—gives me her arm for a walk. Now, with her harp and tuneful voice, unchains the soul of song; the whole covering all my thoughts with gladness, till I almost forget my "night of years," and live in a land where swell with melody the air, and sorrows and tears are unknown; all joys are less than the one joy of doing kindness. Her smile makes the sunshine of many hearts the cloudless dawning of their new enjoyments.

It is Thanksgiving day, Lizzy, and my thoughts have been wandering back ward, far over the current of years. Reflection is indeed an angel, when she points out the errors of the past, and gives us courage to avoid them in future. Maggie is reading the Book of Job, and this evening my spirit more than ever looks up in thankfulness to God for the Bible, heaven's purest gift to mortals. It is the star of eternity, whose mild rays come twinkling to the nether sphere; erring man's guide to wisdom, virtue, and heaven. The Bible is the book of books!

In comparison, Byron loses his fire, Milton his soaring, Gray his beauties, and Homer his grandeur and figures. No eye like rapt Isaiah's ever pierced the veil of the future; no tongue ever reasoned like sainted Job; no poet ever sung like Israel's Shepherd King, and God never made a wiser man than Solomon. The words of the Bible are pictures of Immortality, dewdrops from the tree of Knowledge, pearls from the river of life, and gems of celestial thought. As the moaning shell whispers of the sea, so the Bible breathes of love in heaven, the home of angels and joys too pure to die. Would I had read it more when my poor eyes could see. Would more of its pure precepts were bound about my heart, and I had wisdom to make them the mottoes of my life. The world may entertain its ideas of a magnificent Deity whose government is general, but let me believe in the Lord God of Elijah, whose providence is entire, ordering the minutest event in human life, and with a father's care arranging it for the greatest possible good. Yes, Lizzy, when storms gather and my sepulchral way is dark and drear, with no star to guide, nor voice to cheer, my sinking spirit finds refuge in the world-wide sympathies of a Saviour, who did not chide Mary for her tears, and came himself to weep at the grave of his friend.

My dear Lizzy, I fear I have written you too long, and too sad a letter; but, dearest, do not think me melancholy; like all the rest of the world, I have more smiles than tears, more good than ill. Let me thank you many times for your kind invitations to be with you on New Year's day, at your new home, and for your gentle hint that Santa Claus will be there too. Maggie says his majesty will be in the country at that time, and I must stop here; however, I shall be with you, Lizzy; till then, good bye, with my unabated love.

THE FREE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF AMERICA.

This body, recently formed, is composed of certain ministers and elders, formerly in connexion with the Old School General Assembly, who have lately organized themselves into the "Free Presbytery of Mahoning;" and of the Presbyteries of Ripley and Hillsborough, formerly in connexion with the New School. It consists of 13 ministers and 22 congregations. The basis of their organization, as set forth by the Free Presbytery of Mahoning, is, "The Confession of Faith, the Larger and Shorter Catechisms, the Directory for the worship of God, together with the plan of Government and Discipline, as amended and ratified by the General Assembly, at their sessions, in May, 1821,"—along with the following "Declaration."

I. God has made of one blood all nations of men; consequently, all human beings, endowed with rationality, have an equal right to freedom.

II. The holding of human beings as property, is destructive of all the ends for which man was created and endowed with rational powers, and consequently one of the greatest evils that can be inflicted upon human nature, highly immoral, and entirely inconsistent with Christian character and profession.

III. No person holding slaves, or advocating the rightfulness of slaveholding, can be a member of this body.

IV. No Church, Presbytery, or Synod, tolerating slaveholding, or the advocate of slaveholding in its communion, can be a constituent part of this body.

Editorial.

REV. MR. CAMPBELL.

At the date of the last communications received from him, Mr. Campbell was at Peru, Illinois, about to proceed on his journey to Chicago. He has everywhere met with the kindest reception, and his success has far exceeded his expectations. Before this No. of the Banner has been generally distributed among our subscribers, it is probable he will have completed his missionary tour. It is a source of great satisfaction that an opportunity has been offered to the members of our church who have felt so deep an interest in his labours, to see face to face a brother so much respected and beloved. We cannot but believe that the most beneficial results will be found to follow his visit.

STATE OF THE REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

From all parts of the country we have been receiving information leading us to believe that the blessing of the great Head of the church is vouchsafed to our beloved Zion, and causing the hope that the time to favour her has at length come. Since our last No. was issued, the Northern Presbytery has been increased by the addition of two ministerial members, and the congregations under its care appear to be in a very healthful condition. The Philadelphia Presbytery has at present a larger number of members than at any previous time, and general prosperity seems to rest on the churches in its bounds. Accounts received from the Pittsburg, Ohio, and Western Presbyteries, show that the pleasure of the LORD is prospering in their respective departments of labour. Every where we hear of fields white to the harvest, of doors wide and effectual being opened. In such circumstances how important is it that we cherish a spirit of Christian peace and love among ourselves, and that with one heart and one mind, we go onward in the cause of God and truth. When prospects are so encouraging, will not every one who loves the church endeavour to sustain her operations and to carry forward her enterprises? Let parents consecrate their children to the holy ministry, and use all proper means that this "good work" may be desired and embraced by their offspring. Let the labourers at home be adequately supported, and let the heathen not be forgotten. Let us all devise liberal things, and by liberal things we shall stand.

SO MUCH ON SLAVERY.

The first article in our present number is a part of an address by our sister church in Scotland to the Pro-Slavery churches in the United States. Addressing the understanding as well as the feelings of those who profess to believe the Bible, and love the LORD JESUS CHRIST, it constitutes a most powerful appeal in behalf of truth and righteousness. We hope all our subscribers will read it attentively, and that they will promote its circulation by showing it to any of their friends who may be willing to peruse it.

We have understood that it has been thought by some that too large a portion of the Banner was devoted to Anti-Slavery articles. It has not been without design that we have given to this subject so much of our attention. No other subject appears to us to require just now more to be kept upon the mind. We look upon it as "the present truth." Again, we regard it as especially that part of the testimony of our church in her distinct denominational standing, which most needs to be made known and vindicated. Further, we find the subject so little noticed by the religious periodicals of other churches, even of those who wish to be considered as the opponents of Slavery: in only one of those connected with the Reformed Churches, do we find any expressions of disapprobation, or any thing calculated to awaken attention to its sinfulness and evils. Happy, indeed, will we be when the time shall come, as come it must, and we hope soon, when there will be no longer any necessity to allude to the subject, except as one of the "old things which have passed away," with the increasing light and love of pure and genuine religion.

REPORT OF THE SCRIPTURE READER OF THE FIRST REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, PHILADELPHIA.

The report of the Scripture reader of the First Reformed Presbyterian Church in this city, should be read by all of our subscribers. The experiment, for such it was regarded at its commencement, appears so far to be accompanied with great success. A field of usefulness, which the church has left almost entirely neglected, lies open to the labours of the Scripture reader, who has access to many whom the officers of the church cannot reach, and whom even private Christians find it difficult to approach. Without interfering with any of the existing institutions of the church, the Scripture reader can do great good, and in these days, when so little time can be devoted by any except the ministry to such labours, he may do much to supply this lack of service. We hope the time will come when such an agent will be employed by every congregation. The good resulting would be found an abundant compensation for the additional expenditure.

CHURCH DEBTS.

In our next number we design to commence the publication of a series of articles on this interesting subject. While we are called upon to "owe no man any thing, but to love one another," there are multitudes of Christians, and multitudes of churches deeply in debt. The impediments to active exertion, the injury to Christian love and harmony, and the improper means employed to sustain the ordinances; resulting from such a state of things, are exceedingly great. Our brethren in Scotland having had their attention directed to this subject a few years ago, resolved to make a united and systematic effort to liquidate all the debts of the whole of the churches in our connexion in that country. This effort we are happy to say, has been fully successful, and now not one of their congregations has any such a millstone around its neck. We hope our own Synod, and judicatories of other churches throughout the land, will make a similar effort, and we trust the articles we propose to publish may have a tendency to produce this result. They are from the pen of a highly esteemed minister of another denomination, and having been published some time ago in a newspaper connected with the church to which he belongs, he has kindly allowed us to republish them, with numerous improvements, in the Banner.

Ecclesiastical Proceedings.

ORDINATION AND INSTALLATION OF MR. D. J. PATTERSON.—On Tuesday, the 25th of April, the Northern Reformed Presbytery held a meeting in the city of Brooklyn, Long Island, at which Mr. D. J. Patterson, who had accepted a call from the congregation recently formed there, was ordained to the holy ministry and installed as pastor of the church in that place. Rev. Dr. McLeod preached the sermon from Isaiah ix. 6—"The government shall be upon his shoulders." The Rev. A. G. Wylie delivered the charges to the pastor and people. The exercises were very interesting, and the prospects of the new congregation are of the happiest character. We are glad to find the church whose organization we recorded in our last number so soon supplied with a most excellent pastor.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE PITTSBURG REFORMED PRESBYTERY IN REGARD TO THE DEATH OF REV. G. T. EWING. By the following communication our readers will learn the action of the Presbytery of Pittsburgh in relation to the lamented death of Rev. G. T. Ewing. While his numerous excellent qualities render his removal the more painful, and his place more difficult to fill it is still a source of consolation that we can ascribe to him such virtues. The very reasons for lamenting his death may tend to reconcile us to his departure:

“WHEREAS a paper from Rev. G. T. Ewing expressing his desire that Presbytery should take his congregation under its especial care during his absence on account of his declining health, was received—and whereas it is ascertained that on his way to New Orleans he departed this life, on the 21st of March, leaving his congregation vacant, his loving wife a widow, and his children bereaved—and whereas the deceased by his courtesy, his highly cultivated mind, and his devotedness to the service of God in the exercise of his ministry, rendered himself not only eminently useful in the ministry, but also endeared to the members of Presbytery. Therefore

Resolved, That Presbytery have with deep feelings of sorrow heard of the death of our beloved brother, Rev. Gordon T. Ewing, and that we deeply lament the loss we have sustained.

Resolved, That we deeply sympathize with Mrs. Ewing and her children in their sore bereavement.

Resolved, That Presbytery laments the bereavement of the congregation of the late deceased Rev. G. T. Ewing, and will endeavour to do every thing in its power, in the mean time, for its supply.

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to forward a copy of the above resolutions to Mrs. Ewing, and also to the congregation of the late deceased Rev. G. T. Ewing, and that they be published in the “Banner of the Covenant.”

Resolved, That Rev. T. C. Guthrie be appointed to write an obituary of Rev. G. T. Ewing, and have it published in the Banner.

REV. ALEXANDER CLARKE.—We are gratified to be able to inform our readers that the Rev. A. Clarke, who has been labouring for a number of years with great diligence and success in Nova Scotia, having applied to the Northern Reformed Presbytery for connexion with our church, has been received as a member of that Presbytery, and that a committee has been appointed to visit Nova Scotia and take measures to aid Mr. C. in the interesting field of action in which he has so long stood alone. We hope all needed support will be given to this effort.

New Publications.

This is the biography of a lady of great natural talents, and finely cultivated mind. The influence of true religion in the formation of her character is presented in a very interesting manner, showing that so far from restraining or crushing the intellectual forms, it tends to produce their noblest and most lovely development. We wish every young lady who can devote time to literary pursuits or benevolent efforts of any kind, would read this little volume. The original work published some years ago, and which we read with great pleasure at the time it was issued, was in some respects prolix and heavy. This abridgment is more suited for general reading.

Daily Bread, consisting of extracts in prose and verse for every day in the year. Philadelphia: Presbyterian Board of Publication. Pp. 288. 18mo.

This little book contains selections from Boston, Hervey, Flavel, Willison, Baxter, and a number of other eminent writers, with selections of poetry adapted to the prose; the whole arranged in portions to be read daily throughout the entire year. It is well calculated to benefit any who may read it, and should form an excellent companion on a journey, or in the closet.

Valedictory Address to the Graduating Class of the Medical Department of Pennsylvania College. By W. R. Grant, M. D.

This is an excellent address, and the religious tone which pervades it, with the valuable counsels which it gives, renders it worthy of high approbation. It is not often that we find members of the Medical profession giving so much prominence to evangelical truth. We are gratified to learn that the excellent Institution with which Dr. Grant is connected, is flourishing; and we hope it may enjoy a large share of the patronage of the Christian community.

National Preacher. Original—Monthly. Edited by Rev. J. M. Sherwood. New York: J. M. Sherwood, 120 Nassau street. Pp. 32. 8vo.

The National Preacher for May has been received. It contains a sermon on the remission of sins, by Rev. Dr. Storrs, and another on the true element of reformation, by Rev. Dr. Marsh; with a short discourse by the Editor. To ministers who desire to avail themselves of the opportunity of ascertaining the sentiments, and benefiting by the writings of some of the most eminent living American divines, this publication will be very valuable, and where the voice of the living preacher is seldom heard, it may serve in some measure to make up the want.

Sarah Martin. Little Pilgrim. White Lady Slipper. American S. S. Union, Philadelphia.

These little works possess the excellent character which may be ascribed to all the publications of the Union. The one first mentioned is an interesting biography of an humble, but very diligent, and successful female philanthropist. The second is an entertaining account of a little girl who understood the pilgrim's progress literally, and set out on a journey from her own home to the Celestial city: it furnishes an opportunity to show the allegorical character of Bunyan's dream. The last is a short narrative adapted to Western life, showing the evils of disobedience in children. They are all well suited to the young.

Banner of the Covenant.

JULY, 1848.

Anti-Slavery.

AN EXPOSTULATION WITH THOSE CHRISTIANS AND CHRISTIAN CHURCHES, IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, THAT ARE IMPLICATED IN THE SIN OF SLAVEHOLDING, BY A COMMITTEE OF THE SYNOD OF THE REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN SCOTLAND.

"Remember them that are in bonds, as bound with them."—HEB. xiii. 1.

Such, brethren, are some of the ways, in which, as it appears to us, you are implicated in the sin of slave-holding. We are not ignorant of what you are accustomed to advance in your own vindication. We now well your reasons. We must say, however, the more we examine them in the light of those tests to which they ought to be subjected, we are the more deeply impressed with the conviction that they are utterly invalid, and afford not the shadow of a sanction to the iniquitous, inhuman, and impolitic system, in support of which they are alleged. We crave leave to express ourselves on the following, from among other allegations equally untenable:—

1. Is it alleged that God permitted the ancient Israelites to bring some of their fellow-men into servitude? We readily admit that they were authorized to employ in their service two classes of persons—native Hebrews, and idolatrous Gentiles. But if any one supposes that this bears the faintest resemblance, or gives the least sanction to the slavery practised among you, he shows that he has not yet studied the benevolent spirit and liberal provisions of the Mosaic code.

With regard to the native Hebrews, who are usually, but very incorrectly, represented as enslaved, we must say, that their moral, physical, and political condition was inexpressibly superior to that of the American slaves in the following particulars. 1st, They were not slaves at all, in the proper sense of that term. They were not declared law, nor treated in practice, as mere property. They were employed in a kind of "hired servants"—persons who were engaged by contract, to serve during a specified period, and who were promised wages, payable during the whole currency of their engagement. This is the law: If thy brother that dwelleth by thee, be waxen poor, and be sold* unto thee, thou shalt not compel him to serve as a bond servant, but as * "Sold." The other provisions of the law show that it was not their persons that were sold. It was simply their labour. Nor was the act of selling performed by a third party who wanted to make gain by an unholy traffic in his fellow-creatures. The most probable opinion is, that his services were sold either by himself, or by the civil magistrats.

an hired servant.”* “Thou shalt not oppress an hired servant that is poor and needy: at his day thou shalt give him his hire, neither shall the sun go down upon it, for he is poor and setteth his heart upon it—lest he cry against thee unto the Lord, and it be sin unto thee.” Where is the analogy between this and the slave code of Carolina? May not your legislators, when they look at the equity, the humanity, the God-like benevolence of the Jewish statute, blush for the cruel spirit in which they have sanctioned the grossest oppressions, by the unchristian enactments? 2d, The degree of servitude to which the hired servants were subjected, was of divine appointment. He who has a right to deal with his fellow-creatures according to his own pleasure, in the exercise of moral rectitude, was the author of the law under which they suffered restrictions. He proclaimed it from the flaming heights of Sinai. But has the slavery practised among you any such sanction? Has the voice of God, at any time, announced to you his permission to make slaves of any class of your fellow-men? Where is the warrant from Heaven for Americans to enslave Africans? for the whites to enslave the blacks? Till such order be produced, you in vain plead the example of the Israelites in your own vindication, and we must continue to hold that the claim you put forth to reduce to slavery persons of African descent, is as utterly groundless as it is grossly presumptuous. 3d, Those Hebrews alone were subjected to the servitude prescribed, who had been convicted of some moral offence. There were, especially, two crimes that were visited with this form of punishment—theft,† for which they could not make restitution, and the contraction of debt,§ which they were unable to pay. How different the way in which you act! It is not persons who have been guilty of offences deserving punishment at the hand of the civil courts, that you are bringing into slavery, or keeping in it. Were you to seize upon all the incorrigible thieves, and all the fraudulent bankrupts that you could find in the Union, and carry them off to the plantations, to perform the labours you now exact from unoffending Africans, there would be no ground for a charge of injustice. We would rather rejoice in your reviving the spirit of that sacred jurisprudence which was given in the volume of revelation to the Israelites, and which, we have no doubt, will yet furnish, in its great moral principle, the basis of that high judicial code which Christian nations shall enjoy, when God will “make their officers peace, and their enactments righteousness.” 4th, The servitude to which they were subjected was only of limited duration. It could not, without their own consent, last longer than six years, and, in many cases, it came to an end much sooner. That is, on the recurrence of every seventh year, every one who had been obliged to become a hired servant, from whatever cause, was at liberty to go forth to the enjoyment of his original freedom. The law is this: “At the end of every seven years thou shalt make release.” “And if thy brother, an Hebrew man, or an Hebrew woman, be sold unto thee, and serve thee six years, then in the seventh year thou shalt let him go free from thee.”|| What a joyful deliverance! What pleasurable anticipations in the approach of that day that should usher in so welcome a release! When, oh when will

America proclaim such a deliverance to her injured, wounded, bleeding children! 5th, When the period of their servitude expired, they were not to be sent away in a state of actual destitution. The masters, in whose service they had been spending their strength, and whose wealth they had been contributing to increase, were to be liberal in giving them such supplies as were necessary to meet their present wants, and secure their future welfare! The law is in the following terms:—"And when thou sendest him out from thee, thou shalt not let him go away empty: thou shalt furnish him liberally out of thy flock, and out of thy flour, and out of thy wine-press: of that wherewith the Lord thy God hath blessed thee, thou shalt give unto him."* What an improvement would be effected in the condition of the slaves among you, were such a law obeyed! Not only would they be treated with much kindness, and emancipated at an early period, but, along with the restoration of their natural rights, they would receive such assistance as would be some compensation for the many wrongs they have suffered, and the many hardships to which they have long been doomed. In one word, the revival of the Mosaic law would be the extinction of slavery.

With regard to the other class whom the Israelites were permitted to employ in their service—we mean heathen idolaters—we admit at once that they were, in a certain sense, slaves. They are called bond-men and bond-maids, terms which clearly imply that they were subjected to some degree of bondage. Still the bondage into which they were brought was very different from that in which the negroes among you are still held, in the following particulars. 1, God himself permitted the practice among the Hebrews. It was He who spoke to them in these very explicit terms: "Both thy bond-men and thy bond-maids, which thou shalt have, shall be of the heathen that are round about you: of them shall ye buy bond-men and bond-maids. Moreover of the children of the strangers that do sojourn among you, of them shall ye buy, and of their families that are with you, which they beget in your land, and they shall be in your possession." Nor was this an arbitrary exercise of his will. It was not an enactment at variance with the principles of moral rectitude. It was not a concession to the selfish passions and the sinful prejudices of a barbarous age. We can have no doubt that the kind and degree of bondage which He permitted was, in every way, worthy of his character, and conformable to his express command, which was authenticated by supernatural revelation. But who gave the modern slave-holder the right which he is presuming to exercise? Who authorized him to seize upon unoffending Africans, and to make them his mere slaves for life? Could he produce any thing like an order from heaven authenticated by the seal of the eternal Sovereign, his procedure, so far as conformable to that order, could not be challenged. But until he produce such order or permission, we must hold, which we do most firmly, that he has usurped a prerogative which has not been delegated to any creature, and which can reside only in Him who doeth according to his will in the army of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth. 2, The bondage to which the heathen were reduced among the Hebrews, was attended with many signal advantages. If it involved a measure of restriction on the exercise of their natural rights, it brought along with it a number of important privileges which otherwise they could not have enjoyed. Such of them as were admitted members of the commonwealth by the prescribed initiatory rite, were entitled to the sacred rest of the Sabbath, to the reading of the Holy Scriptures, to instruction from the ministers of the true religion, and to the enjoyment of the solemn festivals along with the families in whose service they were engaged. In short, as to religious privileges and civil rights, they were placed by divine appointment, on a footing of equality with the chosen people. But who will allege that the Africans have been reduced to a state of slavery with a view to their own advantage? That God has overruled this traffic in such a way as to elevate many of them in the scale of civilization is not denied. That He has made their residence among you, though compulsory, the means of promoting the intellectual improvement, the moral culture, and the spiritual welfare of some of them, we do not question. But on what ground can the least credit be claimed for those who, by violence, originally imported unoffending men, and have since, by force, retained them in bondage so inconsistent with their just rights, and so galling to their natural feelings? It was not the good of the negro they had in view, it was not to bring him under the influence of religion, or to place him within the reach of salvation. Avarice was the ruling passion. Pecuniary interest was the primary object. Tyranny has been the grand instrument. Even at the present moment, whatever be the advantages which some of them derive from living among you, are they not subjected to privations which, as rational and immortal beings, they cannot but feel? Are they not robbed of their civil rights? Are they not deprived of the fruits of their industry? Are they not hindered from having the privileges of the Christian Sabbath, of reading the Holy Scriptures and of worshipping in the same sanctuaries in which other classes assemble? In short, are they not, in the view of the law, mere chattels, which may be sold or bartered, or bequeathed, like the very horses, and cows, and oxen, that carry your burdens, and minister to your pleasure? 3, Those bond-servants among the Israelites were treated with far greater kindness than the negroes in modern times. As one instance, it deserves to be remembered, that any one who suffered bodily injury at the hands of his master, was entitled, according to the law, to his freedom. "If a man smite the eye of his servant, or the eye of his maid, that it perish, he shall let him go free for his eye's sake. And if he smite out his man-servant's tooth, or his maid-servant's tooth; he shall let him go free for his tooth's sake."* Is there any provision like this in the laws of the American States? As another instance, let it be recollected that whenever a servant ran away from his master, he was not to be delivered up by the party to whom he might flee. The law is in these words, "Thou shalt not deliver unto his master the servant who is escaped from his master unto thee. He shall dwell with thee, even among you, in that place which he shall choose, in one of thy gates where it liketh him best: thou shalt not oppress him."† Is there any law approaching this in any one of the slaveholding states?‡ Are slaves who run away from their owners * Exod. xxi. 26, 27.

† Dent. xxiii. 15, 16.

‡ What a contrast America presents to Palestine! The Constitution of the United States declares,—“No person held to service or labour in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein be discharged from such service or labour, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labour may be due.” in consequence of intolerable oppression, allowed to choose the places of their future residence, and to enjoy the protection of the civil authorities? How different the treatment they suffer! In what a spirit of vindictive malignity they are usually pursued into whatever retreat they may have hastened, and subjected, when caught, to a succession of barbarous inflictions, at the very thought of which humanity shudders.* Surely it were prudent in the slave-holders never to allude to the Mosaic code, which frowns on every part of their cruel proceedings—never to “come to the light,” in which their evil deeds are held up to merited reprobation.

2. Is it alleged that slavery, though existing among the Greeks and Romans in the primitive ages of Christianity, is no where condemned in the New Testament? This is an allegation which, we are aware, is sometimes hazarded. A countryman of our own, a civilian who occupies no mean place in the public eye, has ventured to assert, in presence of a large assembly, “that slavery is a subject on which the New Testament is altogether silent,”—that it maintains “a most expressive silence.” In this opinion we cannot acquiesce. Even were it true that the New Testament contains no direct condemnation of slavery, it would not follow that the thing is in itself innocent. There were, at the time, other practices which the apostles have not directly condemned; and yet they are allowed, on all hands, to have been enormous evils. For example, the gladiatorial shows, which were exhibitions of shocking cruelty, are not denounced in the epistles; but who would argue from this that they may innocently be revived in modern times? No more ought the circumstance that, in the same epistles, there is no formal denunciation of slavery, to be construed into evidence that the Lord was not displeased with its existence, or that it may be adopted in Christian countries without either committing sin or incurring censure. We trust there are few judges in the land, and few members in any church, who would commit themselves to such an unsound principle. But we do not admit the existence of that “most expressive silence,” which some have so boldly asserted, and others have so loudly cheered. Indeed, from the very genius and tendency of the gospel, we should beforehand have expected that it would very much foster the love and promote the recovery of civil liberty. Jesus came “to preach the gospel to the poor, to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, to set at liberty them that are bruised.” The apostle speaks of freedom in the most impassioned terms, “The glorious liberty of the children of God;”—“False brethren came in privily to spy out our liberty which we have in Christ Jesus, that they might bring us into bondage, to whom we gave place by subjection, no not for an hour;”—“Stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage;” and, from such statements, is it not obvious that a state of bondage is one of degradation and suffering, and that liberty is an inestimable privilege, to which too great importance cannot be attached, and on which too fervent applauses cannot be bestowed? Let it be remembered, also, that all the evils springing out of slavery are condemned in the New Testament, even in the most explicit terms. Does slavery imply the previous commission of theft? Were the ancestors of those who are now held in bondage originally stolen from their country and their kindred, and dragged by violence into the servitude from which only death released them? There can be no doubt that this is condemned. "The law is made for man-stealers." Does slavery involve the idea of robbery? Have the slaves been robbed of what God has granted them—their natural rights, and their Christian privileges? Surely the New Testament condemns robbery in every form. There is not another crime upon which the Lord has poured the lightning of his anger in more vivid flashes than this. Do the masters withhold from their slaves the fruits of their industry? Do they, in many cases, require of them the most exhausting toils during long hours, and notwithstanding refuse them such an amount of remuneration as equity demands, and gratitude should offer? There can be no question that this is condemned in the New Testament, even in the strongest language:—"Go to now, ye rich men, weep and howl for your miseries that shall come upon you. Behold the hire of the labourers, who have reaped down your fields, which is of you kept back by fraud, crieth, and the cries of them who have reaped are entered into the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth." Do the masters also endeavour to obstruct the progress of education among the negroes, and to prevent them obtaining copies of the scriptures, which they may read for themselves? Surely nothing can be more at variance with the whole spirit and scope of the New Testament than this. Nothing does it more clearly reveal than that the good tidings of great joy are to be preached to "all people;" that those who search the scriptures daily are accounted more noble than others who do not; that no higher encomium can be pronounced on any one than that "from his childhood he has known the holy scriptures which are able to make wise unto salvation." In short, every crime, every vice, every abuse, rising out of this odious traffic is condemned in the New Testament. How, then, can it be said that this part of revelation maintains a most expressive silence on the subject? The very reverse is the truth. There is not a page but breathes the spirit of universal liberty. There is not a verse but inspires the hatred of every kind of tyranny. There are no denunciations from the lips of the sacred writers more terrible than those which they hurl, with such fearless intrepidity, against all forms of oppression domestic, ecclesiastical, and political.

3. Is it alleged that slaveholding is the crime of the state, rather than of the individual; or that it is so much the sin of the nation as to render those who own slaves almost innocent? We have seen, with much surprise, such a notion advanced by some of your zealous apologists. Indeed, nothing has astonished us more than such assertions as the following, from men whose moral perceptions on other matters are usually very correct:—"How did Wilberforce and his friends proceed against the slaveholders of their day? Not in the cruel way of visiting a national sin on individuals who might be innocent. The sin of slavery is not the sin of individuals so much as it is a national sin. It was not the sin of the proprietors in the West Indies ies, but the national sin of Great Britain, that slavery was tolerated in our colonies." Now, to such an opinion we cannot give our assent. It would be most dangerous to the interest of morality to assume the principle, that the moment a State gives its sanction to any system confessedly immoral, henceforth nearly all the blame must be attached to the legislature, the administration, and the general community; while the individuals who have embarked in that traffic, however unholy, must be held as not committing much sin, and as not deserving much censure. Upon this principle, those who bow to the supremacy of the crown of England over the church—a flagrant usurpation in our view, may plead that they are innocent. They may argue that it is only the government who have passed the iniquitous law, and the community who have given it their countenance, that can be blamed. The individual members of the church,—the very ministers who fulfil their functions, and receive their emoluments under that law,—and the most devoted adherents who kneel at the altar and join in the liturgy, are entitled to allege that they are committing no sin, and that the whole guilt must be accumulated on the head of that symbolical personage—that supposed surety—the State. We trust that such notions of national morality will soon be discarded on both sides of the Atlantic. We submit that the true theory on this subject is, that any sin which is national under one aspect, is, under another, personal. Even when it has been so sanctioned by the authority of the government, and so supported by the concurrence of the people, as to render it a national offence, the individuals who have allowed themselves to become involved in that offence, are to be considered as proportionally guilty. For example,—the profanation of the Lord's day in our own country is so much countenanced by the laws of the state, the doings of the government, and the practices of the people, as to render it one of our national sins; but who, on that account, would say that the individuals who engage in any of the desecrations sanctioned by the state, as carrying the mail, running railway trains, &c., are innocent? No, they are not innocent. God reckons them very guilty: and simply on the ground that they are moral agents placed under his law, and responsible for their own actions, they ought to feel that they have incurred his righteous displeasure. In the same way must we estimate the guilt of slaveholding in any country where the odious traffic still lingers. Much must be imputed to the State which has passed so many laws for the regulation of the traffic, and which has hitherto declined taking the necessary measures for its suppression: but much also must be laid at the door of those numerous individuals who have, in various ways, and in different degrees, given their actual support. This, we repeat, is the only sound view that can be taken of their position, unless it can be shown that they are enuded of all voluntary agency, and of all moral responsibility. To speak of them as not guilty because the nation is guilty, is to encourage a most mischievous delusion. It is to make them feel, unless their own consciences have sufficient sensibility left to resist the impression, that while they are using their fellow-creatures as mere chattels, selling them, bartering them, scourging them, murdering them, the criminality attaches chiefly to the nation. Would it not be showing more true kindness to them, as well as a more enlightened concern for the interests of morals, to tell them, with all plainness, that while the nation has her own account to settle with the righteous Judge, they will only deceive themselves if they expect to escape her coming retribution?

4. No less unsatisfactory is the attempt at palliation which is founded on the supposed distinction between slaveholding and slavehaving. This is a modern discovery, and whether it is destined to survive the occasion that gave it birth, or to sink, like similar abortions, into a premature grave, the lapse of a few years will tell. Meanwhile, we must be allowed to declare our thorough conviction, that though as an object of thought the distinction may be not altogether imaginary, yet it is utterly insufficient, in general practice, to furnish the least apology for the continuance of slavery, or for the countenance which it receives from many of the professed followers of the Saviour. 1st. This distinction will avail only a very small number of the masters. It is avowedly applied by its inventor only to those who are so kind, so humane, so generous to their slaves, that they will not treat them in any respect, as mere property; that they will neither sell them nor barter them; neither withhold from them any one of the temporal mercies to which they are entitled, nor hinder them from enjoying any one of the spiritual privileges which the Redeemer has offered them. These are the only persons who are honoured with the new name of slave-havers. But is it not certain that these are only a mere fraction of the class? Is it not as undeniable as the shining of the sun over your southern heavens, that the great majority persist in looking upon their slaves as in every sense mere chattels, and treat them as such whenever this suits their own interests, or gratifies their own inclinations? Why then attach any weight to a distinction that extends the very little relief it can afford only to a very few, and has not the shadow of a bearing on the conduct of the overwhelming majority? 2d, Even those planters whom this distinction avails to a small extent, cannot feel that they are innocent. They are still identified in law with the immoral traffic. Let them be as humane and as benevolent—as ready to advance the temporal and eternal well-being of those under them as their warmest apologists represent, still they cannot allege that they have detached themselves from the system which has given them the very position they occupy. They are still constituent members of an unholy confederacy which has been founded on the ruins of man's original rights and God's eternal laws; and the more conspicuous the moral and religious excellences that adorn and exalt their character, they will lend the larger amount of influence to the support and perpetuation of an evil which in their hearts they abhor, and which their practice should assist in sweeping away. 3d. We would ask what is to become of the negroes of a slavehaver when he dies? Allow that they have enjoyed a large share of comfort and happiness during his life; that under his judicious and humane superintendence they have presented a picture, not only of submission and contentment, but of gratitude and cheerfulness, what is likely to be their condition when he has been laid in the tomb? They must then pass into other hands: and it is at least possible that their new master may be of a character the very reverse of that of him whose care they have closed amid their sincere regrets, and over whose grave they shed their unavailing tears. What conflicting emotions now rise in their bosoms! While on the one hand they desire to revere the memo-and venerate the character of a kind-hearted owner, whose face they shall see no more, on the other they cannot repress the bitter regret that he, while living, did not take such measures as might have saved them from oppression when he should have gone the way of flesh.— Nor should it be forgotten here, that the remembrance of the superior treatment and the greater happiness they enjoyed under him, can now serve only to render them the more miserable from the harsh inflictions and the many privations they suffer under his successor. Is it not something like puerile trifling to announce, with an air of solemnity, and to welcome amid thunders of applause, a distinction which avails not only a very few, and to a very small extent, but only for a very short period? 4th, We must add that such a distinction goes to subvert the foundations of sound morality. What would be thought of a merchant who, on stolen goods being found on his premises, would attempt to defend himself by saying that he is not holding them as articles of traffic, but merely having them for his own use? Would any judge have patience to listen to such a plea? Would any lawyer have effrontery to bring forward such an argument? Yet what are the men who now have slaves in their possession but the resettlers of stolen goods? Even those who have earned to themselves the new title, which we believe has the merit of having been originated by an eminent linguist in our own country, slave havers, are morally nothing better. They may appeal to their private worth and their public usefulness; they may point to the scenes of order and peace, virtue and happiness that are enacted on their plantations; we would affectionately warn them that so long as they retain any of their fellow-men in legal bondage, whatever treatment they may give them, they are accessories to a gigantic system of theft and robbery which has existed for ages, and which, unless put down by the wholesome influence of an enlightened public sentiment, is likely to involve your country in trouble more disastrous, perhaps, than any she has yet passed through.

5. It is sometimes alleged as an excuse for not taking immediate measures for the removal of slavery, that the moral influence of Christianity is sufficient to break down the system: that we have only to wait till this influence has been exerted, and the whole fabric will crumble into pieces. Now, we entertain not the shadow of a doubt that the influence of Christianity is as efficacious, when allowed full scope, as is here represented. Before its triumphant progress in former times, other evils of no ordinary magnitude have disappeared, as the mists that hover around the mountains, vanish before the growing splendour of the rising sun. But is that a reason why the lovers of freedom in your vast country should in the meantime remain idle spectators? Are the local legislatures, which have so much in their power, to do nothing in their proper spheres for meliorating the condition of an oppressed race, and wiping away the foulest stain on the national escutcheon? Are the executive rulers, who have the reins in their hands, to sit at their ease, and lie on their soft couches, under the soothing impression that, independently of them, there is a gradual process going forward under the liberalizing influence of the gospel, which will ultimately undermine the foundation and accomplish the overthrow of the system? It is not in this way that wise and enlightened governments are used to proceed in the removal of other evils. War, for example, is an evil which the influence of religion will yet banish from the earth. We can have no doubt that when this shall have leavened the minds of all classes, from the humblest citizens to the highest magistrates, then peace—that first of blessings to the nations—will have been secured on the surest grounds. But what wise, humane, paternal government would refuse, in the mean time, the use of every effort by which misapprehensions may be explained, and grievances redressed, without an appeal to arms? The nation that would presume to say, let the influence of Christianity be left to do its own work by bringing about universal peace, but in the interval we will give way to the passions from which wars come, and listen to no proposals that may be made for settling, by negotiation, the quarrels that may arise, even though much treasure should be expended, and much blood shed,—such a nation would deserve to be loaded with the bitterest reproaches, for pursuing a course so unprincipled and so injurious. And in like manner we will say that the state which will not adopt active measures for the removal of an evil so monstrous as slavery, but professes to wait till the influence of the gospel has brought about the change, is acting in a manner utterly inconsistent with a due sense of the great duties required from it, and the heavy responsibilities lying upon it, under the eye of Him who is Governor among the nations.—To what extent the moral influence of Christianity is relied on, while suitable legislation is neglected, we have not been particularly informed. But there is one thing we cannot help saying, that those who would leave all to the slow operation of this influence, are especially bound to see that all hindrances to its full application be speedily removed. If they can take their ease for a single day while laws against the erection of schools for the negroes, against putting into their hands copies of the scriptures, and against the full and unreserved preaching of the gospel, continue unrepealed, they ought to feel that they are chargeable with a most lamentable inconsistency. On the one hand they are professing to look for a most desirable change from the operation of a moral remedy; and yet, on the other, they are supporting barriers which are designed to prevent that remedy from coming into contact with the disease which it is fitted to cure. What would be thought of the relatives of a patient who, after being offered the only medicine that is adapted to save his life, would have recourse to every contrivance they could use to keep that medicine from him! Would they not be guilty of the basest deeds, and responsible for the worst consequences? Yet similar are the doings of many in America. They are fully aware, they tell us, that the only remedy for the many disorders of the slaveholding states is the influence of Christianity; and yet this they labour to exclude from every crevice in the social fabric, with a jealousy that never slumbers, and an earnestness that never relaxes. No wonder that so little improvement has been effected in the religious and moral spirit of the inhabitants in the South for some time back! No wonder that the suspicion exists—a suspicion which it is painful to cherish—that notwithstanding the length of time that has elapsed since Christianity was introduced by the original settlers, scarcely any advancement has been made, during the last fifty years, in those enlarged and liberal views which would secure genuine freedom and generous treatment to the poor negroes!

6. Is it alleged that the masters are very kind to their slaves—that they supply them with food, clothing, shelter, and other conveniences and comforts that render their condition not inferior to that of thousands of the working classes in this country? We have no wish to deny that such is the conduct of many of the masters. Indeed, they would betray a grievous want of regard to their own temporal interests, not to speak of the higher considerations of humanity and benevolence, if they treated their slaves in a different way, which could not fail to impair their strength and diminish their value. But allowing they were all treated in the kindest manner possible—and you know this is not the case,—would they not feel themselves sadly degraded, inasmuch as they are denied those rights which their Maker has conferred upon them, and which no authority on earth can innocently take from them? What American citizen would reckon his condition tolerable, even under the kindest master, and amid the richest luxuries, if he were placed under a law which doomed him to incessant labour without his own consent, and to arbitrary punishment without any trial, and if no provision were allowed to be made for securing to him the blessings of education, religious instruction, and civil freedom? But is it a fact that slaveholding in any part of your country is the very harmless thing which its supporters would have us believe? Where is the spot on which it exists, without leading to evils, moral, political, and physical, over which every friend of humanity must weep? “Slavery,” says your own General Assembly in the year 1818, “creates a paradox in the moral system; it exhibits rational, accountable, and moral beings, in such circumstances as scarcely to leave them the power of moral action. It exhibits them as dependent on the will of others, whether they shall receive religious instruction; whether they shall know and worship the true God; whether they shall enjoy the ordinances of the gospel; whether they shall perform the duties, and cherish the endearments of husbands and wives, parents and children, neighbours and friends; whether they shall preserve their chastity and purity, or regard the dictates of justice and humanity. Such are some of the consequences of slavery—consequences not imaginary, but which connect themselves with its very existence. The evils to which the slave is always exposed often take place in fact, and in their very worst degree and form: and where all of them do not take place, . . . still the slave is deprived of his natural rights, degraded as a human being, and exposed to the danger of passing into the hands of a master who may inflict upon him all the hardships and injuries which inhumanity and avarice may suggest.” Now, how does it happen that these evils uniformly arise wherever the system is carried out, if it is not inherently and essentially wrong? Surely since the streams are always so dark, and so disastrous, must not the fountain be very polluted? Since the fruits are always so bad and so bitter, must not the tree be very corrupt? We hesitate not to aver, that the principle upon which the system proceeds, is not only unjust, inhuman, unscriptural, but it is, in all cases where it is fully developed, the germ of innumerable evils which make millions mourn in fetters which they cannot break, and under burdens from which they cannot escape.

7. Is it alleged farther, that the negroes are quite contented with their condition—that they do not wish any greater portion of liberty than that which they at present enjoy? If this allegation were true, the less can be said in palliation of slavery. It would serve to prove that slavery not only gives to rational beings the condition of brutes, but impresses on them the character of brutes—that it virtually extinguishes the higher powers and the finer sensibilities of the soul. But we do not admit its truth, save to a limited extent. It may be true in regard to those who have very indulgent masters, and who, though they are nominally slaves, are allowed many of the privileges that are usually accorded to hired servants. But can it be said of all others? What mean the repeated efforts they make to escape from the hands of their masters? What mean those fetters with which they are loaded, lest they should run away? What mean those bruises and wounds that confine them to the hospitals, or distress them in the fields? What mean those groans that pass from their bosoms into the ears of the humane around them, and are wafted back to the shores of Africa, whence they themselves or their ancestors were torn away by ruthless violence? We cannot believe, and we will not admit, in the face of irresistible evidence to the contrary, that they feel, in their degraded, depressed, abject condition, any thing like the satisfaction alleged. Nor can we think it at all credible that they are so devoid of a sense of what is due to themselves as to be utterly unconcerned about the recovery of a blessing so important as their freedom. Where is there a creature, however mean, that does not prefer freedom? Even the irrational animal that prowls in the desert, or soars to the clouds, loves freedom. The finny tribes that swim in the ocean, and the most abject reptiles that creep upon the earth, love freedom. We know not in the universe of sentient being, a single creature that would not burst away from confinement, and roam at large in its own element, if permitted. And can we suppose that any race of our fellow-men, even though they possess a darker complexion, and wear a coarser costume than our own, are indifferent to freedom? No; it cannot be. Until they have been reduced to the lowest depths of intellectual and moral degradation by the crushing influence of protracted oppression, they cannot put from them a boon so congenial to the instinctive sentiments and the spontaneous aspirations of their own hearts.

8. Is it alleged that the negroes belong to an inferior race—that they are naturally very deficient in intellectual power, compared with the other races in civilized countries? Granting, for a moment, that they are an inferior race, will it follow that those who are superior are entitled to assume arbitrary dominion over them? Is it to be maintained that those who are inferior are for that reason alone to be divested of their civil rights, denied the various privileges which their Creator has provided for them, and subjected to the mere will of others who have no authority except what is founded in their assumed superiority? That would be a most unsound principle. It would be the very essence of tyranny. It would be the prolific source of innumerable evils. "Pride, indeed," it has been eloquently said by one of your own divines, "may contend that these unhappy subjects of our oppression are an inferior race of beings, and are therefore assigned, by the strictest justice, to a depressed and servile station in society. But in what does this inferiority consist? In a difference of complexion and figure? Let the narrow and illiberal mind who can advance such an argument, recollect whither it will carry him. In traversing the various regions of the earth, from the equator to the pole, we find an infinite diversity of shades in the complexion of men, from the darkest to the fairest hues. If, then, the proper station of the African is that of servitude and depression, we must also contend that every Portuguese and Spaniard is, though in a less degree, inferior to us, and should be subject to a measure of the same degradation. Nay, if the tints of colour be considered the test of dignity, we may justly assume a haughty superiority over our southern brethren of this continent, and devise their subjugation. In short, upon this principle, where shall liberty end? and where shall slavery begin?"* But truth will not allow us to admit that the blacks are originally inferior to the whites. Make full allowance for the depressing influence of the very unfavourable circumstances in which they have been placed for successive ages, and you will at once account for a large share of that intellectual deficiency of which they occasionally give affecting proofs. Certain it is the natives of Africa were not always liable to this reproach. Does not history inform us that "this contemned race can, as to intellect and genius, exhibit a brighter ancestry than our own; that they are the offshoots—wild and untrained, it is true, but still the offshoots of a stem which was proudly luxuriant in the fields of learning and taste,"—that Africa "has poured forth her heroes on the field, given bishops to the church, and martyrs to the fires. . . . There we see the negro under cultivation. If he now presents a different aspect, cultivation is wanting. That solves the whole case; for even now when cultivation has been expended on the pure and undoubted negro, it has never been expended in vain. Modern times have witnessed in the persons of African negroes, generals, physicians, philosophers, linguists, poets, mathematicians, and merchants, all eminent in their attainments, energetic in enterprise, and honourable in character; and even the mission schools in the West Indies exhibit a quickness of intellect, and a thirst for learning to which the schools of this country do not always afford a parallel." How unjust, then, to reproach them with an inferiority which would have had no existence, had they been always treated in the way they deserved! How ungenerous to deny them those rights, for the exercise of which, they have become, in some measure, disqualified, only through the influence of a system as impolitic as it is unjust!

9. Is it further alleged that slavery was introduced into America, and incorporated with its laws by Great Britain? We do not deny the justice of the charge, nor will we palliate the enormity of the crime. We admit that Britain has much cause to mourn the sinful policy by which she originated and supported so gigantic an evil in her young colonies, now become populous states. But her guilt in carrying so many hundreds of thousands into bondage on territories now yours, will not warrant you, in the face of every sacred principle, and of every generous feeling, to keep their posterity in perpetual servitude. Allege as you will that "slavery is a black, a vile inheritance left to America by her royal step-mother," it will not follow that America is innocent, if she continues the evil. No daughters are at liberty to tread in the steps of an erring, immoral mother. They are bound to judge for themselves. They are responsible for their own actions. As soon as they are capable of distinguishing truth from error, right from wrong, and the paths of virtue from the ways of profligacy, they are under obligations to choose a better course than that she pursued, and to aspire to a higher measure of moral worth than she strove to reach. Permit us to say, that similar is the way in which the promising daughters of this country—the several States—should endeavour to act. Let them blame, in the strongest manner, the mother for the evil example she set them in their younger days; let them heap the bitterest reproaches upon her for the iniquitous policy she pursued, and the unjust laws she enacted; let them not cease to remind her, even amid the laurels still thickening upon her brow, of the large share she had in fixing the yoke of oppression on that injured race, and of the burning shame which may well crimson her face with its deepest blushes; but oh! let them not impose upon themselves the delusion that they are innocent, if they only retain that "vile legacy" which became exclusively theirs at the era of their independence. Looking to the solemn account which they must one day give to the Supreme Judge, and remembering the noble principles to which they have sworn adherence in presence of the universe, let them cast from them the evils which they have derived from the old world and exhibit a picture of public virtue, honour, and happiness, such as no empire has yet succeeded in furnishing. What a distinction they would secure to themselves, and what a joy they would pour into many families, would they at once and earnestly take measures for breaking the chains that hold in captivity so many of their sable brethren, exiles from their father-land, and yet outcasts from the privileges of the one into which they have been carried!

10. Are any disposed still further to allege, that but a very short period has elapsed since our own country abolished slavery in her colonies, and that therefore she cannot with a good grace, reproach the United States with delay in proceeding to take the same step? We admit that our own nation was very tardy in doing an act of equity and humanity to the negroes in her foreign possessions. It was only after many arguments had been urged in public meetings, and many petitions had been presented to the imperial parliament, that she was brought to try the grand experiment. But it cannot be denied that that step was at last taken in a spirit of generosity that did honour to the British empire. With the concurrence of all the branches of the legislature, and amid the applause of all classes of the community, the proclamation went forth from the throne, that "slavery is henceforth, utterly, and for ever abolished and declared unlawful throughout the British colonies, plantations, and possessions abroad." * Who does not rejoice at the very announcement, so cheering to every one who could sympathize with an oppressed people? What heart is there so cold as not to feel a thrill of exulting emotion at the very thought that on the morning of the 1st of August, 1834, "eight hundred thousand fellow-men and fellow-subjects who, during the previous night, slept bondmen, awoke freemen?" Nor does the deed of their emancipation possess less of moral grandeur in our eyes, from the circumstance that the nation was willing to pay so large a sum as twenty millions sterling, rather than not obtain it. Though, as we conceive, not bound by any principle of moral right to grant compensation to the owners, we feel that our country "was placed on a higher pinnacle of moral elevation," by submitting to this great pecuniary sacrifice, rather than allow so many immortal beings to continue one year longer in unmerited bondage. Forgive us when we say what we feel, that here, amid our many faults, is a precedent worthy of your serious consideration, if not of actual imitation. Blame us, if you will, for having so long turned a deaf ear to the cries of our suffering fellow-men; but oh! do not suffer yourselves to fall into the same error, and incur the same reproach. If we were wrong in our long delay, you cannot be right in your present procrastination. For the sake of your own consistency; for the sake of that freedom which you have achieved for yourselves; for the sake of your own honour, upon which no stain should any longer be brought with your own hands; for the sake of that injured race who have natural rights and immortal souls no less precious than your own; for the sake of that religion which breathes a spirit of universal benevolence, and inculcates the principles of universal justice, we beseech you to outstrip us, if possible, in the alacrity with which you hasten to break every yoke, and in the generosity, if necessary, with which you are willing to secure freedom to nearly three millions of your fellow-men. Never will you repent such a proceeding. Britain continues to look back with emotions of gratitude and joy to the memorable day when, by her own hand, the foul blemish was wiped from her statute book. Ever since, her title to the poet's praise has rested on a broader foundation—"slaves cannot breathe in England;" and the bitterness of self-reproach no longer mingles with the joy awakened by the orator's splendid encomium—"I speak in the spirit of British law, which makes liberty commensurate with, and inseparable from British soil; which proclaims even to the stranger and sojourner, the moment he sets his foot on British earth, that the ground on which he treads is holy, and consecrated by the genius of universal freedom. No matter in what language his doom may have been pronounced; no matter what complexion incompatible with freedom, an Indian or an African sun may have burnt upon him; no matter in what disastrous battle his liberty may have been cloven down; no matter with what solemnities he may have been devoted on the altar of slavery; the first moment he touches the sacred soil of Britain, the altar and the idol sink together in the dust; his soul walks abroad in her own majesty; his body swells beyond the measure of his chains that burst from around him; and he stands forth redeemed, regenerated, and disenthralled by the irresistible genius of universal freedom."

MEMOIR OF REV. GORDON T. EWING.

The daily periodical press, deeply sympathizing with his bereaved family, has announced that, on board a steamer, March 21st, 1848, on his way from Cincinnati to New Orleans, Rev. Gordon T. Ewing, of Pittsburgh, departed this life. The news, thus circulated, is sufficient to assure us that a Prince in Israel has fallen, and in his death the church has sustained a severe loss. The Pittsburgh Presbytery, of which for several years he had been a highly esteemed and worthy member, at its semi-annual meeting, April 6th, being informed of the mournful event, unanimously passed resolutions of condolence with his afflicted family in their sore bereavement, and with the congregation now vacant by the death of their beloved pastor; and, as a token of respect to the memory of the deceased brother, appointed one of its members to write and publish his memoir. The church owes it as a duty to her living head and Lord, to place on record the labours, the acquirements, and the triumphs through faith of her anointed ones. It is of great importance to those preparing for the holy ministry, to have set before them examples of patience, of industry, and perseverance. Every aspirant after distinction in any of the learned professions, ought to assure himself that such is attainable only by bringing to the study of his profession, high intellectual and moral attainments, and constant application in his own calling.

In recording some reminiscences of the deceased brother, it is not intended to present a full portrait of his character, but merely to give such an outline as will be sufficient for the purpose of recognising the resemblance. To do justice in delineating a character in which, with rich profusion, clustered the graces of mental and religious refinement, requires not only an intimate acquaintance with the individual described, but also powers of discrimination to which few have attained. The difficulty in description does not arise from the want of harmony between the Divine original and its image impressed in regeneration and developed in the work of sanctification, but from imperfection in our distinctions between the mere incidents and essential properties of Christian character. On the one hand, the amiableness of natural disposition, and suavity of manners, may be mistaken for gracious affections; and on the other hand the absence of these so eclipses the exercise of grace, that its existence is often doubted.

The subject of this memoir from early youth was distinguished for manly, generous, and noble sentiments. In the year 1798, he was born near Maghera, County Derry, Ireland. His parents were respectable members of the Anti-bounty Associate church, and from them he received such a religious training as laid the foundation of his future usefulness and greatness in the church of God. Being the only son of his fond parents, he was consequently the object of peculiar solicitude. In boyhood he gave evidence of possessing capabilities of high mental cultivation, and accordingly he was devoted to literary and scientific pursuits. Having completed his common school education, he was placed under the tuition of Rev. — Brice, the pastor of the congregation to which his parents belonged. Under this refined and classic scholar, in his course preparatory to entering college, he spent four years. In this period, he read an extensive course of classic authors, both in Latin and Greek. But while employed in acquiring an accurate knowledge of ancient languages, the early religious cultivation of his mind began to discover its first ripe fruits. In the eighteenth year of his age, he was brought under strong convictions, by the Spirit of God, and this work resulted in bringing him to a saving knowledge of God reconciled in Christ. He professed faith in Christ, and sealed his covenant in partaking of the sacramental supper. Parental expectations were high in respect to the only and beloved son, and they were not doomed to disappointment. In 1818 he entered the Belfast academic institution; and his whole deportment, both religious and moral, soon attracted the favourable notice of both students and professors. Having in the dedication of himself to God, renounced the Devil, the world and the flesh, he walked in youth, as in after life, humbly and circumspectly in the path of duty. He profited much in his college curriculum. In the different departments of science his acquisitions were respectable, but in moral sciences he excelled; and on finishing his course he received the highest honours of the institution.

His ethical inquiries necessarily led him to a contemplation of the different forms of government established for the benefit of the social compact. Though raised and educated in a land of royalty and high sounding titles, yet like many others in similar circumstances, he had a strong desire to see the working of the democratic principle—a nation governing itself. Before commencing a systematic course of theology, he determined to spend some time in travelling; and having had many near relatives in the United States, and having read of the principles and order of American government, he resolved on making in this country a temporary abode. His original purpose was not to remain permanently in this land, but as soon as he had acquired the knowledge of men and things which he desired, to return to the place of his birth. But circumstances controlled his subsequent movements, so that for many years he was a citizen of our beloved country. In 1822 he arrived in Philadelphia; and soon after his landing, became acquainted with Rev. Samuel Wylie, of south Illinois. At the instance of this gentleman, he accompanied him from Philadelphia to his home, near the ancient town of Kaskaskia. There in company, they opened, and for some time conducted, an extensive classical school. But, alas! the diseases incident to the climate in a short time made fearful ravages upon Mr. Ewing's system, and from their effects he never entirely recovered. Fever and ague prostrated his body, and being of a full or plethoric habit, the malaria issuing from the great American bottom, together with contagious stagnant waters, generated diseases which afterwards destroyed his constitutional powers.

During the time he was employed in the capacity of teacher, he occupied himself in a careful inquiry respecting the scriptural character of the different departments of the household of faith. The church of his birth had no ecclesiastic connexion in the United States, and he therefore felt himself the more at liberty to investigate the whole subject of church communion. His inquiries resulted in a cordial adoption of the principles of the Reformed Presbyterian Church. Calm deliberation brought him to accede to her communion; and to the principles he adopted, and the cause he espoused, he maintained an unwavering attachment through life.

The emoluments of teaching which sometimes turn away from the path of duty respecting the ministry of reconciliation, had no charms for our deceased brother. Several offers were presented to him, which would have caused men of less purity of purpose to have turned aside from the right, and consulted their ease and indulgence in worldly things; but still recollecting that by his own voluntary act he had devoted himself to the service of God in the gospel of his Son, earthly considerations could not shake his purposes. In the autumn of 1824 he entered the Theological Seminary under the supervision of Rev. S. B. Wylie, D. D. To the study of Divinity he brought a highly cultivated mind and a heart burning with zeal for the glory of God. His progress in the proper literature of the institution was both rapid and solid. Before his entry, he was a rare scholar, and in the gratification of his religious propensities he had become, by private reading and study, a sound divine. In the spring of 1825, by the professor he was certified to the Pittsburgh Presbytery as being prepared to be taken under trial for license to preach the gospel of the grace of God. The time spent in the seminary he often spoke of with great delight. For their mutual benefit, the Theological students formed a religious society. Its meetings were held on the Friday evening of each week, and a principal part of the exercises was to detail the religious experiences of the members. Following the plan of Pike and Hayward, they were strictly tested by the word of God. Searchings of heart and solemn prayer abounded in these assemblies. The talents of our beloved brother had there an appropriate field of exercise. He was an excellent casuist, and deeply versed in the science of mental philosophy and to the edification of his brethren, these acquirements enabled him to resolve cases of conscience, and bring the exercises of Christian affections to the supreme standard of human action.

O cruel grave, where is thy loving brotherhood? One only remained in the church militant. My dear companions had doubtless the star of me in sanctification; and they have entered into the heavenly rest. As covenant dust, preserve thou their bodies till the judgment of the great day. Thou hast opened thy devouring jaws, and their manly forms are for ever hidden from mortal sight. Precious deposite—bodies redeemed from the curse of the law. They shall one day be raised to glory, immortality and eternal life.

His pulpit exercises and examinations on Theology, both practical and systematic, being with great cordiality sustained, he was, on the 9th of May, 1825, in the city of Pittsburgh, licensed to preach the everlasting gospel. But though his qualifications as a probationer for the holy ministry, were considered to be of no ordinary kind, yet having drank deep at the fountains of literature and science, he asked and obtained leave from Presbytery to spend the winter ensuing his licensure in the furtherance of his scientific researches. The time granted was spent in the city of Philadelphia, in attendance on the Theological lectures of Professor Wylie, and also on the course of lectures delivered in the Medical hall of the University of Pennsylvania. While thus employed, he preached sometimes by invitation in the Northern Liberties of Philadelphia. In this quarter of the city a respectable number of families, some of them belonging to the Reformed Presbyterian and others to the Associate church, all of them his early acquaintances from the north of Ireland, pressed him hard to remain in the City—to organize a congregation in connexion with the Reformed Presbyterian church and become its pastor. For prudent reasons he declined the invitation, and in the summer of 1826 returned to the Pittsburgh Presbytery. He preferred Western Pennsylvania as his field of labour.

His probation for the ministry was short. Canonsburgh congregation, then vacant by the resignation of Rev. William Gibson, soon presented him with a unanimous call. After much deliberation and wrestling with God in prayer for direction in the matter of settlement it was accepted; and on the 22d of October, 1827, by prayer and the imposition of hands he was ordained to the office of the ministry of reconciliation, and installed pastor of the congregation. In those solemn transactions, Dr. Black presided—preached the ordination sermon from 1 Corinthians xii. 28—offered up the prayer of consecration, and was first in the imposition of the hands of the presbytery.

During the incumbency of his predecessor many of the members of this congregation had become alienated from one another. It contained men of sterling worth, but discord had in some measure paralyzed their social operations. To restore harmony and Christian co-operation taxed the prudence and wisdom of the young minister. This, however, in a few months was accomplished. Every root of social bitterness was eradicated from this portion of the vineyard of our common

Lord. Between Mr. Ewing and the people of his congregation, mutual confidence, which is the basis of proper action, exerted a salutary influence. His labours of love in family visitations, and in attendance on the bed of sickness and death, gained for him soon the affections and esteem of a grateful people. His pulpit exhibitions were grave, important and substantial. In manner, he was scientific and eloquent. He possessed no talent for loose and noisy declamation, and the application of each discourse was pointed, but mild and gentle. The great success, however, of his ministry, under God, depended on his assiduity in exercising a watchful care over his flock. In order that he might have time to devote to pastoral duties, in visiting from house to house, he denied himself of those pleasures and recreations which are often invigorating to the body; and he often trimmed the midnight lamp in his preparations for the sanctuary.

About five months after his ordination and settlement at Canonsburgh, he was happily united in marriage to Miss Margaret, eldest daughter of Dr. Black. To him this union was truly a blessing. Amiable in her disposition, accomplished, yet plain and unaffected in her manners, and, above all, possessed of deep-toned piety, she was qualified to participate in the joys of her beloved husband, and sympathize with him in his afflictions. At the time of marriage, and for some months after, their sun suffered no eclipse, and Providence strewed their path with the flowers of honour, respect, and happiness. But the day of adversity is set over against the day of prosperity. The people of God are destined to suffer afflictions, so that they may be weaned from the pleasures of earth. The smiles of approbation in the church and the surrounding community, and the pleasures of the domestic circle, could not from our deceased brother avert the hand of disease.

The autumn of 1828 witnessed his prostration. Chills and fevers, his old Illinois complaint of 1823, re-attacked him, and his tall and manly form bowed under their pressure. In vain was resort had to medical prescriptions. With intervals of partial health, his maladies increased, till in 1830, he resigned into the hands of Presbytery his pastoral charge; and, accompanied by his affectionate partner in life, returned to the enjoyment of his native air. The experiment was successful. The means were blessed for his recovery. Though in Ireland the restoration to health was slow, yet in about two years his health was so improved that he suffered but little during the remainder of his stay in the Emerald Isle.

As soon as circumstances permitted, he accepted an invitation from the Reformed Presbyterian Church, Londonderry, then vacant, to occupy their pulpit. There he remained for the greater part of his sojourn in his native country. The situation of the city renders it healthy, and the manners of its inhabitants are hospitable and refined. Every thing combined to designate this city as the place of his abode, for the purpose of recovery and the exercise of his ministry; and it is probable he would have remained longer in Ireland, had not divisions in the Reformed Presbyterian church there rendered his situation somewhat uncomfortable.

Some time before his arrival, among Covenanters the subject of toleration had been discussed with much warmth and ability. Men eminent for talents and erudition were ranged on each side of the question.

Those denominated liberal, maintained the doctrine of passive toleration, and denied magistral interference in matters purely religious. On the other hand, those imbued with high notions of the exercise of royal prerogatives in religious matters, argued that the civil power ought to restrain, by civil pains, the promulgation of "errors" and "heresies." With this question in its various bearings, the whole church became embroiled, and division was the result. Mr. Ewing endeavoured by every possible means to arrest the dissensions and reconcile the parties, but he laboured in vain. He deprecated the consequences of discussions which appeared to him rather to seek after victory than the promotion of the glory of God, and refused to identify with party discussions. Each side coveted his influence and the exercise of his talents, but his steadfast adherence to original principles, rejecting new glosses, rendered the disputants on each side jealous of his position. What could not be accomplished by flattery, some of them attempted by threats, for the purpose of intimidation. The excitement of parties grieved him much, but did not move him from a peaceful deportment. He longed to retreat from scenes of strife and discord among brethren in Christ; and having in his native land, for some years, enjoyed a state of almost confirmed health, his attention was again directed to the United States.

In 1841 he was again greeted by his Pittsburgh friends. The climate of Ireland had greatly improved his appearance, but he often complained of a want of action on the surface of the body. Coldness of skin and gastritis often succeed severe attacks of ague, and of these, Mr. Ewing was never entirely free from his first attack in Illinois, in 1823, till he finished his course on earth. During his absence from the United States, on the subject of civil relations, the Reformed Presbyterian church had been divided. This unhappy division took place in 1833, and was attended with many unpleasant consequences. Since the division, those who reject the Constitution of the United States as being immoral in its fundamental principles, and denounce the government as being the ordinance of the Devil, are denominated the Synod of the Reformed Presbyterian church; and, on the other hand, those who maintain the Constitution to be moral, and the government to be the ordinance of God, are called the General Synod of the Reformed Presbyterian Church. Crimination and abuse of their more liberal brethren, strikingly marked the writings of the men who denounced the government and citizens of our beloved country. They held up as a model, the civil attainments of the second reformation in Scotland, and maintained that Covenanters in every country under heaven were bound by solemn covenant engagements to reject every constitution of government which did not embrace the attainments of that period. In defence of their position, and to place the matter in a proper light, writers of the General Synod asserted that voluntary citizenship in the United States did not involve immorality—that it was not a breach of covenant engagement—that with all its defects, the Constitution of this confederation is far in advance of the civil attainments of the second reformation in Britain—that instead of citizenship involving a breach of covenant, on the part of the covenanters, his engagements in his public profession bind him actively to sustain our constitution in subserviency to the glory of God—that the Federal constitution is far in advance of any civil organization since the introduction of the Christian dispensation—that its fundamental principles will fa avourably compare with those respecting civil government asserted in the symbols of the faith of any of the reformed churches.

On his arrival in Pittsburgh, Mr. Ewing had several interesting interviews with prominent men of each Synod; and, after much deliberation, he presented his testimonials of Christian and official standing from the Irish church to the Pittsburgh Presbytery, in subordination to the "General Synod." He calmly weighed the arguments of each department before he decided the question of adhesion. His previous residence for many years in the United States—his acquaintance with our civil order, enabled him to form a correct determination respecting the controversies which had divided the Reformed Presbyterian family in this land.

About the time of his accession to the Pittsburgh Presbytery, a congregation in the 5th Ward of the city of Pittsburgh, then vacant, presented through Presbytery, an invitation to Mr. Ewing to stately supply their church. The petition was in part granted; and so acceptable were his labours amongst the people of the congregation, that in a short time a unanimous call was the result; and on his acceptance thereof, by Presbytery, he was installed their pastor. There he exercised his ministry till the connexion was dissolved by death. For some months before his decease, he was able to perform but little of pastoral duties. He did not, as in former times, fall under chills and fevers, but coldness of skin and want of digestion were the primary symptoms of his disease. Atrophy soon ensued, and presented the body as under its direful ravages. The healing art was laid under contribution to arrest the fell destroyer, but in vain. Remedial agents proved useless in arresting the wasting of the body, or restoring the tone of its prostrate powers.

In former times, the sea air and change of climate had effected for his recovery what medicine could not accomplish; and it was the dictate of duty that he should again try his former experiments. Accordingly, in the beginning of March, accompanied by his ever loving and faithful wife, he embarked on board a steamer for New Orleans, thence intending to make a coasting voyage to New York. The undertaking was right, and the design laudable; but the work of his servant was finished. There was no need of a prolongation of life—he must not any longer be detained in the church militant. For some days, on board the steamer, he appeared rather better than when he left home, but his strength afterwards yielded to the pressure of disease; and one hundred miles above New Orleans, the first point of destination, in the arms of his dear, but afflicted wife, he yielded up the ghost. His latter end was peace. When he found his strength failed, and was fully aware that his latter end was at hand, he greatly rejoiced in the prospect of the heavenly inheritance. Having committed his dear children and wife to the care of their covenant God, in the faith of a blessed resurrection, he slept in Jesus. How interesting to contemplate the death of the righteous—to contemplate the life and the death of those who have been employed in turning many to righteousness, and who in the closing scenes of life, afford ample encouragement to follow the ever-blessed Redeemer. In the all-wise providence of God, and in the midst of a life of much usefulness, he was removed from the vale of tears. He died, aged 50 years and some months.

On the sixth of April, ensuing his death, the widow returned home with the body of her deceased husband; and, on the day following, from his late residence, it was borne to the place of interment in the Allegheny Cemetery. The clergy, the inhabitants in general, and especially the members of his congregation, manifested great respect to his memory, and condolence with the bereaved family, in the very large attendance upon his funeral. The widow has lost a beloved husband; the children a kind and affectionate father; the congregation a talented, religious, and elevated pastor; and the church in general one of her brightest ornaments. By those who knew him, his name will be had in lasting remembrance. The affections of his late congregation have erected a pillar to the memory of their deceased pastor, more enduring than marble, more refulgent than brass. Their works of love and affection deservedly praise them in the gate. "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord, from henceforth: yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours and their works do follow them." G.

TURN THE CARPET; OR THE TWO WEAVERS.

As at their work two weavers sat,
Beguiling time with friendly chat,
They touched upon the price of meat,
So high, a weaver scarce could eat.

"What with my children, cares, and wife,"
Quoth Will, "I'm almost tired of life,
So hard my work, so poor my fare,
'Tis more than mortal man can bear!

"How glorious is the rich man's state,
His house so fine, his wealth so great,
Heaven is unjust, you must agree,
Why all to him? Why none to me?

"In spite of all the Scripture teaches,
In spite of all the preacher preaches,
This world (indeed I've thought so long;)
Is ruled, methinks, extremely wrong.

"Howe'er I look, where'er I range,
'Tis all confused, and hard, and strange;
The good are troubled and oppressed,
And 'tis the wicked seem the blest."

Said John, "Our ignorance is the cause,
Why thus we blame our Maker's laws;
Part of his ways alone we know,
'Tis all that man can see below.

"See'st thou that carpet, not half done,
Which thou, dear Will, hast well begun?
Behold the wild confusion there,
So rude the mass, it makes one stare.

"A stranger, ignorant of the trade,
Would say no meaning's there conveyed;
For where's the middle? Where the border?
The carpet now is all disorder."

Said Will, "My work is yet in bits,
But still in every part it fits;
Besides your reasoning's round-about,
Why, man, the carpet's inside out!"

Says John, "Thou sayest the thing I mean,
And now I hope to ease thy spleen;
This world, which clouds thy soul with doubt,

Is but a carpet inside out!

"As when we view these shreds and ends,
We know not what the world intends,
So when on earth, things look but odd,
They're working still the scheme of God.

"No plan, no pattern, can we trace,
All wants proportion, truth and grace;
The motley mixture we deride,
Nor see the beauteous upper side.

"But when we reach that world of light,
And view the works of God aright,
Then shall we see the whole design,
And own the Worker was divine.

"What now seem random strokes, will
there

All order and design appear,
We shall admire what here we spurned,
For then the carpet shall be turned."

"Thou'rt right," cried Will, "no more I'll grumble,

Or think this world so strange a jumble;
My impious doubts are put to flight,
For my own carpet sets me right."

NECESSITY OF WORK FOR CHILDREN.

There is no greater defect in educating children than neglecting to accustom them to work. It is an evil that attaches most to large towns and cities. Our children suffer from it. The parent considers whether the child's work is necessary to him, and does not consider whether the work is necessary or not to the child. Nothing is more certain than that their future independence and comfort much depend on being accustomed to work—accustomed to provide for the thousand constantly recurring wants that nature entails upon us. If this were not so, still it preserves them from bad habits; it secures their health; it strengthens both mind and body; it enables them better to bear the confinement of the school-room, and it tends more than any thing else to give them just views of life. It is too often the case that children, provided they spend half a dozen hours of the day at school, are permitted to spend the rest as they please. They thus grow up in the world without a knowledge of its toils and cares. They view it with a false medium. They cannot appreciate the favours you bestow, as they do not know the toils they cost. Their bodies and minds are enervated, and they are constantly exposed to whatever vicious associations are within their reach. The daughter probably becomes that pitiable, helpless object, a novel-reading girl. The son, if he surmounts the consequences of your neglect, does it, most probably, after his plans and station for life are fixed, and when knowledge of one of its important objects comes too late. No man or woman is fully educated, if not accustomed to manual labour. Whatever accomplishments they possess, whatever their mental training, a deduction must be made for their ignorance of that important chapter in the world's great book.—Bangor Whig.

HOME.—Make home happy. Study to please and interest your wives and children. Carry to them some natural curiosity, some agreeable book, some useful paper, that will interest them for an hour or two every day. It is a painful sight to witness droves of youths, from the age of fourteen to twenty-one, standing at the corners of the streets on a pleasant evening, using language, to say the least, unbecoming to their age, when they might be agreeably employed at home. Parents do not feel sufficiently interested to make their children happy, and love the domestic hearth better than the public highways. You will always notice that those young men become the best members of society, and are the most useful in the world, who have spent a large portion of their minority beneath the care and influence of a devoted parent's eye. They are preserved from a thousand temptations to which others are exposed, and early learn to practise those virtues which in after life make them respected and beloved.

Make home attractive. Be cheerful, kind and agreeable yourselves. Never wear a frowning brow or utter a cross or angry word before your children. A dull face, a crabbed expression, a peevish, fretful disposition, are entirely out of place, amid the sanctities of home, around the domestic fire-side, in the presence of the happy looks and smiling cheeks of innocent childhood, or more sober youth. Some men have a smile for every place but home—they are mild and gentle every where but among their own household. This is a very great error—we must call it a heinous sin. If there is a spot under heaven that should call out the best affections, the warmest love and the kindest smiles, it is that dear ark, our home.

If parents were more particular to do their duty in this respect, it would have a glorious influence, and tell nobly on the future character of the rising generation.

GOVERNMENT OF CHILDREN.

One of the first habits that children form is that of contradicting. This some parents regard with complacency. They scarcely appear to consider it any thing more than the outburst of a free and noble spirit. No mistake, however, could be more perfect. Allow a child at every word or sentence you speak, to vociferate "no! no!" and very soon he will learn to say, "I wo'n't!" and "I will!" "I sha'n't!" "I shall!" and, in fine, to say and do just as he pleases. The beginnings of evil are to be resisted. If a child evince a vicious propensity or disposition, let that at once be attended to. Do not wait for a more convenient season to correct; nor through a mistaken lenity, omit to correct him altogether. By the time a child can speak, he can obey. That is a false and pernicious sentiment, current to some extent at the present day, which alleges that a child must grow up and be permitted to exercise his own judgment about matters and things before he is corrected. Give it no countenance whatever in your government of children.

Guard against a hasty temper. You may have cause of provocation. Be careful that none discover your anger: especially maintain a firm and quiet spirit in administering reproof, or inflicting a punishment. If you exhibit turbulence, your attempts at reproof and correction will only aggravate the feelings of the child, and render perfectly ineffective all discipline.

Beware of always assigning a reason for every thing you command. Let your child understand that he must obey, because it is his duty to obey. If after having obeyed, he does not understand, then, probably, it might not be improper to assign a reason: not, however, until then. Avoid threatening also. This has a very injurious effect on yourself and on your child. It begets recklessness. You will threaten when you do not think what you are doing, and your child will become so familiar, or rather, so used to your habit in this particular, that he will care nothing about it.

Cultivate the love of virtue. Explain and enforce the necessity of serving God. Inculcate the habit of prayer. Pray yourself; teach your child to pray

"Prayer is the simplest form of speech
That infant lips can try;
Prayer the sublimest strains that reach
The Majesty on high."

EARLY RELIGIOUS EDUCATION.

Some persons contend that the young mind should be left to grow untaught in religious truth, until it is sufficiently matured to judge for itself. Coleridge and his friends were once talking upon this very subject; one of them maintained that religion should not be instilled into the youthful mind, and Coleridge contended that it should. His friend observed, that the mind should be left alone upon that subject, and in mature years it would of itself assume the right direction. After dinner he walked into his garden, and showed him a spot full of nothing but mustard plants. "There," said Coleridge, "is my fine flower garden." "Flower garden!" said his astonished friend, "Why are they all mustard plants?" "I know that," said Coleridge, "but after a while, some how or other, the mustard will all be rooted out, and we shall have a splendid variety of cultivated flowers!"

NEVER BEGIN A THING UNTIL YOU HAVE WELL CONSIDERED THE END. As an Eastern prince was riding along with his courtiers, a beggar presented himself and offered, for a hundred pieces of gold, to give his majesty a valuable piece of advice. The king commanded the sum to be presented to him, and received in return the maxim above mentioned. The courtiers were exceedingly indignant at what they considered a barefaced imposition, and desired permission to chastise the beggar on the spot. But the king declared himself well satisfied with his purchase, and ordered the sentence to be engraved on all his gold and silver plate. Some time after, a conspiracy was entered into for the purpose of destroying the prince; and, as he was at that time indisposed, his surgeon was bribed to despatch him with a poisoned lancet. Accordingly, on being called to bleed his majesty, he prepared to accomplish his design; but happening to cast his eyes on the sentence inscribed on the silver basin which an attendant held, he was seized with remorse, dropped the fatal instrument, and prostrating himself before his injured master, confessed his crime, and named the instigators of this horrid purpose. The king, turning to his courtiers, observed, "Now I hope you will confess that a piece of advice productive of so important a consequence, was cheaply purchased at a hundred pieces of gold."

How many disastrous events, how many heart-rending catastrophes would be avoided, were our undertakings well considered at the beginning! were the probable consequences deliberately weighed, and sage advice attended to! Rashness is more peculiarly the vice of the young, and many a life is spent in misery and bitter repining, because due deliberation was not used at its outset, and proper precautions were not taken to avoid the rocks and quicksands which abound in the ocean of existence.

Foreign Missions.

THE FIELD AND THE LABOURERS.

The following extracts are taken from an "appeal from the Missionaries at the Sandwich Islands on the duty of the present generation to evangelize the world." They present the church's duty in this particular in the most impressive and solemn manner, and we cannot but believe that they will produce a powerful and beneficial effect wherever they are read. It may increase the interest which is connected with them, proceeding from persons on the field, and many of them long and very successfully engaged in the work, to know that they were written just before the very great accessions made to the churches in the Sandwich Islands in 1836.

If we look at the earth geographically, the maps are almost black on which are designated the population of the land and the sea still under the dominion of the Prince of Darkness. For one square mile, with light flashing on it, there are thousands spread with the pall of death. To specify, would be to mention a large part of the proper names of countries, which united, make up the continents, and the names of the islands, which, disunited, are scattered among the oceans. So extensive is the territory, that should the men sent forth, few and short-lived as they are, travel continually, and announce pardon to the guilty, day and night, they could not pass over all the high-ways and by-paths, and search out the habitations of the whole human family. Their voice, should they raise it perpetually as they go, would be the voice of here and there one crying in the wilderness, heard by only a small part of those who have ears to hear, and souls to be saved. The sound of missionaries has not gone into all the earth, nor their words to the end of the world. It could not go. It is impossible that the few missionaries from the American churches should convert the world. They could not explore it. They could not encompass all the cities, and blow a trumpet around their walls, if that were the means appointed to save them. They could not mention in the ear of every mortal the only name by which we must be saved.

The foreign missionaries from our country are one to six millions of men,* or two for the population of the United States; and two men could not preach the gospel to all in that extensive field; many would die without the sight of him who publishes salvation. Now, let lines be drawn over the world at such distances that the voice of one man may meet the voice of another, and let one hundred missionaries travel on these lines and proclaim the gospel; and allow that the population of the territory thus sounded upon should be saved, it would still be leaving millions and millions to perish.

* While the number of missionaries has increased since this appeal was written, it should be remembered that the population of the world has also been increasing, and probably in a greater ratio, so that the proportion remains about the same now as then.

The degradation of the heathen is so deep, the darkness so dense, the number so vast, that 600,000 missionaries sent the present year would be insufficient to afford the present generation any thing like the privileges enjoyed in Christian lands, and it were better still to be born in a log cabin in Maine or Missouri than in the palaces of Egypt or China. For Christendom, were every minister in it removed, would be unspeakably better furnished with the means of grace than the heathen could be with one missionary to every thousand. But several thousand ministers, with a countless number of collateral helps, do not yet convert the people of our favoured land. How, then, if they were in a state of heathenism, should two men convert them, especially if these two were foreigners, with the language to learn, write, and print; and houses to build; and schools to establish and teach; and medicines to furnish; and families of their own to provide for; and the idol gods of a nation to destroy; and a vail of superstition, forty centuries thick, to rend; the horrible darkness to dispel; hearts of stone to break; a gulf of pollution to purify—A NATION TO REGENERATE! How can two men do all this? How, then, shall one hundred missionaries convert the world? How a thousand? How a hundred thousand? They cannot.

When six hundred thousand go from the five millions of Christians in Christendom, or from a million and a half in the United States, they will not, all combined, emit more light than may be expected from the morning star of the millennial day. The present missionary operations—to use the language of Mr. Abeel,—“are as child’s play.”—If the great God could despise his creatures, it would be despicable in his sight. A little more than a hundred men to convert a lost world! A band not so large as preach the gospel in the City of New York, or teach schools in New York, or practise law or medicine in New York, or print books or papers in New York; this band has 600,000,000 to supply with teaching, and preaching, and medicine, books and schools, and this is called converting the world! A band of men not sufficient to look after any one department of business, whether ecclesiastical, civil, or literary, in the least state of the twenty-four of our Union, have to look after the temporal and eternal welfare of six hundred millions. A hundred men! It takes more than that to lay a railroad, or dig a canal; more than that to manufacture muskets and powder in times of peace; more than that to man one ship of war; and more than that for any one of the employments of men, from the hall of judgment to the humblest occupations.

One hundred men, or two hundred, or three hundred, or five hundred to enlighten the moral world!! It requires nine thousand men to visit the Pacific ocean, many of whom leave wife and children for voyages of three years, in order to fill the lamps which assist the moon and stars to dispel the natural darkness of the United States. If a valley is to be exalted or a mountain levelled, thousands must gird themselves.—

How, then, shall a few hundreds prepare the way of the Lord, in the deserts of all the earth? Where is the monarch purposing to subdue a neighbouring kingdom, who will feel sustained and honoured with an army of one hundred men, the result of twenty years' enlistment, with an addition of fresh troops of five, ten, or twenty annually?

Can five men from America subdue thirty millions in France? Can one hundred or a thousand subjugate all nations? The army of the aliens, six hundred millions strong—will it bow to one hundred soldiers of Zion's King? The missionary operations are child's play; the light of them a taper; their magnitude, a drop of the bucket; and their weight, the dust of the balance against the everlasting hills. "If the great God could despise his creatures, it would be despicable in his sight!"

If we turn a moment from the men, and look at the means to sustain them, the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof. The wealth of the mines is his, and he made it; and he will use it to promote the interests of his church. It is required. The superscription to Cæsar on the coins must be effaced, and a new one be struck for the church. There is no other work so urgent, none so worthy, none in which the interest on earth is more ample, and the treasure in heaven more sure. The wealth of America calls for extended missionary operations,—the support of an army, and not a few spies. The funds of the American Board are as nothing. The treasurer's report being read, no one needs to be told that the work is not done,—that it is not begun. Two hundred thousand dollars annually! One's tongue almost utterly refuses to utter it, a sum so worthless, in connexion with an object so magnificent. But on the other hand, the price of earthly ambition, convenience and pleasure, is counted by millions. Navies and armies have their millions—railroads and canals have their millions—colleges and schools have their millions—silks, carpets and mirrors have their millions—tea, coffee, tobacco and rum have their millions—parties of pleasure, and licentiousness in high life and in low life have their millions—and what has the treasury of God and the Lamb to redeem a world of souls from the pains of eternal damnation, and fill them with joy unspeakable? Less than two hundred thousand dollars through the American Board, and some other thousands through other channels. George II. expended in three wars, 157 millions of pounds, and George III. replaced the Bourbons on the throne of France at a cost of above one thousand millions sterling. The revolutionary war cost the United States one hundred and thirty millions of dollars; and intemperance wastes a hundred millions a year; and the great fire in New York destroyed twenty-six millions in a day, the interest of which for twelve months is about equal to the amount expended by the American Board for twenty-five years! And yet the ruins of that conflagration will soon be repaired, and its monument found in the splendid walls now rising from the ashes.

And shall the world be saved with the filings and the dross of the mint; and the old garments men throw from their backs; and the crumbs which fall from their tables? Who that believes that God made the world for Zion, and that the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just; who that is acquainted with the growing resources of America, and the bliss of giving, can subscribe to the sentiment that missions cannot be greatly enlarged for want of money? Who that contemplates the exposure of our American friends to that covetousness which is idolatry, and looks at six hundred millions of heathen idolaters, will not pray that missionary operations may be increased ten thousand times; that the gods of silver and gold in the United States may be employed in the destruction of the gods of wood and stone throughout Satan's dark empire, and that this war among the members of the same household may eventuate in the utter extermination of the whole family of lords many, and gods many, and Jehovah be exalted over all.

Truly, the efforts of modern missions deserve not to be compared with the work yet to be performed; and unless the work be increased to a very great extent, the world cannot be saved. Past and present exertions have lessened but little the great multitude who know not God. This is not saying that nothing has been done. The work of a few has been done. But those abroad have not done and will not do the work of many. Their own individual duty is all they can possibly perform and when they do their utmost, a large territory remains to be possessed by the whole army of God. Canaan was large enough for the twelve spies and the ten thousands of Israel also. Jericho was not subdued when Rahab was gained by the mission of two pioneers. The antediluvians could not be saved in one ark, if its doors had been open to all nor were they all drowned by an ordinary shower of rain. The world will not be covered with the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the seas, until the men to publish that word, are scattered like rain on all the earth. So long as they remain together, like water in a lake, so long the moral world will be desolate. They must go everywhere; and if the expansive warmth of benevolence will not separate them, and they raise and go on the wings of the wind, God will break up the fountains of the great deep of society, and by dashing the parts together, like ocean in its turmoil, or Niagara on its fall, cover the heavens with showers, and set the bow of hope for the nations; and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose. God is too good to suffer either Amazon or Superior to lie still and become corrupt, and the heavens in consequence to be brass and the earth iron. God is too benevolent also in the arrangements of the moral world, to allow his people to lie inactive; to have here a continuing city while the heathen are dying. The churches cannot afford to convert the world with fifty men and a handful of money. It would be as disastrous to the churches in their present state, as for men to obtain a livelihood without labour. Missions must remove the wealth of America, lest the people die under its pressure. They must rise up and act, or they will perish with very fatness. The ministers must equip for the foreign war, or they will contend with each other, and scenes of folly and shame will distress angels, and mar the beauty, and eat like canker the bosom of Zion.

Brethren and fathers,—the word of God, and the works of God and the providence of God, sound the alarm in the churches, calling them to the holy war, for unto them as a body is committed the conversion of the world. It cannot be done by a few hundred missionaries and a fraction of wealth. NO, NEVER.

BRIEF PAPERS ON INDIA.—SCRAP NO. III.

Having, in two brief papers, referred to the different appellations of this country, the name of the very peculiar people that at present constitute its chief inhabitants, and to its national boundaries, the objects that would naturally follow are, its climate, soil, productions, &c., but as my design, in these short scraps, is to discuss the character, customs, &c., of the Hindus, I proceed at once to a brief notice of their early history.

Who are the Hindus? From whence came they? When did they emigrate thither? By what means did they possess themselves of this country? As the Hindus themselves have scarcely a single historical statement on record that can be relied on these questions cannot now be satisfactorily answered; and, in all probability, this must for ever remain the case.

That the Hindus are a different people from the aborigines of this country, is quite evident. The barbarous, I might almost say the savage, tribes found in the mountains of India, and in the low castes of the plains, are doubtless the descendants of a people who occupied this country prior to the appearance of the Hindus. In a future paper I hope to give an account of the aborigines of India.

I suppose it is agreed, on all hands, that the Hindus are one of the most ancient nations on earth, and that they had made considerable progress in civilization and in science some centuries prior to the Christian era, is undisputed; but these facts by no means serve as a data by which we may learn the period of their arrival in India. There is good authority for the statement, that the religion of the Hindus was propagated in this country since the Christian era. At the time of Alexander's invasion of India, as mentioned by Arrian and other early writers, the prevailing religion was Buddhism and not Brahminism; and this state of things continued for several centuries. There are other historical facts which lead to the conclusion that Brahminism is not of so old a date as Christianity. Whence it seems probable that, less than two thousand years ago, the Hindus were foreigners in the country where, according to their own account, they have held undisputed sway for thousands of ages.*

Some have supposed that the Hindus, the Brahmins at least, may have come from Egypt. There certainly are some points of resemblance between the Indian priests and the ancient Egyptians. From Genesis xliii. 32, we learn that the Egyptians, like the Hindus of the present day, were strict observers of caste. With the Hindus, as with the Egyptians, the bull is an object of the highest veneration. The brahman receives the honorary title of Misraim, the very name by which Egypt is known in India and in all the east. Other points of resemblance might be mentioned. Notwithstanding, I think there is far more probability that the Hindus, as some of our best writers on India suggest, came from some portion of central Asia, perhaps from the neighbourhood of the Caspian sea. The Persian and other languages of central Asia have numbers of terms in common with the

* The Hindus gravely tell us, and some of the wise men of Europe have believed them, that two lines of their former kings, namely, those of the sun and moon, swayed an undisputed sceptre over India during the whole of the dwafrar yug, brazen age, 864,000! An excellent account of the mythology of the Hindus is given in The History of India, in Harper's Family Library, ii. 48.

Sanscrit, the sacred language of the Hindus. This is not the case with the Coptic, the modern language of Egypt, which in all probability, bears a strong affinity to the ancient language of that country. Thus presumptive evidence is afforded for the position that the Hindus came from some portion of central Asia, and not from Egypt. Besides, the features of the Hindu countenance are nearly Caucasian.

There is every reason to believe that the Hindus possessed themselves of India as the Mahomedans and English have since done—that is, by conquest. I believe that our best writers on Indian history are agreed that the worshippers of Brahma, Siva, and Vishnu waged a war of extermination against the Buddhists in the early centuries of the Christian era, and that multitudes of the latter were obliged to flee to other countries to escape the slaughtering sword of their conquerors. It may therefore be reasonably inferred, that the Hindus possessed themselves of India in the manner just mentioned. At the present time, a few individuals of a sect called Jain, evidently remnants of the Buddhists, are here and there to be found throughout India. It may be worth mentioning here that India is considered, on all hands, to be the birth-place of Buddhism.

Brahminism, with all its horrid rites, its debasing, demoralizing rites, has thus been introduced into India. What then, even in a human point of view, should hinder the religion of Jesus from being propagated here? When the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea, shall not India cast her idols to the moles and to the bats, worship only the true Swaim-bhu, the self-existent God?

Just as our last No. was issuing from the press we received the following interesting communications from India. We hope they will be read with attention; but especially would we call the notice of our readers to the extract from the Journal of one of the native assistants. How delightful is it to find an individual who, but a few years ago, was involved in all the errors and debasing superstitions of heathenism, in its most unholy forms, now announcing salvation by the only Redeemer, to his benighted countrymen! We should regard this as an evidence that we have not run in vain, nor laboured in vain, and feel encouraged to continue and increase our exertions.

EXTRACT OF A LETTER FROM REV. J. CALDWELL, DATED,

Saharanpur, March 6, 1847.

MY DEAR BROTHER,—I have barely time to-day to write you a line or two in reply to your kind and welcome letter of 29th November 1847, which came to hand some two weeks since. I should, my brother, write you a long epistle, giving an account of matters in detail, at this station, but as to-day is the last opportunity for the overland mail, for this month, and the hour for its closing draws near, I must content myself with a hasty note. I hope to write by next month's mail.

The enclosed scrap,* is like its predecessors. If it serves the purpose of drawing attention to India and the Hindus, my object will be accomplished.

By next mail, among other matters, I hope to send you some extracts from my journal, and some also from the journals of our catechists.

* The third of a series of papers on India, published in our present No.

I am glad to learn that we are to have a re-enforcement to our mission here, from our own church. May the Lord bring them hither in safety.

Mr. Jamieson, who is now on his way hither, and is expected in a few days, will be associated with me at this station, until the re-enforcement from our own church arrives.

I am thankful to state, that my family and self, with the exception of our youngest child, are quite well. All our native brethren, too, are in good health.

My hands, at present, are more than full. Besides the ordinary duties of the station, I have the superintendence of the building of our new church, which, I hope, will be finished this year. Every afternoon in the week, except Sabbath, is spent by the catechists in addressing the people, and in three different places at the same time. In this I join them as often as I possibly can. I am thankful to state that I am now able to preach in the native language with some degree of fluency.

Mrs. C. joins me in Christian regards to you. Please give affectionate regards to all friends in Philadelphia. The enclosed please forward to Mr. Campbell. Your fellow labourer in Christ,
J. CALDWELL.

P. S.—The enclosed is an extract or two which one of the catechists has made from his journal. I send it just as he handed it this moment to me.

EXTRACTS FROM THE JOURNAL OF A NATIVE ASSISTANT.

February 7th, 1848.—Went to Moregunj bridge; asked a person What regeneration meant? He gave no right answer; therefore I was obliged to explain. Afterward, read from a Hindu tract about the judgment day, which related that every person will go to hell or heaven, according to their desert. While I was engaged in addressing people, an old Hindu Sipai said, that both hell and heaven are upon this very earth! I asked, how? He replied, that murderers are hanged, and that thieves are kept in a jail house. I asked him again, Where are we to find the punishment for those whose murder, theft, and every evil work are concealed. He was silent, but another, a mussulman, replied that they will be punished by God himself. Another requested to hear something about the creation of the world. I told him what was written in the book of Genesis. He said, it agrees almost in every particular with the Koran. Another mussulman declared, that Christians do not observe the religion of Christ, but receive what is taught by Satan, who came to them in Christ's form. I spoke to those who were present: You know that Satan is the bitterest foe both of God and man, and it never can be expected that he will teach any thing which is good, but all contrary to it, for he is the author of sin. Every one exclaimed, This is all right. I said to them, it is written in the New Testament, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind." I asked, Is this the command of Satan? He replied, No.

February 8th.—Went to Moregunj. There was a cow where I wished to stand: in order to make room, I pushed the cow with my staff. A mussulman who was standing by, exclaimed, Do not push her, for she has a soul like you! I told him, that there is a great difference between her soul and our soul. Our soul is immortal, but her soul is mortal; for us is prepared heaven or hell, but for her is none of these. He said, cow is a clean animal, and afterward it goes to heaven. I inquired, which animals are clean, and which unclean? Answered, swine is an unclean animal. I asked if the camel was clean, for where God said that the swine is unclean, in the same place He proclaimed camel to be unclean? still you eat the one and leave the other while they are both equally unclean in the sight of God! Afterwards another mussulman asked me of what sect I was before? Gave no answer, but asked him to tell what was the religion of their forefathers? He was quiet: but some boys came forward, and one asked, What was the religion of Adam? and another inquired, who was made first? I entreated them to ask one by one; then I will answer your questions; in such haste and tumult you cannot hear me, nor I can you. Now came a mussulman, and said, O ye mussulmans, why are ye standing and hearing him? by hearing him you are made sinners. At this time most of them went away, but for those who were left behind I read the eighth chapter of Matthew.

Went to Nahhasa, and commenced to read Dr. Wilson on Hinduism. By and by came a Hindu, who heard me with attention, but said nothing. After, came some mussulmans. I read for them the third chapter of Romans, which shows that there is none righteous, no, not one. They heard me for some time. One of them went away declaring that God is the author of both sin and good, but the others were confessing that Satan is the author of sin, and God of good. An old mussulman said to me, that all his goods and money were plundered, and he did not know where to find bread. I told him that I do not know any such place, where he is to find bread for his body, but know a place where he will get the bread of eternal life. He inquired, Where is the place? I told him that Jesus is the true bread of life, by feeding upon him we shall never die. He asked again, Is not the Koran the word of God? I told him that there are some good things in it, which agree with the Bible, and we observe them as the word of God; but the rest, we do not observe them, nor know them as the word of God. For instance, Koran and Hindus impute sin to God. This never can be the word of God. Another person requested to hear something about Christ, which was readily done. Then came Mr. Coleman from Moregunj, and talked with the people.

Ecclesiastical Proceedings.

Meeting of Presbytery.—The Northern Reformed Presbytery met, in regular session, in Dr. McLeod's church, New York, April 21st, 1848. Among the items of business transacted were the following:

New Church in Brooklyn.—The committee appointed at the last meeting, in answer to the petition of sixty-two individuals for an organization in the city of Brooklyn, reported, that the organization had been completed according to the due order. The members had been admitted, three ruling elders ordained, and a call for a pastor moderated. The elders are Messrs. Thomas McBurney, James Smith, and Robert Boggs. The call was addressed to Mr. David J. Patterson, licentiate. It was sustained and presented to him, and, being accepted, Tuesday, 25th instant, was appointed for his ordination and installation, should the way be found clear.

Reports of Domestic Missionaries.—Mr. D. J. Patterson reported three months' service in Brooklyn, and Mr. David M'Alcese visitations and supplies to Redfield, Lisbon, Ryegate, &c., &c., in which latter place he had remained for three months—the congregation being desirous for a pastoral settlement. The reports were highly encouraging. Presbytery directed the per diem allowed, to be paid to the domestic missionaries.

Church Extension Fund.—Presbytery resolved to increase their domestic missionary and church extension fund by at least one hundred and fifty dollars for the next year, and directed that collections be taken up for this purpose in all the congregations in their bounds, on the first and second Sabbaths of May ensuing.

Reception of Rev. Alexander Clarke and his People.—A petition from Rev. Alexander Clarke, of Amherst, Nova Scotia, was presented and read. The following are extracts from the paper:

To the Moderator and remanent members of the Northern Presbytery, in connexion with the Reformed Presbyterian Synod of North America,

The petition of Alexander Clarke of Amherst, Nova Scotia, Humbly Showeth, That, twenty years ago, petitioner was sent out as a missionary to these provinces by the Reformed Presbyterian Synod of Ireland,—that in the present field of his labour, petitioner found but one professed Covenanter,—that there was not a Presbyterian house of worship in the two counties in which petitioner's circuit lies, nor any suitable place for preaching, at all,—that there were but few of the Presbyterian name, and those, in many instances, unworthy of even the name,—that now there are many stations, four houses of worship, a fifth in progress, other places of accommodation, and nearly two hundred communicants,—that in view of these facts, and aware that petitioner stands alone, others wish to press into the field, that without immediate help no one man, in these shaking times, can hold these many posts together,— . . . And that as petitioner's views of public policy are in accordance with those of your reverend body,—Therefore petitioner earnestly prays that you will, without delay, take him into your connexion, under your protection, and send him some assistance. And petitioner hereby promises, to follow no divisive courses, but to yield all due submission in the Lord. And petitioner, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c., &c.

ALEXANDER CLARKE.

Amherst, 2d February, 1848.

After due deliberation, Presbytery passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That Rev. Alexander Clarke be admitted a member of this Presbytery on the ground of his own application, as a minister of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, of unimpeached character and standing.

Resolved, That this Presbytery deeply sympathize with Mr. Clarke and his people, in the peculiar and trying circumstances of their case, and that they will send them ministerial aid as soon as that can be procured.

Resolved, That a committee of Presbytery be appointed to ascertain whether any student of theology, ready for licensure, or licensed preacher of the church, can be procured for the Nova Scotia mission, and that, if a suitable person can be obtained, the committee may request the Moderator to call an extra meeting of Presbytery, for the licensure and ordination of such person.

At a subsequent session, the following paper, from Mr. Henry Gordon, student of the third year, was handed in to Presbytery:

To the Northern Presbytery of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, of North America, now in session,

SIRS,—Understanding that a missionary for the province of Nova Scotia, North America, is now wanted, and that application has been made to you, as a Pres-tytery, for such aid, and hearing myself also of the Macedonian cry from that quarter, (come over and help us!) I therefore most cheerfully and devotedly offer myself to you, as willing to go and labour in that field, whenever you may think it proper to send me, and subscribe myself, yours respectfully, H. GORDON.

Presbytery disposed of the above paper by the following resolutions:

Resolved, 1. That the offer of Mr. Henry Gordon be accepted.

Resolved, 2. That a committee of Presbytery be appointed to assign to Mr. Gordon the ordinary trials for licensure, and that if he be found qualified, they proceed to license him in due season to preach the gospel, and send him to the aid of the Nova Scotia mission.

Resolved, 3. That any two ministers of the Presbytery, with ruling elders, may be a commission, to meet in Nova Scotia, between this and the next regular meeting of Presbytery, for the purpose of ordaining Mr. Gordon to the ministry, if deemed proper, and attending to such other business respecting the church in that locality as may come properly before them.

Ordination of Mr. Patterson.—On Tuesday, 25th April, Presbytery met in the city of Brooklyn, and ordained to the ministry Mr. David J. Patterson, installing him pastor of the First Reformed Presbyterian Church there. Presbytery then adjourned to meet in Dr. McLeod's church, New York, on the second Tuesday of October, 1848, at 10 o'clock, A. M.

Licensure of Mr. Gordon.—On Tuesday, May 16th, Mr. Henry Gordon was licensed to preach the gospel by the Northern Reformed Presbytery. Mr. Gordon had previously delivered all the usual pieces of trial, and passed, with great acceptance, the regular examinations. He goes to Nova Scotia, we understand, in a few weeks. May the blessing of the Head of the church attend upon him.

From the preceding statements, it will be seen that a highly prosperous state of things now exists within the boundaries of the Northern Presbytery. There is no part of our church which is called upon from time to time to make such large contributions of members to other parts of the body, as have been required from her for years past. Being immediately upon the Atlantic coast, she is continually passing through her bounds the emigrants who seek a home among us, and whose stay is frequently but short. And her country congregations have been almost depopulated by removals to the less expensive lands, and less densely populated regions of the great west. We have heard the pastor of the New York congregation observe, that he could travel to the Mississippi, and be almost every night, if necessary, in the houses of persons who had, at some period, been in connexion with his own church. While, however, the church in the north has suffered largely from removals, she has been not only holding her own, but steadily increasing, and the last year has been marked as one of peculiar revival to her interests. The vacancies, many of which had suffered long from inadequate supplies, have been encouraged and built up; new congregations have been organized, and the missionary field has been more thoroughly cultivated, and yielded larger fruits than at any former period. At all this the friends of the Reformed Presbyterian cause, every where, will rejoice. The work is God's, and his servants may rest satisfied that he is their helper. The church is one, and her heart is one, though its pulsations send the vital streams to the utmost extremities of the body. The brethren in Nova Scotia are, we think, where they ought to be. They are geographically within the boundaries of the Northern Presbytery; their ecclesiastical sympathies are decidedly with the church in the United States, and they are far more accessible to us than to the trans-Atlantic brethren. Halifax is within forty-eight hours' sail of New York; and about the same time and expense that would be required for a journey from New York to Pittsburgh, could avail for a visit to Amherst and its vicinage. The excellent brother who has been labouring so long alone, to the good people there, desires such a coadjutor as we doubt not he will find in the person of the excellent young friend whom it is proposed to send him. We commend the subject to the regards of the church.

ORDINATION OF MR. JOHN SIMMS WOODSIDE.

In view of Mr. Woodside's departure to India, a special meeting of the Philadelphia Reformed Presbytery was held on Tuesday, June 20th, for the purpose of making arrangements in reference to his ordination as a minister of the Gospel. Mr. Woodside having delivered with approbation a piece of trial, his ordination took place on the evening of the day mentioned. The Rev. Dr. Wylie preached the sermon, selecting as his text, Jonah iii. 2. "Arise, go to Nineveh, that great city, and preach unto it the preaching that I bid thee." His discourse, which was very instructive and interesting, had especial reference to Mr. Woodside's expected mission to the heathen. Having been written in Phonographic characters, by Mr. John G. M'Vickar, we have been favoured with a report of it as it was spoken, and we hope to publish the whole, or such extracts as our limited space will permit. The usual questions having been proposed by Rev. Dr. Crawford, a solemn and impressive ordaining prayer was offered by Rev. James R. Campbell, after which an address to the newly consecrated minister was made by Rev. R. J. Black, in which he adverted in an eloquent manner to the trials and difficulties which a missionary might expect to encounter, the duties he would be called on to discharge, and the support on which alone he could depend. The concluding prayer having been made by the Moderator of Presbytery, after singing, the congregation was dismissed with the apostolic benediction, pronounced by Rev. John S. Woodside.

The whole services of the evening were of a very interesting character; and it is hoped that a favourable impression has been made, both in behalf of sound gospel order in the Church of God, and in support of proper efforts made to extend the knowledge of Messiah's name among the heathen.

REPORT OF A MISSIONARY TOUR IN THE UNITED STATES.

Rev. Mr. Campbell having been appointed by the Board of Missions of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, to act as their agent during his visit to this country, on his return to this city presented the following report of his labours, which shows how well he has performed the duties assigned to him.

Philadelphia, June 13, 1848.

To the Board of Missions of the Reformed Presbyterian Church:

DEAR BRETHREN,—Having now returned to this place after a long journey to the West, in discharge of the duties which you appointed me as an agent of the Board to our Churches, I beg to lay before you a report of my proceedings.

At the very commencement of my labours, I was greatly encouraged and animated, and led to hope for complete success in the enterprise, in consequence of one benevolent friend in our church coming forward and voluntarily offering, that in case the two young men were sent to India by our church, he would pay the sum of five hundred dollars towards their outfit, and six hundred dollars per annum for their support in India. This sum of six hundred dollars a year being the entire amount required from us by the Board of Foreign Missions in New York, for the support of one Missionary, it then seemed reasonable to hope that the remaining part of the outfit, and the salary of one additional missionary would be furnished by the whole church, when the state of the heathen and the openings that Providence has made for the spread of the gospel among them, would be fairly and fully presented, and especially as taking the whole number of communicants in our churches at 4000; the additional sum to be contributed by each for this purpose would be only 15 cents per year. The result of this agency shows that our expectations, however sanguine they may have seemed, were not without foundation.

You are aware that the first three months of the winter were spent chiefly in Philadelphia and New York. During that period, however, at the request of Mr. Lowrie, the Secretary of the Presbyterian Board, I spent several sabbaths among the churches in Westchester county, New York. I also visited some Presbyterian churches in Eastern Pennsylvania; and in all these places brought the missionary subject before large assemblies, whose contributions to the Board they are pledged to support, it is hoped will be more liberal than formerly. On the second of March, I commenced my journey to the far West, and have had the pleasure of visiting all the settled congregations in our connexion, as well as many of the vacancies. During my tour West, I also had the happiness of attending two Presbyteries and four communion seasons, and of meeting all my appointments at the very time previously specified. Indeed a kind Providence seemed to favour the undertaking, and in many ways to render my journey propitious. We have certainly much cause to thank God, and to take courage for the future.

The following are the amounts subscribed in my book, and much of which has been collected :*

To be received from the third church in Pittsburg, (the late Rev. Mr. Ewing's,) say $150. It was also expected that in some instances considerable sums would be received beyond what was subscribed at the time, so that we may hope that, when all comes in, the sum will be over $5000. It should be remembered that several congregations in the East have as yet done nothing, and that both in Dr. Wylie's and Dr. M'Leod's congregations, the people, as a whole, have not yet been called upon.

In discharge of my duties as your agent, I have travelled in the East 760 miles, and in the Western States 3940 miles; making, together, 4700 miles, and all at an expense for public conveyances, &c., of $116,-83. Altogether, I have preached and lectured on Missions 74 times, besides sermons on other subjects, addresses to sabbath schools, Theological Seminaries and Colleges, and many of these lectures were more than three hours in length.

I cannot close this report without expressing thanks to Him, who, while I have in his providence been called for a time from my chosen field of labour among the heathen in India, has given me so good an opportunity of promoting the missionary cause while sojourning among friends in this Christian land; has granted protection during my journeys, and bestowed so large a share of health and strength for the discharge of important duties that have devolved upon me. If any good has been done, all the praise belongs to God alone. That I have done so little to promote his glory, and the interests of his kingdom in heathen lands, and that I have not improved to better account, the opportunities I have enjoyed of doing good, of extending a deeper religious influence around, and of receiving good of a spiritual kind during my intercourse with dear and excellent Christian brethren and friends, ought to be a cause of deep humiliation on my own part. I have been most warmly and kindly received by all the ministerial brethren, and by all the members of our churches wherever I have gone. With regard to some of them, old acquaintances and friendships were renewed and strengthened. As to others, whose faces I had not before seen, I seemed as a friend with whom they were familiar, as unknown and yet well known. To one and all, I take this opportunity of returning my sincere thanks for the kind reception they gave me—for the sentiments of affection and respect they expressed to myself personally, and, above all, for the deep interest they have manifested in the cause of missions to the heathen. It is this that cheers me, and it will encourage and sustain me in labours to promote the gospel in far distant climes. I am fully convinced, from what I have seen, that there is sufficient Christian principle and missionary feeling among the members of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, not only to sustain the work on the scale at present contemplated, but to extend it far beyond our most sanguine expectations. In order to do this, every member of the church, and particularly the young, should be put in possession, regularly, of missionary intelligence; the duty of all to comply with the divine command, according to their ability, in sending the gospel to the heathen, should be brought to bear upon their enlightened consciences, in the ministrations of the sanctuary; all should be required to aid systematically in this, and every cause of benevolence, something on the plan suggested in the April number of the Banner; and above all, and associated with all attempts to extend the kingdom of Christ, prayer, in monthly concerts, and at all other times, should be offered, and then we might reasonably expect the success which all desire.

With great respect, dear Brethren, I remain yours in the furtherance of the gospel.

J. R. CAMPBELL.

REPORT OF A VISIT TO THE IRISH REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

At a recent meeting of the Executive Committee of the Board of Missions of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, Mr. John S. Woodside gave an interesting account of a recent visit to his native land, made in anticipation of his expected departure to India as a missionary. He was desired to furnish a report, in writing, to be published in the Banner. It will be found below, and we are sure its perusal will increase the interest which our readers have, no doubt, already begun to feel towards a brother who is expected shortly to act as one of their representatives to the heathen world. The view it presents of the Irish Reformed Presbyterian Church is very pleasing, and we trust the American churches will give all the encouragement which they can afford to those to whom we owe so much, and who are so nobly endeavouring to sustain themselves.

To the Executive Committee of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Reformed Presbyterian Church:

GENTLEMEN,—Having obtained permission from the Professors in the Theological Seminary, to revisit my friends and native land previously to my departure for India, I sailed from New York for England on the last day of February, and arrived again in Philadelphia on the last day of May, having accomplished my entire journey within three months. It would be altogether irrelevant to enter into a lengthened detail of all my public operations during that period. A very brief statement of the manner in which my time was spent, with a few observations upon the condition and relations of the Irish church, will suffice.

Of the above-mentioned time one month was spent on my voyages outward and home; fifty days in Ireland, and the remainder in England, except the time spent in crossing and recrossing the channel. Aware of your desire that I should see as many of the churches as possible during my visit, I entered upon the performance of that duty immediately after my arrival. On the 29th of March I attended a meeting of the Belfast Presbytery, where I met with a most cordial reception, and was taken under their direction during my stay in the country. Presbytery having learned that I was to remain with them but a short time, made prompt arrangements by which I should be enabled to accomplish all that I proposed. I was thus allowed free access to all their pulpits, and invited to co-operate with them in advocating the schemes of their own church. Being provided with ample sources of information relative to the situation of the various evangelical churches in this country, I endeavoured to bring before the various congregations which I was privileged to address, the state of the missionary operations of the American churches, both at home and abroad. This, with the regular preaching of the gospel, and co-operation with the friends of temperance and Sabbath schools, was the chief public business to which I attended.

In performing this work, both by sermons and addresses, I was engaged publicly twenty-eight times in Ireland, and twice in England. On all these occasions the warmest interest was manifested in the subjects presented, and every where I received the kindest assistance from the ministers with whom I associated. I was delighted to find that all our ministers, and many of the people there were intimately acquainted with the condition of our India mission. This was owing to the interesting lectures which Mr. Campbell had delivered in their several churches during last year. Every person with whom I conversed on the subject spoke in terms of the warmest approbation of these lectures, and not less so of their distinguished author. Their interest in the India mission has not been confined to mere words. Some of them have contributed to its support, and it is proposed to do still more by an annual contribution from all their churches. The circumstances of their own church at the present time demand, on their part, the most strenuous exertions. Beset with difficulties on all hands; suffering under the severe pressure of the times; thinned by an unceasing tide of emigration to this country, and bleeding under the scourge of affliction in the recent removal, by death, of one of their best ministers—the Rev. Dr. Paul, they are nobly contending “for the faith once delivered to the saints,” they are exhibiting a bold testimony against the prevalent errors of the surrounding churches, and exemplifying in their conduct, the great truth which Christians in the British isles have been so long in learning, namely, That the gospel church is a self-supporting establishment,—that she does not require a corrupting alliance with an unholy civil government to secure her permanence,—that the principle of state endowments, by which the British government secures the loyalty of a servile church, is utterly repugnant to the genuine spirit of Christianity,—that free, voluntary contributions towards the support of the gospel, form the only just and scriptural means whereby the cause of the Redeemer is to be sustained and extended. In the maintenance of these principles the brethren in Ireland have adopted and acted up to the old theory, that “Example is better than precept.” They have abandoned every thing in the form of compulsion, in requiring contributions to the church. They have given up entirely the system of renting pews in churches, and depend altogether upon the free action of the individual for the amount which he may be disposed to give. They have adopted the sustentation scheme of the Free Church of Scotland—a scheme which completely recognises the free agency of the people. Various subordinate agencies are connected with this scheme; and so successful has been the experiment, that in a year of unexampled want and distress in Ireland, they have nearly doubled their former annual contributions. The greatest unanimity and harmony of co-operation exist through all parts of the church. If unity be a distinguishing characteristic of the true church, and if love to the brethren be a token of spiritual life, I think I could distinguish both these features in our Irish brethren. But, with all these things in her favour, the position of the church in Ireland is, at the present moment, extremely critical. Existing under a government utterly hostile to the free principles which she inculcates; taxed for the support of corrupt establishments and state-endowed churches; and losing, by emigration, many of her most active members, her resources seem almost drained. Notwithstanding all these things, the native power of Christian principle has hitherto sustained her in every emergency, and I trust that ere long some of the influences which have so long encumbered the progress of reformation principles in the British isles will be removed, and then shall the church shine forth “fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners.”

A word as to our own relation to the Reformed Presbyterian Church in Ireland. I think we are her debtors. We receive her ministers, we receive her people; thus what is loss to her is gain to us. But were there no bond of this kind by which to unite us, we are still bound to her by other and higher ties. She exhibits the same gospel. The same great principles of civil and religious liberty for which we contend are dear to her, and have always found their ablest defenders in her ranks. She is as completely identified with us as it is possible she could be, considering the relative circumstances of the two churches. Hence her interests are more allied to ours than those of any other section of the Christian church in the British isles, and should it ever be necessary, (as it may soon be,) that a call should be made upon the American church on her behalf, I am sure it will meet with a response worthy of our people.

Before concluding, I would express my grateful sense of the kindness and marks of Christian affection which I received at the hands of the Irish brethren. The tokens of personal friendship I received, together with the warm interest manifested in the American Church and her missionary operations, I cannot soon forget. They impose upon me increased obligation to be diligent in carrying out the cause which they and you have so long and so nobly sustained.

JOHN S. WOODSIDE.

June 19th, 1848.

LATE MEETING OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF THE BOARD OF MISSIONS OF THE REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

Shortly after the return of Rev. Mr. Campbell from his visit to the American churches, as the Agent of the Board, the Executive Committee held a meeting, for the purpose of receiving his report, and of forming a decision in regard to sending out the contemplated reinforcement to India. It will be recollected that the Synod, at its last meeting, authorized the Board, acting by its Executive Committee, to send out Messrs. Hill and Woodside, if it should be ascertained that the church was able and willing to sustain them. As this point could be satisfactorily determined only by a general investigation of the state of feeling on the subject throughout the entire church, the Committee refrained from any action of a decisive character until Mr. Campbell's tour should have been completed, and his report received. Being now presented, it appeared that he had visited all the settled congregations and many of the vacancies, and both in his public addresses and private intercourse had presented the subject to the earnest and conscientious attention of the members of our church. The result was, that the amount needed for the outfit was procured, and that there was reason to believe the annual salaries could also be raised. The committee then proceeded to ascertain the views and wishes of the candidates whose offer of their services had as yet not been definitely acted on. Mr. Woodside, being present, stated, he still desired to devote himself to preaching the gospel among the heathen, and that he felt willing to go out to India as soon as possible. Mr. Hill, by letter, expressed his continued interest in the cause, but desired that his application should not be acted on until there should be some farther expression of the sentiment of the church in regard to his going out. The committee, believing that this delay was not practicable or necessary, resolved to consider Mr. Hill's application as withdrawn, while, at the same time, they expressed great respect for his motives, and a high estimation of his general character. Mr. Woodside's application was accepted, and he was taken under the care of the Board, as a missionary of the Reformed Presbyterian Church. A letter from the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions having been read, by which it appeared that Mr. Woodside would be taken into connexion with that Board, in the same manner as our other missionaries, a committee was appointed to make all necessary arrangements in regard to the entire subject. The Executive Committee then adjourned, to meet at the call of the chairman, Rev. Dr. Wylie.

GENERAL SYNOD OF THE ASSOCIATE REF. SYNOD OF THE WEST.

This body held its 8th annual meeting in Xenia, Ohio, commencing its sessions on May 23d. Measures are proposed for an improved management of Domestic missions; and the foreign missionary station in Syria appears to be adequately sustained, while a new mission is to be commenced in Oregon, Rev. Mr. Blain, who has been appointed to labour in that field, having proceeded as far as St. Louis on his journey. The Basis of Union adopted by the convention which met last September, was "referred to the Presbyteries composing this Synod with instructions to take it into careful, prayerful, and deliberate consideration, and report their judgment, (with the votes by which that judgment shall be expressed,) on the propriety of the Associate Reformed church accepting it as a Basis of Union between the Associate Reformed and Associate churches, and to specify, in case it should be accepted, what alterations and modifications it should undergo before its final adoption." A conference was held with the Associate Synod, at the same time in session at Xenia, at which the following resolution was adopted:

1. Resolved, That as the Churches represented in this Conference are of the same parent stock, so are they substantially one, being united in their faith and practice, and in the main contending for the same peculiarities of faith and practice—that we deplore the divisions which have so long existed between us—that we own the good hand of our God upon us in sustaining our respective bodies, and in enabling us to maintain a testimony to his name—that we rejoice in the indications of a desire, and we trust a growing desire, in both bodies, to come together into one—that united as we are in the great leading principles of Christian doctrines, Church order and worship, we should cherish a spirit of forbearance toward each other, and serious inquiry in relation to those matters by which we have been unhappily separated—and that so far as we have attained we would encourage one another to abide by our common profession, and to endeavour to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace, in hope that He who buildeth up Jerusalem will hasten the day when we shall be visibly one as we are spiritually one in the Lord.

2. Whereas we regard the great difficulty in the way of effecting a union among the Churches represented in this Convention, as arising from the low state of religion among us, giving rise to jealousy, want of confidence in each other, a backwardness to examine into each others' views and explanations respecting the points of difference (real or supposed,) which have kept us apart, as well as hindering the exercise of forbearance with each other—therefore

Resolved, That this Conference most earnestly recommend to their respective synods to take such measures as in their wisdom they may judge most suitable for the promotion and revival of practical vital godliness, that we may hope for the influences of the Holy Spirit to bring us to oneness of faith, and we shall consider the adoption of this recommendation by our respective synods as holding out the best hope and the surest pledge to each other, that we are hearty in desiring a union which may be for the glory of him and the promotion of his cause on earth.

Delegates were appointed to unite in the Convention proposed by the General Assembly, (Old School,) to be held in New York in next October. In an "extra judicial conference on the union," it was resolved, That nothing should be included in the testimony of the United Church in which there is no controversy among those who hold the Westminster confession. Receipts, during the year, for Foreign Missions, $1637 93, Domestic Missions, $1501 34, Oregon Mission, $533 57.

ASSOCIATE SYNOD.

This Synod held its 47th annual meeting in Xenia, Ohio, commencing May 24th. Its action on the Basis of Union will be seen by the following resolution:

"Resolved, That though Synod do not concur in every thing contained in the Basis prepared by the Convention of Reformed Churches, yet we agree to hand it down in overture to presbyteries and sessions under our care, with instructions to report to next Synod whether they are willing to receive it, or, if not, what alterations should be made."

A resolution proposed by Dr. Beveridge declining to transmit it to the lower courts, was lost by a vote of 30 in favour, to 31 against. The general condition of this branch of the church appears to be prosperous. Home Missions are carried on with considerable vigour, and the Foreign mission in Trinidad is to be continued and enlarged. The number of Presbyteries in this denomination is 14, of ministers, 111, of whom 17 are without charge, of licentiates, 10.

The following interesting communication from our respected friend and brother, Rev. J. Nevin, gives a very pleasing account of the death-bed of the venerated and beloved Dr. Paul. How delightful to find that he enjoyed in so abundant a measure the consolations of the Spirit, during his last illness. His case is one in which the promise may be considered as fulfilled, "At evening time it shall be light." We consider it especially instructive, as showing that a public life of earnest, but honest and pure-minded, contending for the truth is not likely to prevent a tranquil and joyful death. The reference in the commencement of the letter, to our young missionary brother, we have reason to believe, is well deserved; in fact it only corresponds with the character he sustained in this country wherever he was known.

EXTRACT FROM A LETTER DATED

Carnaff, Dervock, Ireland, 16th May, 1848.

MY DEAR SIR: * * * * My young friend, John Woodside, who I expect will be the bearer of these lines, during his short stay in Ireland, besides taking to himself a wife, has been making himself as useful as possible by visiting all our congregations, and he has added greatly to the respect in which he has been held. There is reason to hope that he will be a useful labourer in the vineyard of his Master, if he be spared in life.

Amidst the revolutionary convulsions of Europe, and the very great excitement in Ireland, multitudes of topics for the pen of a correspondent present themselves, but there is one event which, as a providential visitation, has been felt far and wide in our own and other churches, to which I cannot but allude. I refer to the death of that great and good man, the Rev. Dr. Paul, of Carrickfergus. I need not tell you that as the champion of civil and religious liberty, he stood foremost in Ireland, in defence of the rights of conscience and of God. The last work from his pen was "A solemn Protest against that infamous system of tyranny and misrule by which one class of men are compelled to pay for the support of another class of men, in opposition to Reason, Conscience, and Religion," a work which has not yet been answered, nor any reply to it yet attempted, so far as I know.

His death occurred on the 16th of March, after an illness of some months. I had the privilege of several conversations with him on his death-bed, and have had my own soul refreshed by his testimony for Christ. Although his illness was occasioned by a paralytic stroke, yet his judgment, and even his memory, were in no apparent degree impaired, and though his tongue faltered a little, his speech was perfectly intelligible. The French Revolution had occurred a few days before my last visit to him. I introduced the subject to him, and he seemed to take a deep interest in it, and said he considered it the downfall of Popery; but his delight was in conversation about Christ, Christian truth and experience. He requested me to repeat to him some of my recent lectures and sermons. He kept his wife and daughters reading the scriptures to him, and he asked frequent questions to encourage them in conversation, and to enable himself and them to feed more on the word of life.

On entering his room on the occasion of my last visit, he expressed his great satisfaction at seeing me. "You do me more honour," said I, "than the Emperor of Russia would do, if he were to send an ambassador to see me, and why? Because you come from a higher court. I look upon you and other Christian friends who visit me as so many ambassadors from the court of heaven, sent to feed me, a weak and unworthy servant, with crumbs." "Yes," said I, "from our Master's table." "True," replied he, "but that is the more honour to you and me."

"It is my wish," said he, "that the friends who remember me in prayer, should join me in returning thanks to the Lord for his goodness to me; and, that you may be able to let them know the ground of my request, I may mention, that whilst I cannot boast of the high-wrought feelings and raptures of some, yet I think I would not be doing justice to myself nor to the Divine Lord and Master, whose I am and whom I serve, if I were to hide it, that I do enjoy a good hope through grace, and that as my afflictions have abounded, so has my consolation. The Apostle says, 'The sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us.' I would go farther than the Apostle, and would say, That the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared even with the enjoyment of this present time. I think it God's usual plan to compensate for the afflictions of his people by abounding consolation, and I have felt more consolations far more than a compensation for my afflictions. Were I to be restored to health and strength again, on condition of losing my present enjoyments, I would not choose it. My experience has been that of the disciples on the Mount of Transfiguration, 'Lord, it is good for me to be here;' and, like the disciples going to Emmaus, 'My heart has burned within me,' while in converse with my Redeemer. I have often considered myself as already in heaven, and have felt as if this room were a corner of heaven."

When he was informed that some of his brethren, from whom he was separated for years, and for some of whom he had no reason to feign respect, were inquiring anxiously for him, he was much gratified, and desired them to know that he loved them, and that no act of Synod or Presbytery would ever make him cease to love them, and he added, "consider it a proof that I have passed from death unto life, because I love the brethren."

You will not be surprised to hear, after the above statements, that when on a previous occasion I was leaving him to meet his congregation, having asked him if he had any message to send to them, he replied, "Tell them I never felt happier in my life than since I have been confined to bed."

He continued in this happy, heavenly frame of mind until his death. He appeared to suffer but little bodily pain, and calmly and without struggle, fell asleep in Jesus.

Thus died Dr. Paul, a man who has, more than any, in recent times in this country, contributed, by his pen, to check the progress of the Arian heresy, and to promote correct views on civil and religious liberty. "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace." With best respects I remain, my dear sir,

Yours, truly,

JOHN NEVIN

RECENT ANNIVERSARIES.

THE AMERICAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.—The twenty-fourth anniversary of this useful institution was held in Philadelphia, on the 6th of May. During the past year its receipts were $137,468,19, and its expenditures $137,296,60. In seventeen different states and territories, there were employed, at an expense of $11,894,04, forty-three missionary colporteurs, by whom 770 new schools were established—over 1,000 others, embracing 11,004 teachers, and 81,808 scholars, were visited and revived—and nearly $15,000 worth of religious books was distributed for children and youth. Eighty-three new publications, containing nearly 10,000 pages of new reading matter, were issued; of which publications fifty-three were written for the society. Over 150,000 numbers of the Youth's Penny Gazette were published and circulated monthly, or more than 2,000,000 of numbers in the year. Truly this institution cultivates a large field, and in an effective way.

AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY.—The receipts of last year amounted to $254,337,18; being an increase of $49,308,95 over those of the previous year. The society has circulated during the year, 655,066 Bibles and Testaments. This is an increase of 28,196 copies over the circulation of the year previous, and making the total circulation of the society, since its organization, amount to 5,780,095 copies.

AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY.—New publications 63, of which 19 are volumes, making the whole number 1313, of which 231 are volumes: sanctioned for publication abroad, 2303, in about 100 languages and dialects. Circulated, 693,303 volumes, 6,957,262 publications, 211,730,285 pages. Christian Almanac, 128,000; American Messenger, upwards of 100,000 monthly. Gratuitous distribution, in 72 distinct grants, for foreign missionaries, the army and navy, seamen's chaplains, shipping, lakes, rivers, canals, home and domestic missionaries, Sabbath schools, &c., including tracts drawn by life members, 40,948,459 pages; value, $7,000. Receipts, $237,296,04; of which $129,744,31 for sales, and $105,905,15 for donations, including $32,912,76 for colportage, and $12,804,88 legacies. Expenditures—total expenditure $237,155,95. Balance in the treasury, $140,09.

AMERICAN HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—The number of ministers of the gospel in the service of the society, the past year, was 1006, in 27 different states and territories. The number of congregations supplied, in whole or in part, was 1447. The aggregate of labour performed is equal to 773 years. The pupils in Sabbath schools and Bible classes, number 77,000; subscribers to the temperance pledge, 9,000. There have been added to the churches 5020 persons: by profession, 1330; by letter, 2490. More evident tokens of the presence of the Holy Spirit with the missionary churches have been enjoyed than for five years previous. Ninety-six congregations have been favoured with revivals, some of them of great interest and power, and characterized by deep solemnity and stillness. In each, from 8 to 60, and in one case 90 hopeful subjects of converting grace have been reported. The number of supposed conversions, as far as reported, has been 521. In several instances the good work is still in progress. Resources.—Balance, April 1, 1847, $232,70. The receipts of twelve months following, $140,197,10—making the resources of the year, $140,497,89. Liabilities of the society for the year, $148,768,30. Payments, $139,233,34.

FOREIGN EVANGELICAL SOCIETY.—From the report read by the secretary, the Rev. Dr. Baird, it appeared that the receipts of the last year were $19,488. The expenditures were $18,445; namely, for the work in Europe, [chiefly in France.] $11,340; the remainder in efforts to benefit the Roman Catholics in Canada, Spanish America, and other papal regions. The report first gave a brief survey of the society's operations in Canada, New Orleans, Mexico, St. Domingo and South America. The views it gave on the possibility of introducing the scriptures into the Spanish and other papal parts of this hemisphere, were very encouraging. The one was fully come, especially for the great, good work of carrying the scriptures to Mexico and South America. The report next spoke of the society's operations in Europe—Russia, Poland, Sweden, Ireland, France, Belgium and Italy. France has been the theatre of its greatest labours. There the recent success of the labours of colporteurs, evangelists, and ordained preachers, has been wonderful. The new openings in Italy for the Bible were stated to be highly encouraging. The recent revolution in France has broken down every barrier which impeded the work under the late government; and the movement now agitating Europe its centre is destined to open the way for the gospel wherever it is felt. The work now to be done in France, it appears, is immense, and that the help of Protestant Christians in this land is greatly needed by the brethren in that country, who, like all other classes, are suffering from the universal prostration of business, and the ruin of capitalists.

PRESBYTERIAN BOARD OF EDUCATION.—The number of candidates on the roll during the year was 377. The amount of funds collected during the year was $31,078.36, making, with the balance of last year, the total amount of available funds $38,296.90. The number of candidates was 26 less than it was last year.

PRESBYTERIAN BOARD OF DOMESTIC MISSIONS.—The number of missionaries in commission during the year has been 460. More than 1200 congregations and missionary stations have been supplied with the gospel by the missionaries. The missionaries have laboured in 25 of our states. Much itinerant labour has been performed, and precious fruit has been reaped. There has been added to the churches, so far as reported on examination, about 2000 members; by certificates 1500. Sixty new churches have been organized, and about 100 church edifices have been built or finished. The number of Sabbath schools reported as in actual operation, exceeds 700, with more than 5000 teachers, and 3000 children; and addition not less than 500 Bible and catechetical classes. Funds.—The whole amount of funds at the disposal of the board during the year, has been $67,922.00. The balance on hand at the close of the year is not far from $9,000. Church Extension.—During the year, appropriations have been made to aid 52 congregations in building or in finishing houses of worship; and, in addition, six congregations have been aided in relieving themselves from long standing and oppressive debts, making the whole number of congregations aided 58. The congregations aided are in 18 of our states. Forty of these congregations are in the west and south-west, and 18 are in the middle and southern states. The whole amount of funds received for this object during the year, has been $6,112.59.

AN INTERESTING FACT.

We find the following interesting fact recorded in the Presbyterian Treasurer for June. Like the use of Voltaire's press, at Fernoy, for printing the scriptures it is an illustration of the control of an overruling Providence, defeating the secret plots as well as open assaults of all the enemies of the church, and making the scene of their hostility the witness of her triumphs.

"On May 14th, 1848, a Presbyterian church was organized by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, in Bordentown, New Jersey, in the building in which Thomas Paine lived, about half a century ago, and in the very room in which he wrote 'The Age of Reason.'"

THE REINFORCEMENT.

The account published in a preceding part of this No. will serve to show that but one of the persons whose offer to go out to India as missionaries was approved by Synod at its last meeting, and to which the attention of our churches has lately been so much directed, will now be sent on that mission. As, however, Mr. Campbell proposes to return to the field of his former labours, the number originally contemplated will be sent out, and the mission continued in its previous numerical strength. It would have been desirable to have had it increased, but the course which the subject has taken, seems to show us plainly what is the path of duty. While one of the respected and beloved brethren, who originally offered himself for this great work, declined for the present to engage in it, we accord to him in the fullest manner the acknowledgment of our belief that he has acted conscientiously, and that he has done what he thought would be most conducive to the interests of the church; and should he not at any future time be employed in the missionary work abroad, his abundant and successful labours in times past at home, give us reason to believe that his services in our own land may, with the divine blessing, be eminently useful. Believing him worthy of all confidence and great respect and affection, we hope he will every where be "received with gladness, and held in reputation."

REV. MR. CAMPBELL.

The report of his missionary tour, published in our present No., will show that this beloved brother has indeed been in labours most abundant, while in this land. His brief absence from the scene of missionary exertions has not been spent in repose and relaxation from labour, but has been devoted to constant and severe exertions in behalf of the holy cause which is so dear to him. His visit has proved very delightful to his friends, and exceedingly useful to the Church, and we hope he will receive in his own soul an abundant recompense for his work of faith and labour of love.

COMMUNION SEASONS.

Communion seasons are frequently times of refreshing to the Church, both in regard to the increased developement of the spiritual life of her members, and also the additions made to her numbers. We are thankful to be able to mention, for the general encouragement of those who desire the prosperity of Zion, that the communions recently held in the Reformed Presbyterian churches in this city, have been blessed with such evidences of divine favour. The 2d Reformed Presbyterian Church, under the pastoral care of Rev. Wm. Sterrett, had an accession of thirty-five; the 3d Church, Kensington, under the charge of Rev. R. J. Black, received more than forty, and the number added to the 1st Church was about sixty. All these persons gave satisfactory evidences of their fitness for admission to sealing ordinances, as far as the officers of the church could judge of their real character. While the majority were persons who had previously been in connexion with other branches of the church of Christ, in this or distant lands, an unusually large number now for the first time made a profession of their faith. Some of these, the young, who had been brought up in Sabbath Schools, or received in the family circle, from godly parents, instructions in divine truth, and whose early piety gave joyful hope of great future usefulness. Some were aged persons who had long neglected the one thing needful, but had been awakened from their lethargy by the earnest preaching of the truth, and, as perishing sinners, fled for refuge to the hope set before them in the gospel. Others were persons in the prime of life, of both sexes, strong for work in the Redeemer's vineyard. All of these afforded such good reason to believe that the Divine Spirit had drawn them, as to lead to the grateful exclamation, "What hath God wrought?" Such blessings call for deep gratitude, and should encourage greater diligence in the service of Him who is the best of Masters.

TRAVELLING.

This is the time of year when many of the inhabitants of the city leave their homes to breathe, for a short time, the pure invigorating air of the country, and recruit their strength, wasted by the toils and bustle of business. In the new positions which they may occupy, all such who are the disciples of the LORD JESUS CHRIST, should not forget their duty to their omnipresent, omniscient, and holy LORD. They should not leave their religion behind them, as if it were a mere matter of business, or an irksome burden from which they delighted to be free. In private and in public they should attend with punctuality to their obligations as professors of religion; having, in the one case, increased leisure, and in the other, being able to exert a new and more extended influence for good by their example. The Sabbath should witness their presence in the house of God, such a church being selected as may tend most to promote their spiritual improvement. They should give their encouragement to religious observances in the families of which they become inmates; and by expressive silence, or a forbidding manner, or by more pointed reproof, if it should be necessary, discountenance the profanity, or sneers, or unholy conversation by which the Christian, when among strangers, is so often and so deeply pained. Much too may be done by distributing, in an unostentatious way, religious tracts and books, and often a single remark, of a kind and serious character, may have a very happy influence. Christians every where should be like their Divine Master, going about doing good.

Obituary.

DIED, on the seventh of May last, in the sixtieth year of her age, RACHEL, wife of DORRANCE B. WOODBURN, a ruling elder in the Reformed Presbyterian Church in Bloomington. Mrs. Woodburn was a native of South Carolina, and in infancy was recognised as a member of the church of Christ. By those who were most intimately acquainted with her she was always regarded as a sincere and humble Christian. About twenty years ago, she removed, in company with her family, to this place, where she has maintained a walk and conversation becoming the gospel of that Saviour whose religion she professed. She has left behind her, both here and in the south, many friends to mourn her loss, as well as a large family—afflicted sorely by the dissolution of those ties which bind a wife to her husband and a mother to her children—yet not repining at the dispensations of a wise and good God, who doth all things well, knowing that to the godly to die is gain.

New Publications.

The Everlasting Kingdom: a Discourse on the Mediatorial Dominion of Jesus CHRIST. By John Black, D. D., Pastor of the First Reformed Presbyterian Church, Pittsburgh. Pp. 32. 18mo.

It appears, by a notice prefixed to it, that this discourse was delivered at the request of a number of persons among whom there existed diversity of opinion in regard to the perpetuity of the mediatorial office. Dr. Black, standing in the front rank of the theologians of Pittsburgh, and indeed of the whole land, was applied to for an expression of his views. The present discourse was the result. As might be expected, from the character of the author, it is a most able production—presenting the scriptural doctrine on the subject with great perspicuity, and sustaining every point by the most conclusive demonstration. The discussion covers two topics, namely, the nature of the mediatorial dominion, and its duration. Under the former, we find some valuable and very seasonable remarks on the authority of the Redeemer over the church, and also over the state, which we design to transfer to our pages as soon as possible. The whole discourse is worthy of wide circulation and attentive perusal, and we hope all who can procure a copy will do so. It should be in every family, as a standard for reference, on a subject very interesting, but little understood.

The Boy and the Birds. American Sunday School Union. Pp. 222. 18mo.

This is a delightful little volume, which will fascinate the youthful reader; and while it communicates interesting and valuable information about the feathered tribes, inculcates important religious truth. A number of birds are represented as conversing with a little boy, giving him, in answer to his simple inquiries, information about their forms, habits, &c. We have seldom met with a book in which we think, a child would feel more interested.

Information for the People. By Robert Sears. New York: Robert Sears. Pp. 530. 8vo.

This work consists of a large number of short articles on a great variety of subjects. The wood engravings are numerous and well executed. The tendency of the entire work is excellent, and it forms an admirable repository of useful knowledge, presented in a very attractive form. It is emphatically a family book, and should be in every household.

Anti-Slavery.

AN EXPOSTULATION WITH THOSE CHRISTIANS AND CHRISTIAN CHURCHES, IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, THAT ARE IMPLICATED IN THE SIN OF SLAVEHOLDING, BY A COMMITTEE OF THE SYNOD OF THE REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN SCOTLAND.

“Remember them that are in bonds, as bound with them.”—HEB. xiii. 1.

Such are the observations we take the liberty of offering on the reasons many are in the habit of assigning for palliating and prolonging slavery. Perhaps on giving the subject a fuller consideration than it has yet received from you, you may be ready to say—“We admit the system you have assailed is, in many things, indefensible. We deplore its evil consequences. We would rejoice in its utter abolition. But what can we do? While the legislatures of the several States decline interfering, with the view of putting an end to the evil, what measures can we adopt?” Brethren, it would be presumptuous in us, living at such a distance from your territories, and unacquainted probably with circumstances well known to you, to decide positively what ought to be done. We wish to sympathize with you in your difficulties. We would give due credit to the aspirations of benevolence even when they do not afford actual relief. Permit us, at the same time, to ask, do you not, on this question, greatly underrate your influence on public sentiment? Is it not in your power, by the propagation of sound principles, and by the maintenance of a correct practice in the various relations you occupy, domestic, ecclesiastical, and political, to lend more help than you are giving to the cause of emancipation? You well know what a beneficial influence was exerted by your ancestors in bringing about your national independence; and we are fully persuaded that you yourselves might again put forth, through approved channels, such an energy as would accomplish another revolution not less glorious—the deliverance of your sable brethren from their present thralldom.

1. Might you not issue a fuller testimony than you have yet borne against slavery? It will not be denied, that it is competent to all churches, in whatever countries they have been organized, to testify in a judicious and discreet, yet firm and faithful manner, against the errors and the evils that prevail around them. “Ye are my witnesses, saith the Lord.” Such a practice, no doubt, may have the effect of giving offence and provoking irritation, but what then? The followers of Jesus, if true to the cause they have embraced, are taught to expect persecution; nor are they kept in ignorance of the gracious reward which awaits them in a future state. "And ye shall be brought before governors and kings for my sake, for a testimony against them and the Gentiles." "Blessed are they who are persecuted for righteousness' sake; for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are ye when men shall revile you and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely for my sake."

2. Might you not emit a judicial declaration in favour of the essential rights of the negro population? You cannot rescind the bad laws which the supreme power has enacted; you may not be able, by any arguments you can employ, to persuade your legislators that they ought forthwith to expunge such laws from the statute-book: but you are able, and as churches you are competent, to declare what are the rights, conjugal, parental, filial, and political, to which your African brethren are entitled. Nor would such a declaration, if couched in calm and dignified terms, and circulated among the higher and more influential classes, be without a good effect. Often when liberty has lain prostrate under the iron hoof of tyranny, has religion come forward from the retirement in which she loves to dwell, and, as an angel of mercy, mitigated the sufferings she could not, by a direct agency, remove. It was while the Covenanters of Scotland, imbued by the spirit of Christianity, were giving utterance to the wrongs of an oppressed people, and asserting the rights to which they were entitled, that the reign of terror, near the close of the seventeenth century, was brought to an end, and the dawn of a better day rose to dispel those clouds from which only the bitter storms of persecution had descended. In short, warmer friends, more eloquent advocates, or more valiant defenders of freedom were never found than in the bosom of the Reformed Churches in Europe.

3. Might you not easily adopt measures for giving, at least, some of the slaves and their children, a considerable amount of elementary education? * That, surely, is a privilege which they ought not to be without, a day longer, in a country so eminently favoured as yours. You are proud of your liberal institutions—of your rising universities—of your flourishing schools for the children of the white inhabitants; and yet there are living among you, at the present moment, nearly three millions of a different colour, few of whom have been taught to read any language. Why allow this grievous wrong to remain so long unredressed? Why should those who are specially intrusted with the diffusion of the gospel among all classes, and whose success depends, to a large extent, on the rising generation being educated, hesitate to provide schools for the blacks? Are you afraid of persecution? That could not last very long. Were any considerable number of you unanimously, zealously, and with Christian decision, to engage in this good work, your enemies would very soon stand abashed, the weapons would drop from their hands, and the blood-thirsty designs, which some may have conceived, would fail. But even should they proceed to try a war of extermination against you, having recourse to imprisonment, banishment, confiscation, and death, such unjust, inhuman, impolitic doings, could only hasten the overthrow of the system they are meant to support. The blood of one martyr shed in so good a cause, would evoke a storm throughout the Free States and throughout the nations of Western Europe, that would shake the entire system to its foundation. There might, at the moment of its execution, be a burst of fiendish joy from some of the planters; but that burst would be the knell of death to the monster that has so long sucked the blood and rejoiced in the groans of an outcast, an oppressed, an injured people.

* "We recommend," say your own General Assembly, in 1818, "we recommend to all the members of our religious denomination, not only to permit, but to facilitate and encourage the instruction of their slaves in the principles and duties of the Christian religion; by granting them liberty to attend on the preaching of the gospel, when they have the opportunity; by favouring the instruction of them in Sabbath schools, whenever those schools can be formed; and by giving them all other proper advantages for acquiring the knowledge of their duty both to God and man. We are perfectly satisfied that, as it is incumbent on all Christians to communicate religious instruction to those who are under their authority, so the doing of this, in the case before us, so far from operating, as some have apprehended that it might, as an excitement to insubordination and insurrection, would, on the contrary, operate as the most powerful means for the prevention of those evils."

4. Might you not, like some churches in your own land, make slaveholding a censurable offence? Might you not pass a resolution, that henceforth those who hold property in their fellow-men, shall not be received into full communion, and that as to those who are already members, they shall be dealt with in a kind and conscientious manner, with the view of persuading them to abandon a traffic so incompatible with the spirit and principles of Christianity? Might you not adopt this course? Be assured your churches will never rise to the high position they should occupy, nor possess the moral influence they should exert, till they have courage to purge out this mighty evil. So long as it is permitted to find a refuge in the sanctuary, either from interested motives, or from false delicacy, it is a stain which no tears can wash out—a plague-spot under which the spiritual life must languish—a moral leprosy on account of which the most friendly churches, having a regard to their own safety, will continue to feel themselves under the unpleasant necessity of keeping at a distance from you.* Are any ready to allege that slaveholders were permitted to remain in the apostolic churches? We at once answer that, “before this argument can be admitted as conclusive, it must be shown that the servitude which the inspired apostles are alleged to have connived at, was the same in all its essential elements with the slavery of modern times; that if it were even proved that a temporary forbearance was exercised in the primitive church toward Christian men who held property in their fellow-men, it would not follow that the same indulgence should be extended to them in the present day, any more than toward those who would revive all the rites of Judaism, which, for a time, were suffered in the apostolic churches; and that if the men who have reared up this system, under the clear light of the gospel dispensation, and who employ their combined energies to uphold and defend it, cannot be reached by the discipline of the church, it would follow that slavery may be introduced and established, and indefinitely extended, in our own country, or any other country, by the members of Christian churches, while the authority which Christ has left in his church, and which takes cognizance of wrong and injustice in every other form, is altogether precluded from dealing effectually with this one form of outrage and oppression, which is confessedly one of the most flagrant and atrocious which man can inflict on his fellow-man." *

* It must be very mortifying to Christians in America, to find their churches called by eminent citizens, the “bulwarks of slavery.” Yet is it a fact that this is no groundless charge. The Rev. Albert Barnes says, “There is not vital energy enough, there is not power of influence and numbers enough, out of the church, to retain it. Let every religious denomination in the land detach itself from all connexion with slavery, without saying a word against others; let the time come when, in all the mighty denominations of Christians, it can be announced, that the evil has ceased with them for ever; and let the voice of each denomination be lifted up in kind, but firm and solemn testimony against the system, with no mealy words, with no attempt at apology, with no effort to throw the sacred shield of religion over so great an evil, and the work is done. There is no public sentiment in the land—there could be none created—that would resist such a testimony: there is no power, out of the church, that could sustain slavery an hour, if it were not sustained in it.”

5. Might you not give greater encouragement and assistance to the project of colonizing Africa with liberated negroes? † We are well assured that the "Colonization Society," which has this for its object, has already done immense good, and promises still more magnificent results. "Events," says one of your own journals, ‡ "are now in a rapid course of development, which demonstrate the profound wisdom and foresight of the originators and early promoters of the colonization of the coloured race of our country on the coast of Africa. The scheme itself, which was regarded by many as worse than Utopian in its character, and which not a few always met with the smile of incredulity or the sneer of contempt, is now proved to be not merely practicable, but a successful experiment. Colony after colony has been formed: they have each out-lived and surmounted the dangers of infancy and childhood, and are now, with the strength of manhood, about to enter on a career of independence and freedom which will secure them a name, and, we doubt not, an honourable place among the nations of the world. Recent arrivals from Liberia furnish the gratifying intelligence, that the inhabitants of the colony have given their approbation to the suggestion, to declare themselves an independent nation; and delegates are to be chosen in the different towns and settlements of the colony, in February, to assemble in convention, in order to deliberate and to form a constitution for the government of the country as a distinct and independent community." "In this establishment of a free and Christian commonwealth on the coast, destined to enlighten and redeem the continent of Africa, we have" (we quote from a writer of eminence among yourselves) "a powerful motive to benevolent action. An unhappy and injured population of African descent is in the midst of us. Duty requires that they be raised to the rank of man; of this elevation they are capable; but remaining amongst us, ages must roll by ere it be attained; and perhaps when those ages should have passed away, it might be found impossible. What, then, is to be done? . . . We may say, that by the removal of such as are emancipated to the shores of Africa, the land of their fathers, a free state may be established, and a flourishing church planted. Each emigrant from this land will, to the native tribes, be a missionary of religion, morals, civilization, order, and liberty." §

* Resolutions by Synod, July, 1845.

† We find the General Assembly of 1818 issuing the following recommendation: "We recommend to all our people to patronize and encourage the Society lately formed for colonizing Africa, the land of their ancestors with the free people of colour in our country. We hope that much good may result from the plans and efforts of this Society. And while we exceedingly rejoice to have witnessed its origin and organization among the holders of slaves, as giving an unequivocal pledge of their desire to deliver themselves and their country from the calamity of slavery, we hope that those portions of the American Union whose inhabitants are, by a gracious providence, more favourably circumstanced, will cordially and liberally, and earnestly co-operate with their brethren, in bringing about the great end contemplated."

6. Might you not advance the cause of emancipation by a judicious use of the elective franchise, which you feel no scruple in exercising? Is it not in your power to return representatives who would employ their utmost efforts for the improvement of the laws regulating slavery? If you continue to choose men who have a direct interest in the continuance of the system, and whose inveterate prejudices dispose them rather to rivet the fetters than unloose them, what good can you expect? But if you endeavour to find out men of enlarged views, of liberal principles, and generous feelings—men who pity the negroes under their many wrongs—men who would not shrink from their duty even amid the threats of popular violence—men who would dare to “do justice and love mercy,” whatever reproaches might be cast upon their characters, and whatever attacks might be attempted on their persons, then would you render an invaluable service to the cause of your oppressed countrymen. Nor should the delusive excuse be indulged for a single moment that the electors in the churches are but a minority. How often have a minority been sufficient to turn the scale at a contested election. Let the lovers of freedom be only sincere, honest, intrepid; let them be only zealous, prudent, persevering; let them only think what consequences would follow from the choice of “able men; men fearing God, loving the truth, and hating covetousness;” let them resolve, in the strength of promised grace, that neither the clamours of the mob, nor the insolence of the masters, shall move them from their high purpose; and they will succeed to a larger extent than they may anticipate, in returning a body of legislators who will not rest till the last fetter is broken to pieces, and the last groan has died away into hymns of thanksgiving.

7. Might you not make more frequent and more earnest application to the supreme power of the States, on behalf of the slaves? You are accustomed to say that you yourselves have no authority to alter any of the existing laws, how much soever you may deplore their injustice, their inhumanity, and their impolicy. This is quite true: but as citizens of the empire you have the privilege of petitioning on any subject, and on all occasions. Why not avail yourselves of this constitutional right on behalf of an oppressed race? Why not urge your reasonable wishes and your strong arguments on the attention of your representatives, who have the necessary authority to make whatever changes you may show to be proper, and who, we will add, are bound to take immediate steps for the redress of grievances over which humanity mourns, and for the introduction of improvements which enlightened benevolence implores, and stern justice demands? Nor should you despair of success, whenever you act with vigour. If aristocratic Britain raised her voice within the walls of Parliament to such a pitch as compelled her representatives to wipe away, by one stroke, the deep stain of colonial slavery, might not republican America speak to the legislatures of the slave-holding states in still louder accents, and never cease her thunder tones until the foul blemish has been washed out by one decisive deed, securing a full recognition and a final triumph of those principles which alone can give to states a lasting prosperity, and to statesmen an immortal renown?

There is one thing more of very solemn importance to which we cannot help alluding—we mean the efficacy of prayer to that good and gracious Being who is the ultimate source of the deliverance desired. He is not an indifferent spectator of the wrongs and sufferings which the negroes are enduring. He does not turn away his ear from the inter-cessions offered on their behalf, nor hold back his hand from the measures employed for their present and eternal well-being. He is "a refuge for the oppressed." From his throne in the heavens he looks down upon the earth "to hear the groanings of the prisoners, to loose those that are appointed to death." What an encouragement to believing, earnest, unceasing prayer! You lament that you are hindered by the present state of your laws, from doing all for them you would wish. May we say, so much greater is the obligation you are under to invoke the merciful interposition of Him whose arm is omnipotent, and whose resources are inexhaustible,—of Him whose power can frustrate the devices of the oppressors, and whose smile is sufficient to crown with success the efforts of the humane. In supplications to Him we would join you. While we protest against rulers who have given the sanction of law to practices at once unjust and inhuman, we would carry our appeal to that blessed Potentate who presides in mercy over your highly privileged land, and who promises that He will hear the prayers that are offered for its advancement in freedom, in happiness, and in true glory. "Arise, O Lord, and plead thine own cause!" "Let the sighing of the prisoner come before thee, according to the greatness of thy power!"

Praying that you yourselves may enjoy large supplies of grace, and mercy, and peace, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ,—We are, dear Brethren, yours affectionately and faithfully,

Romanism.

SUPPORT OF THE ROMISH CLERGY IN IRELAND.

My object in writing on this subject is, to give your readers an idea of the mode in which the Roman Catholic priesthood obtain a support from the population of Ireland connected with their church.

1st. On Christmas day and Easter Sunday a public collection is generally taken up in every parish chapel for the support of the priest. I will mention some of the incidents that occur during the time of the collection. When the first part of the mass is concluded, the parish priest stands upon the altar platform, holding in his hand a list of his paying parishioners, while one of the said parishioners sits on one of the steps leading to the platform, holding a hat for the purpose of receiving the priest's dues. The priest begins to call the roll thus: "Patrick Casey! are you there, Mr. Casey?" "Here, your Reverence." "Come up here, Mr. Casey!" (Mr. Casey makes his appearance.) "Many a happy Christmas to you, Mr. Casey!" Casey makes a low bow, and drops some money into the hat, which is duly announced by the collector: and in case the priest is pleased with the amount, he addresses Casey thus: "I thank you kindly, Mr. Casey, I would not doubt you—you were always good and liberal towards your priest, and it was kind for you—your father was so before you." His Reverence continues to read the list, in this manner; lauding those, of course, who are emptying their pockets to fill his hat, until he comes to an absentee, when something like the following takes place: "Thady Hallagan! are you there, Thady Hallagan?" (No answer from Thady.) "Mr. Thady Hallagan, this is not the first time you were absent, nor is it the first time you have drank your money, instead of paying your priest. If you do not come to me before next Sunday, I will denounce you from this altar; so I now warn you, Thady, not to bring my tongue on you! for, if you do, I warrant you you'll not be the better of it for twelve months!" (Here a cross is affixed to Thady's name, as an absentee.) On the following Sunday the absentees are called and denounced publicly from the altar; and such is the dread the people have of this public exhibition, that the priest often succeeds in exacting dues from creatures who have not a rood of ground, and who are among the most wretched and squalid of mankind.

2d. The priests derive a large emolument from public funerals. In case the deceased be a rich person, (for if he happen to be a very poor person, there is no mass said for him,) a large number of the neighbouring clergy assemble for the purpose of chanting high mass, for the repose of his soul, for which they are well paid by the relations of the deceased person. But, at public funerals, the parish priest generally gets the most money, and that by means of the following device. Before the corpse is taken out for interment, it is considered indispensably necessary, in the minds of the people, to put some blessed clay into the coffin. The clay is blessed by the priest's reading a few words of Latin over it, and sprinkling it with holy water. Whatever might have been the original object of this blessed clay, it is supposed by the people to possess the virtue of sanctifying the corpse and preventing its being polluted, in case of admixture with the bodies of heretics. After the priest performs the process of blessing the clay, he calls upon the people to come forward and contribute money, and get masses said for the repose of the soul of the deceased. This appeal, which is made to the sympathy of the people, and particularly to those of the deceased's friends, is always liberally responded to. But it sometimes happens that the priest is not pleased with these contributions. And it often occurs that the irritable functionary disposes of the holy clay by casting it into the fire, instead of putting it into the coffin.

3d. Priests are also paid for baptisms, confessions, and anointing. The charge for baptism is, two shillings and sixpence to three shillings and four pence. With regard to confession-money, it amounts to a considerable sum, as every adult in the parish is obliged to confess his sins once in the year, when each communicant is obliged to pay one shilling, and some more, according to their means and worldly circumstances. For anointing the sick, some priests charge two shillings and six-pence, others, three shillings, and some five shillings. And this is so rigidly enforced that, when money is lacking, many are suffered to die without the benefit of the clergy.

Much is also obtained by private marriages. Suffice it to say, that the poorest cannot get married without paying an enormous sum. There are many other ways by which money is extorted from their blinded followers, such as reading offices for the sick, blessing boats, saying masses for sick cattle, &c. And here it may be well to inform your readers of the manner of holding a month's mind. It is as follows. After the deceased is buried one month, a number of priests assemble for the purpose of chanting high mass for his repose. A coffin is prepared for the purpose, which is covered over with a black pall, over which their Reverences sing high mass, sprinkling the empty coffin occasionally with holy water, as well as the persons assembled, and for this solemn mockery each of their Reverences pockets one sovereign!

Such are some of the means adopted by the Romish priesthood for the purpose of obtaining a livelihood from the people, who are kept by them in an awful state of mental and intellectual vassalage. How exactly are they described by the apostle when he says, "but there were false prophets also among the people, even as there shall be false teachers among you, who privily shall bring in damnable heresies, even denying the Lord that bought them, and bring upon themselves swift destruction. And many shall follow their pernicious ways, by reason of whom the way of truth shall be evil spoken of, and through covetousness shall they, with feigned words, make merchandize of you." 2 Pet. ii. 1, 2, 3. Here is an exact picture of the Romish priesthood. Surely popery is a money-making concern. It has been ingeniously wrought and devised by the father of lies, for the purpose of imposing upon the feelings and sympathies of human nature, and it is eminently calculated to deprive men, not only of their money, but also of their immortal souls.

THE SABBATH.—TO FARMERS.

"Yes," says a farmer, "working in the manufactories on the Sabbath is wrong, and ought to be stopped. But what shall be done in time of HAYING? The weather has been bad, and much hay is out. For a number of days it has been rainy: the Sabbath comes, and is a fair day. What shall be done? Shall the farmers rest, as on other Sabbaths, attend public worship, and let the hay lie; or shall they go into the field, take care of the hay, and secure it?" Let them rest, attend public worship, and perform the appropriate duties of the Sabbath. Let them be contented with what hay they can secure in six days. "Six days thou shalt labour," and in them, saith Jehovah, "do all thy work." "Remember the Sabbath day, and keep it holy; in it do no work." God makes no exception for haying-time.

"But it may rain on Monday, and the hay be injured, perhaps spoiled." That is true. It is also true, that a man may be sick on Monday, and he may die. If he does not work on the Sabbath, he may not be able to work at all. On the other hand, it may not rain on Monday, and the man may be alive and well, and better fitted to work than he would be, should he labour on the Sabbath. Or, if it should rain on Monday and Tuesday, and his hay be injured, or even spoiled, that is no good reason why he should work on the Sabbath. God did not say, 'Thou shalt not do any work except in haying-time, or unless it is likely to rain on Monday, and men have no right to make that addition. He that addeth to the word of God, or taketh from it, will fall under his curse.

Men have no right to gain any more property, or secure any more in their ordinary business, than they can by keeping the Sabbath day holy. In that way they can get all that they need, or have any right to possess.

But it is said, "If a house is on fire, you will allow a man to put it out. If visited with a sudden and unexpected inundation, which threatens to sweep way his house, you will allow him, if he can, to secure it, though his family might flee from it, and thus not lose their lives, if it should be carried away." These are sudden providences, against which no foresight or prudent care during the week can guard. They do not come under the head of ordinary business; and what is done must be done at the time when the providence occurs, or not at all. This is known. Very different is it with the tending or the getting in of hay. That is a part of a man's regular employment. There is no certainty that, if he does not do it on a particular Sabbath, he cannot do it at all. Facts show that it ordinarily may be done on other days, and as well done; nay, that, in the long run, it may be better done, and often more may be secured by not working, than by working on the Sabbath. It is, on the whole, better for this world as well as the future, not to violate this day.

A number of men, at one time, had mowed a large quantity of hay. For several days it had been rainy. The Sabbath came, and was a remarkably pleasant day. One man stayed at home, opened his hay, took care of it, and in the afternoon got it into his barn. His neighbours did nothing of the kind, but went as usual with their families to the house of God. On their return, one of them met the man who had been getting in his hay, who expressed his regret that his neighbours should be so superstitious as to go off, and leave their hay exposed to be again wet. He said that he had been more wise, and had secured his. "Now," said he, "it may rain again on Monday, and you not be able to get in yours." That was true. His neighbours knew it. But they concluded to leave that with God. One thing was certain, that it would not rain without good reasons for it. Another thing was equally certain, that, if it should rain, and the hay be injured, and even spoiled, that would not be so great an evil as to do what they knew to be wrong. Monday came, and it rained. It rained also on Tuesday and on Wednesday. Thursday was remarkably pleasant. All who had hay out went busily to work. Friday was fair and also Saturday. All the hay that had been out in the rain was thoroughly dried and housed. The Sabbath came. The first part of it was pleasant. In the afternoon a cloud arose, looked dark and scowling. It extended and moved on towards the barn into which, on the previous Sabbath, the man had put his hay, and where he thought he had "secured it." The lightning darted here and there, and by and by went down into the barn. "I knew," said a man who was near, "that it struck, from the feeling. I started up and ran to the window, and the smoke was issuing from the barn. They rang the bells, got out the fire-engines, and did all in their power, but they could not stop the fire. They saw that the barn must go. Nor was that all: his neighbours' barns on each side were so near that it seemed impossible to prevent them from being burned. But as the flames burst out, and the sparks began to fly, the rain poured down in sheets, which, with the engines, kept those barns so perfectly drenched with water that neither of them took fire, and the Sabbath-breaker's barn was burnt out between them." "Six days shalt thou labour and do all thy work." That man did not gain any thing by disobeying God, nor did his neighbours lose any thing by obeying him. There is that gathereth at a time and in a way that is not meet, and it tendeth to poverty. Men are dependent upon God, and in the keeping of his commands there is great reward. Regard to his will about the Sabbath, as well as other things, is profitable.

But it may be HARVEST-TIME. Grain may be scarce, and a man may need all he has for his family. If it is cut, and is dry, and on the Sabbath it looks likely to rain, shall he not get it in, and thus preserve it for his family? What saith Jehovah? "In earing time and in harvest thou shalt rest." He knew that the temptations to break his law at this season of the year would be strong; and that if he said nothing in particular about it, men might make this exception, and think that the case was so peculiar that they might do that part of their work on the Sabbath. He therefore set the matter at rest, by explicitly saying, "In eaning time and in harvest," as well as at other times, "thou shalt rest." Besides, if a man works on the Sabbath to secure his grain, when it is going to rain, it is by no means certain that he will succeed. Jehovah told his ancient people that, if they should desecrate the Sabbath, he would kindle a fire which should not be quenched. He can at any time do this. Sometimes he does do it; and not unfrequently in connexion with the breaking of the Sabbath.—JUSTIN EDWARDS.

REVERENCE FOR AGE.—In our young country there is a lesson to be learned, against which every thing which surrounds us militates. That lesson is: Reverence for Age. We do not mean to speak of reverence for ancient truth, or of discriminating respect for ancient institutions; though in abolishing old errors there is danger of attacking old truths, and in condemning venerable abuses, venerable excellencies may be injured. In all things it becomes us to be wise and cautious, and in nothing more than in making innovations—for all change is not reform. That reverence for age of which we would particularly write to-day, is shown in respect for the rights, the preferences, and even the prejudices of our fellow-creatures, who have reached the period when even the grasshopper is a burden. In the infirmities of age, the weakness of decay, the burden of disappointment—for advanced age is under its best aspect too often labour and sorrow—the aged have weariness enough and vexation enough, without the addition of the cold disrespect or even the grudging and half-conceded deference of youth.

The hoary head, says the wise man, is a crown of glory, if it be found in the way of righteousness. To be in the way of righteousness does not suppose unerring wisdom in the details of this world's intercourse; nor even does it imply perfect correctness in the minutiae of Christian fellowship. The adage that times change and men change with them, finds an exception in the case of those who are too old to relinquish old habits and early views. They cannot see the propriety of abandoning the customs and observances to which a long life has wedded them—which have become a part of their nature, and an element in their being. It is unkind, then—and if the disposition be forced to an extreme, it is unchristian—to compel them to relinquish, or to treat with disrespect peculiarities which have been all their lives a part of their character. It is, in effect, telling them that they have lived in vain. Of course there are many changes which grow so manifestly out of the alteration of the circumstances of society, that even the aged concede their propriety, and consent to their adoption. When, however, despite of this, they lament over the departure of the "good old times," we must not laugh at their attachment to the days of their strength, or betray any slight of their opinions. Be pitiful—says the Apostle—Be courteous. To whom should we be more courteous than to those who were men and women before we drew our first breath: to whom should we be more grateful than to those who, ere we came upon the stage of action, were the conservators of the rights and privileges in which we rejoice?

And even when it cannot be said that the hoary head is, according to Solomon's declaration, "a crown of glory," there is room for the greater exercise of Christian charity. The good book which supplies maxims for all exigencies, says, "Rebuke not an elder, but entreat him as a father." It will but harden those grown old in sin for the young to assume over them the haughty aspect of teachers; and it will not win them to Christ to approach them with superciliousness. And in many things, much as we may think them in the wrong, they may be nearer the right than their younger brethren;—certainly so, if their juniors are deficient in charity,—one day, unless death intervene, the young must become old. They must submit to all the inconveniences which they see the aged suffer. They will then covet ference and kindness. As they would in such case be done by, so must they do. If they would receive kindness and support in the hour when they most need it, let them earn the right to this favour by-and-by, by conferring it now, "while they have time."

Gleanings.

The Family.—If there are any joys on earth, which harmonize with those of heaven, they are the joys of a Christian family. When the snow-flakes fall fast in the wintry evening, and the morning winds rattle at the windows, what is so delightful as to see the happy little ones sporting around a blazing fire! Look at that little creature in her night-dress, frolicking and laughing as if she never had known, and never would know a care. Now she rolls upon the carpet, and now she climbs the chair, and now she pursues her older sister around the room, while her little heart is overflowing with happiness. Who does not yet the pleasurable emotions with which the parents look upon this lovely scene!

But let us look at the man who makes his home but a boarding-house where he may eat and sleep. His wife is merely his house-keeper. His children are necessary evils, to be kept out of the way as much as possible. To-day he is at the bowling-saloon; to-morrow he is at the billiard-room; and the next day he is till midnight at the whist-party. He is a jovial companion and greets his associates with an air of carelessness mirth, as though he never knew a sorrow. But in truth, he is a poor pitiable victim of disquietude and depression. His jokes are forced. His smile is unnatural. It is even by constraint that he retains the semblance of good nature. See him at home—how petulant and irascible! The least annoyance to his mind is like the spark to the powder. His children, while they flee from his frown, imbibe his spirit from him as he rises in the morning, gloomy and cross. The poor creature hardly knows the meaning of the word enjoyment. This is a man of pleasure! He will not obey God's law because it will disturb his happiness! Wretched man! He is the victim of his own sins. He is serving Satan here, and Satan rewards him as he does all his disciples, with the painfully forced semblance of joy, but with a harassed spirit and prospective destruction.

Lord Chesterfield was such a man. He spent his whole life in the pursuit of pleasure, and yet happiness continually eluded his search. Listen to his candid confession:—"I have seen the round of business and pleasure, and have done with all. I have enjoyed all the pleasures of the world, and consequently know their futility, and do not regret their loss. I appraise them at their real value which, in truth, is very low; whereas those who have not experienced, always overrate them. They only see the gay outside, and are dazzled with the glare. But I have been behind the scenes. When I reflect upon what I have seen, and what I have heard, and what I have done, I cannot persuade myself that the frivolous bustle of the world had any reality. Shall I tell you what I bear this melancholy situation with the meritorious resignation and consistency which most men boast? No, sir! I really cannot help it. I bear it because I must bear it whether I will or no. I think of nothing but killing time the best way I can." What a comment is this confession upon what is generally called worldly pleasure!

The dying scene of such a man is a fearful commentary upon his miserable life. He lies upon his dying bed, annoying all around him by his irritability. The retrospect of the past affords him no pleasure, and the future is filled with fearful forebodings. And there he lies brooding sullen silence upon the present pains, with no consolation in respect to the future. He dies and is forgotten. But O! this is not the end of his history. Judgment is before him, and eternal retribution succeeds. The imagination shrinks from following him into those regions.—Job's "Path of Peace."

To Think.—A lady had written on a card and placed in her garden house, on the top of an hour-glass, a beautiful and simple stanza from one of the fugitive pieces of John Clare, the rural poet. It was at the season of the year when the flowers are in the highest beauty:—

“To think of summers yet to come,
That I am not to see—
To think a weed is yet to bloom
From dust that I shall be!”

The next morning she found pencilled on the back of the same card

“To think when heaven and earth are fled,
And time and seasons o’er;
When all that can die, shall be dead,
That I must die no more!
Ah! where shall then my portion be!
How shall I spend eternity!”

Let Diotrephes say, “It is good for me to have the pre-eminence.” Let Judas say, “It is good for me to bear the bag.” Let Demas say, “It is good for me to embrace the present world.” But do thou, O my soul, say with David, “It is good for me to draw near to God.”

PARALLEL.

MOSES.

Fled from his country to escape the hands of the king.

Was bid to return; for the men were dead that sought his life.

Refused to be called the son of Pharaoh’s daughter.

By Divine power overcame the magicians.

Confirmed his religion by many signs and wonders.

Promised a holy land.

Fasted forty days on Mount Sinai.

Supplied bread in the wilderness.

Walked through the sea on dry ground.

Caused the waters to go backward.

His face shone when he came from the Mount.

By prayer, cured Miriam of the leprosy.

Appointed seventy elders over the people.

Sent twelve men to spy out the land.

Interceded for transgressors, and caused an atonement to be made for them.

Instituted a passover, when a lamb was sacrificed, none of whose bones were broken.

Promised another prophet.

CHRIST.

Was conveyed into Egypt, to avoid the hands of Herod.

Arise, take the young child; for the kings are dead which sought his life.

Refused to be made king.

Overcome and cast out evil spirits.

Confirmed his religion by many miracles.

Promised a better country, that is heavenly.

Fasted forty days in the wilderness.

Fed five thousand with a few loaves and fishes.

Walked on the sea, and enabled Peter to do so.

Rebuked both the wind and sea.

In his transfiguration his face shined as the sun.

By his word, healed divers lepers.

Appointed seventy disciples.

Sent twelve disciples to visit all nations.

Was our intercessor and atonement.

Was that paschal lamb; not a bone of him was broken.

Promised another Comforter.

But the greatest similitude was in their being lawgivers, which no prophet was, besides Moses and Christ. Search the records of universal story, and see if we can find a man who is so like to Moses as Christ is, and so like to Christ as Moses was. If we cannot find such a one, then we have found him of whom Moses in the law and the prophets did write, "Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph."—Dr. Jortin.

THE INFIDEL ON HIS DEATH-BED.

The writer of this was called, about mid-day, to visit a young man in the last moments of life. He was a professed infidel, and refused any spiritual aid, or the services of a minister. On entering the room, the scene was truly awful. The young man was dying. Near the bed sat his widowed mother and sisters. He was struggling to hide his fears, and to appear calm and collected in the conflict with death. As I approached him, the window was slightly opened to admit sufficient light; he turned towards the window, and as his eye for a moment rested on me—it was only a moment, however, for he as quickly turned away with his face towards the wall—he seemed determined to prevent my conversing with him. I took his hand, he withdrew it; I asked him to look at me, and talk about his latter end; he groaned and hid himself beneath the bed-clothes. Again I held his hand, and by gentle force turned him towards me. His countenance was intelligent, and his features good; his appearance indicated twenty or twenty-one years of age.

"Shall I pray with you, my friend?"

"No, no," said he; "I don't believe in prayer."

"Shall I read a portion of God's holy word?"

"No; Oh! don't worry me; I don't believe the Bible. Why add to my sufferings with such things? I tell you I am an infidel, and all I ask is to be let alone."

"Do you know you are dying, my young friend?"

"Yes, I know it well enough—I never shall see that sun rise or set again—I wish it was over—I wish I was dead—I wish you would leave me—I did not send for you—mother, mother, send this man away, it is useless to talk with me."

"O! my boy," cried the almost heart-broken mother, "do listen to the word of truth. You will soon be beyond its reach—you are fast hastening to the judgment. O! my child, it is a fearful thing to meet God unprepared."

Her sobs choked her utterance. I knelt by his side, and prayed for God's Spirit to bring the wanderer back. He rolled and tossed in his bed, and constantly interrupted me during prayer. I then read from the Bible such verses as I thought would lead his mind to right reflection. He hid his face, placed his fingers in his ears, and begged me to desist, and groaned so audibly as to alarm those in the room. After several ineffectual attempts to get him into conversation, I rose to leave the room. As I passed towards the door I grasped his hand, and said, "Farewell, my friend." He raised his eyes towards me, and seemed to be willing to listen.

"Suppose," said I, "we were on board a ship together, and in some violent storm the ship was wrecked—I had secured a plank, and as I clung to it for safety, refused to let you take hold. What would you think of me?"

"Think of you," said he, "I would think you were a selfish wretch

"We have been wrecked—here" (pointing to the Bible,) "is the plank on which I rest; the billows of death are riding over you; and will you lay hold before it is for ever too late? Before you is the shoreless ocean of eternity; the voice of mercy may yet be heard. Turn to me, for why will you die? Your infidelity is no security for such a storm. Think of your Saviour—O! look to him as your only star and your only sure support."

He kept my hand; the tear started in his eye; his whole soul was centred in the gaze of agony.—"It is too late, too late; there is no mercy, no hope for me; I am lost, for ever lost!"

Before the sun had set, his soul was in eternity—gone to the audit.

At twelve years of age, he left the Sabbath school, commenced his apprenticeship, associated with infidelity, and drank the poison. At twenty, summoned to the bar of God, without a ray of light to cheer the darkness of the valley of the shadow of death.

Young man, think of this sad story; flee from sin to holiness and to God.

Miscellaneous Communications.

COMMUNICANTS IN THE CHURCH AT SAHARANPUR, NORTHERN INDIA.

Philadelphia, 23d June, 1848.

MY DEAR BROTHER,—The following is a list of the communicant members in the mission church at Saharanpur during my time there:

| Natives.   | East Indians, | Missionaries, |
|-------------------|----------------------|----------------------|
| Daniel Wells,     | James Powell,        | J. Caldwell,         |
| Elisha Swift,     | John Powell,         | Mrs. Caldwell,       |
| T. W. J. Wylie,   | Mrs. Powell,         | J. R. Campbell,      |
| Samuel B. Wylie,  | Mrs. Bradford,       | Mrs. Campbell,       |
| Gilbert M'Master. | Mrs. Petrie,         | James Craig,         |
|                   | John Coleman,        | Mrs. Craig.          |
|                   | Francis Shaviel.     |                      |

Changes have since taken place, by death, removals, and suspension. Mr. Craig has died; Mrs. Craig has left the mission. John Alexander was suspended. Francis Shaviel dismissed. Daniel, Elisha and Gilbert are labouring at Lodiana and Sabbathu. But, on the other hand, additions have been made by the reception, on certificate, of John Gabriel and the wife of Samuel Wylie, and by the baptism of the wife of Theodore Wylie, John N. McLeod, and Samuel Wylie. Also, Mr. and Mrs. Woodside will soon join the mission. So that the state of the church will now stand as follows:

|------------------|----------------------|----------------------|
| Theodore Wylie,  | John Coleman,        | J. Caldwell,         |
| Wife of ditto,   | John Gabriel,        | Mrs. Caldwell,       |
| Samuel B. Wylie, | James Powell,        | J. R. Campbell,      |
| Wife of ditto,   | John Powell,         | Mrs. Campbell,       |
| John N. McLeod,  | William Powell,      | J. S. Woodside,      |
| Samuel Wylie,    | William Bradford,    | Mrs. Woodside,       |
|                  | Mrs. Petrie.         |                      |

Still a day of small things with us, but we trust better times are not far off. Pray for us, that the word of the Lord may have free course and be glorified with us, as it is with you.

Your affectionate, Christian brother,

J. R. CAMPBELL.

CORRECTION.

Our excellent missionary brother, Rev. J. R. Campbell, speaks in the last number of the Banner, of the present number of communicants in the Reformed Presbyterian church, and estimates it at four thousand. This, we are satisfied, is entirely too low. In 1844, the number published in the history of the churches in the United States, was four thousand five hundred. At a subsequent period in the same year, the statistics, though but imperfect, presented to General Synod, made it over five thousand. After a careful examination, we are persuaded that now it is say six thousand. We are, and always have been, indisposed to this "numbering of the people," for it is by the power of truth, and not the power of numbers, we hope for success in the exhibition of Reformed Presbyterian principles—still when the numbering is done, it need not be under-estimated. The increase of numbers will strengthen our good brother's argument for Foreign Missions. It is some half a century since the Reformed Presbyterian church was established in the United States. Before another half century, no doubt there will be far more than six thousand Christians in Northern India.

IMPORTANT DECISION.—The Sabbath a Day of Rest.—The case of Specht vs. the Commonwealth has at length been decided by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, now in Session at Harrisburg:—The following are the facts of the case:—The man Specht, who is one of the sect of Seventh Day Baptists, was indicted in Franklin county for working on the Sabbath, and fined by the Court. He appealed from the decision, in order to test the constitutionality of the law under which he was fined. Judge Bell delivered the opinion of the Supreme Court, affirming the proceedings of the Court below, and establishing the constitutionality of the law.

ORDINATION OF MR. H. GORDON.

On the 2d July, the Northern Presbytery of the Reformed Presbyterian church met in the city of Brooklyn, and ordained to the ministry, Mr. Henry Gordon, designating him a missionary to Nova Scotia, in pursuance of the request of Rev. Alexander Clarke and his people, for additional ministerial aid.

The sermon and charge were delivered by Rev. Dr. M'Leod, from Romans xi. 13,—“I magnify mine office.” Questions and ordination prayer by Rev. A. G. Wylie. Concluding prayer by Rev. D. J. Paterson. Benediction by Rev. Henry Gordon. The ordination was, in connexion with the sacramental solemnity, held for the first time in the Reformed Presbyterian church, Brooklyn; being on the evening of the communion Sabbath. A crowded and highly interested audience waited with patience on the exercises, and a very evident impression for good was made. God is reviving his cause, let his people rejoice. Mr. Gordon set out at once for his field of labour. His outfit was provided by the Ladies in connexion with Dr. M'Leod's church, New York, of which Mr. Gordon had been a member.

THE ENGLISH ESTABLISHED CHURCH.—A foreign correspondent of the National Intelligencer says:—“The Established Church is undergoing the ordeal of very searching and astounding statistics. The income of the clergy of the establishment is said to be upwards of 10,000,000*l.* per annum; whilst that of the clergy of all Europe, independent of Great Britain, is only about 7,000,000*l.* The arguments based upon and deduced from such statements are not favourable to the recipients of this immense revenue.”

ORGANIZATION OF FOURTH REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, PHILADELPHIA.

At the spring meeting of the Philadelphia Presbytery, in May last, a petition was presented by a number of the members of the Fairmount Congregation to be set as a separate congregation. The request was granted, and the Rev. J. A. Crawford and Mr. W. Montgomery, as a commission of Presbytery, organized the new congregation on the evening of the 10th of May last, under the name of the Fourth Reformed Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia. At the recent meeting of Presbytery, a unanimous call was presented for Rev. Dr. Crawford, which was sustained as regular, and an early day appointed for his installation.

LICENSURE OF MR. GEORGE LAMB.

At a recent meeting of the Reformed Presbytery of Philadelphia, Mr. George Lamb, having delivered the usual pieces of trial and sustained the customary examination, was licensed to preach the gospel. Rev. J. A. Crawford having requested supply for his pulpit in consequence of sickness, Mr. Lamb was appointed to preach in place for four Sabbaths, after which he is to go to the Western Presbytery. We hope his services may prove acceptable and useful, and that the blessing of the Most High may ever rest upon him.

CHURCH IN PRUSSIA.—A commission, nominated by the Prussian Minister of Worship, has published a scheme of regulations relative to the mode of forming the provincial Synods which are to nominate the Deputies to the General Synod. This plan, which seems intended to test public opinion, gives the ecclesiastical franchise to every male citizen of twenty-four years of age. The proportion of laymen would be much greater in the Synods than that of ecclesiastics. But the scheme would give, for the General Synod, about eighty-nine ecclesiastics among two hundred and thirty members, considerably more than a third. These two points are much contested in a protest published by MM. Tholuck, Julius Muller, Herzog, and Hupfeld, Professors of Theology at Halle. Other protests are spoken of. Moreover, it appears that Westphalia refuses to send deputies to a General Synod.

The Reformed Pastor at Konigsberg, Detroit, an ultra-rationalist, and suspended before the "transaction," has been restored to his office on the demand of the French Reformed Church, of which he was pastor. Such incidents as this show how much ecclesiastical rule in Prussia has been modified by recent political events.

STATISTICS.—The General Synod of the Associate Reformed Church of the West embraces thirteen Presbyteries, one hundred and eleven ministers, two hundred and forty-three churches, and sixteen thousand communicants.

The Associate Presbyterian Church, embraces fourteen Presbyteries, one hundred and eighteen ministers, two hundred and thirteen churches, and fifty thousand communicants.

The Associate Reformed Synod of New York consists of five Presbyteries, forty ministers, and four thousand five hundred and sixty-four communicants.

DEPARTURE OF MISSIONARIES.

The Rev. J. R. Campbell and Rev. J. S. Woodside, having completed the necessary arrangements for their departure to India, left this city on Saturday morning, July 29th, for Boston, at which place they purpose to embark. The public farewell meeting was held in the First Reformed Presbyterian Church on the preceding Sabbath evening, when their instructions were delivered by the Corresponding Secretary of the Board of Missions of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, and addresses made by the Missionary brethren and Rev. Drs. Cuyler, H. R. Wilson, and Wylie. The service was deeply interesting, the audience large and attentive. In our next number we hope to publish full accounts of this and several other meetings connected with the same event. While our readers are perusing these lines our brethren with their families are probably on the mighty deep. May He who rules both by land and sea have them in his holy keeping, and carry them safely to their desired haven, and, while on the ocean, may the Divine Spirit bless their labours and influence, to the eternal benefit of these who are with them in the ship.

SEPTEMBER, 1848.

INSTRUCTIONS ADDRESSED TO REV. JAMES R. CAMPBELL AND REV. JOHN S. WOODSIDE, IN VIEW OF THEIR DEPARTURE TO INDIA AS MISSIONARIES. DELIVERED AT A PUBLIC MEETING HELD IN THE FIRST REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, PHILADELPHIA; ON THE EVENING OF SABBATH, JULY 23, 1848.

REVEREND AND BELOVED BRETHREN,—The time appointed for your departure to your distant field of labour, among the heathen, has now drawn so near, that the present is probably the last opportunity which we shall enjoy of meeting with you in a public and official manner. We avail ourselves, therefore, of this solemn and deeply interesting occasion to express to you, for ourselves personally, and on behalf of the entire Christian community which we represent, our interest in your welfare, and our ardent desire for the success of your labours, and at the same time, to tender to you such instructions in reference to your conduct and operations as the position we occupy may seem to render suitable, while, also, we direct you to those sources of encouragement and support which may serve to sustain you in the very arduous and responsible, but most honourable and benevolent work in which you propose to engage.

You are aware, dear brethren, in some degree, of the deep concern which we feel in all your operations. The spirit of genuine Christianity is always a spirit of benevolence, and in proportion as men have been under its influence, have they endeavoured to promote the temporal and spiritual welfare of their fellow-beings. There may, indeed, be difference of opinion in regard to the means to be employed, or the measure to which the efforts made should be prosecuted, but it would be hard to find any one who claims to be a Christian, and yet avows himself an opponent of missionary exertion. We are thankful that the existence of a spirit of genuine religion throughout our own church is manifested by the interest which is universally felt among us, in regard to this great cause—an interest of which the most satisfactory evidence is afforded by the large amount which has been contributed to sustain it—an amount greater, in proportion to the number of our communicants, than in any other church, so far as known to us. We say this in no spirit of vain-glorious boasting, but simply to impress upon your minds, beloved brethren, the reflection that the cause to which you are devoted, is one in which we feel, as a church, a deep and pervading interest. We wish you to know that you are objects of the most earnest solicitude—that we often think of you, and pray for you, and that we always desire to hear from you. Feel then, dear brethren, that you are connected with us by a tie of the most holy and tender character, and while you may be absent from us in body, consider yourselves present with us in spirit, and ever one with us in heart. One of you has been long engaged in missionary work, and is now a veteran in the consecrated host. Both while he was in India, and during his brief visit to this land, he has received well merited evidences of our deepest regard and warmest love. The other of you has yet upon him the dew of his youth, but from the affection and respect which his entire conduct during his intimacy with us has excited, from the important position which he has been called to occupy, and from the fond hopes which we entertain in regard to his future career, he too is dear to our hearts, an object of our anxious concern. Both of you, as well as your estimable coadjutor, the Rev. Joseph Caldwell, at present in the field in India, are brethren beloved in the Lord, highly honoured for your work's sake, as well as for your own sake. The whole of our church looks to you with earnest desires for your happiness, and for your successful prosecution of the great and holy enterprise which she has committed to your care.

It is proper, therefore, dear brethren, that we tender to you such instructions in regard to your labours and behaviour, while you are engaged as missionaries, as we think will express the desires and views of the church which we represent. An arrangement having been made with the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church, by which they have, with great kindness, consented to take you under their care, placing you on the same footing as their own missionaries, and assuming the direction and management of the particular details of your labours, we refer you to the officers of that Board for instructions on these subjects. Your ecclesiastical relationship remaining unaffected, no principle or practice to which you are conscientiously attached is abandoned. The experience of that Board in conducting missionary operations, being so much larger and more extensive than our own, and the high moral character of the members who compose it rendering them worthy of all confidence, we feel great pleasure in placing you in this position. In time past the arrangement has been found to work well, and we anticipate only good in time to come. Indeed we feel rejoiced to be able to co-operate with any sister church in this glorious work, and we feel indebted and obliged to the Board of the General Assembly for the liberality, confidence and respect which they have uniformly manifested in their intercourse with us. We consider it a happy evidence, that though we are separated from each other in our ecclesiastical position, we yet serve the same Master, partake of the same Spirit, and may hope to enjoy, at last, the same glorious inheritance.

Saharanpur, which is the place where you propose to labour, is a city of Northern India, situated in latitude  $30^{\circ}$  N., and longitude  $78^{\circ} 30'$  E., about 100 miles N. of Delhi, the ancient capital of Hindustan, and 130 from Lodiāna, in the immediate vicinity of the Himalaya mountains. The population, consisting, with scarcely any exception, of native tribes, is about 85,000. As in other parts of India, idolatry has prevailed here in its most debasing and cruel forms, and the sensual, demoralizing doctrines of the False Prophet of Mecca, have many votaries. Nearly twelve years have now passed since our first missionary reached that place, and it may prove interesting for a few moments to contrast its religious state at present with its condition at that time. When first visited, the gloom of moral darkness which rested upon it was unbroken by a single ray of light, and while a thousand tongues loudly proclaimed the praises of imaginary deities, not one voice was heard to name the only Saviour. In the course of a few years two other missionaries from our church were sent out to the same place, and united with the beloved brother who had preceded them in proclaiming salvation by the crucified Redeemer. Of these, one dear brother yet remains, and at present bears alone the burden and heat of the day, prosecuting the work with great energy and perseverance. The other rests from his labours, though his works yet follow him. A life of humble and unobtrusive piety and consistent holiness, was accompanied by a single-hearted devotion to the cause of the Redeemer, and persevering labour in his service. He was called away in the prime of life, and in the meridian of his usefulness. We cannot murmur, since we have good reason to believe that to him to die was gain; and we feel sure that he is now more useful in the service of his Saviour than he ever was, or could have been on earth. We rejoice that he laboured not in vain, and we are thankful that from the united efforts of all missionary brethren, blessed by the HOLY SPIRIT, without which all human exertions are in vain, the wilderness has begun to blossom as the rose, and some first fruits have been gathered as the earnest of a plenteous harvest of immortal souls. A number of the heathen have given evidence of genuine conversion, and have been organized into a regular congregation. One church has been erected on the mission premises, and another is in progress in the heart of the city. Instruction in religious and secular knowledge has been communicated to a large number of youth, by means of Boarding and Day Schools. Parts of the Bible, and various religious works have been translated and widely circulated. The gospel has been preached to many thousands of idolaters, and the bread of life cast in great abundance upon the waters. It is true that all which is yet accomplished, is but a beginning, and may appear comparatively small, but we believe that important inroads have been made into the dominions of the Prince of Darkness, wide breaches already opened in the citadel of error, and influences put into operation which will soon produce consequences of the most pleasing character. Even in view of what has been already accomplished, we cannot but exclaim, "What hath God wrought!" and we feel that we ought to thank God for the past and take courage for the future.

The removal by death of our beloved brother Craig, led our Board to appeal earnestly to the members of our churches for some right-hearted man who would be willing to go forth to the heathen world, take up the fallen standard, and fill the place which had thus become unoccupied. The call was heard, and two young men in the Theological Seminary offered themselves for the solemn service. They were both, as far as man could judge, well qualified by their natural endowments, and by the possession of the graces of the Divine Spirit, to engage in the work. The question of sending them was left to be determined by the practicability of supporting them. The call for the necessary means was warmly urged by our zealous and indefatigable brother Campbell, who had been obliged to withdraw for a season from his field of labour in India, in consequence of the illness of his beloved consort, and who devoted his time whilst with us, not to self-indulgence and repose, but to severe and unremitting labour in the service of the church. His efforts were crowned with surprising success, and a liberality and zeal displayed far surpassing all our hopes. One of the candidates desiring to remain till after the meeting of Synod, the other only is now to be sent out in company with our beloved senior Missionary. The necessary arrangements for their departure having been completed, we are now assembled, Christian brethren, for the purpose of giving them our parting counsel before we bid them a long, and perhaps a final farewell.

Addressing you, therefore, beloved brethren, as the representatives of our General Synod, we proceed to give you such instructions as we think suitable to express the views and wishes of the church from which you receive your commission to preach the gospel. And,

First, We would refer to the general object of your mission. It is to make known to perishing sinners the way of salvation by the LORD JESUS CHRIST—your great work is to preach the gospel: stating in simple language, yet with earnestness and solemnity of manner, the great doctrines of redeeming grace—the sinful and guilty condition of the whole human family—their utter inability to renew their hearts, to expiate their sins, to procure eternal life—the sufficiency of the atonement of the LORD JESUS CHRIST, and the application of that atonement by the HOLY GHOST—the nature and necessity of saving faith, the duty of a life of holiness, and the blessed hope which the gospel presents to those who believe on the Son of God. These great doctrines you will make known to all as you have opportunity, not confining your instructions to the stated and formal exhibitions of the pulpit, but preaching by the way-side, in the streets, and market places, by the banks of rivers, and in short, wherever you can obtain any who will listen to your message. You will imitate in this respect the practice of the early heralds of the gospel, the example of our Saviour himself.

While, however, your teachings should have reference especially to religious truth, you will endeavour, to such an extent as may seem judicious, to communicate instruction in other departments of knowledge. In the land where you design to labour, the systems of philosophy and natural science in general acceptation, are derived from their sacred books. By showing the former to be false, you overthrow the authority of the latter, and thus remove one great obstacle to your success. Nor should you forget that the proper contemplation of the works of creation and providence is calculated to lead the heart to God, and to increase man's usefulness and happiness. In the entire absence of any institutions where such knowledge could be obtained, you may, with great propriety, engage in communicating it. For this purpose you have been furnished with a valuable collection of apparatus, which we trust you will so employ as to advance your main object, which is to bring sinners around you to the knowledge of the truth as it is in JESUS.

In regard to the persons to whom you are to address your instructions, we would remind you that your commission authorizes and requires you to preach the gospel to every creature. None are to be excluded from fear, or prejudice, or dislike. But we would especially recommend you to direct your efforts to the young. Great prominence has been given to this department of labour in the past history of the mission, a course warranted by scriptural authority, and attended with the happiest results—let, then, the young be your especial care—by day schools and boarding-schools bring them into regular and frequent communication with yourselves, and withdraw them as far as possible from the influence of the heathen society by which they are surrounded. Endeavour to make them understand the Scriptures, habituate them to a life of Christian holiness, and communicate to them such evidences of your regard as will serve to show the benevolence of Christianity, and to attach them to yourselves personally. Select from them such as appear most promising, to be trained for usefulness as assistants in the mission, and if qualified, to take part with you in the gospel ministry.

But you will not confine yourselves to oral instruction. The printed page may reach many who can never hear your voice. Employ, therefore, a suitable portion of your time in preparing works for the press and distributing them as may be judicious. The Scriptures have already been translated into many of the native languages, and we hope you will scatter far and wide the precious seed of divine truth. In some of the languages used in your vicinity the whole word of God has not as yet been published—we trust you will use your influence to hasten its completion until every one may read for himself the wonderful works of God. We are glad to find that so many of the sacred songs of the inspired collection have been translated in a metrical form, and we hope that a suitable version of the entire compilation will be soon made accessible. We are also glad that the Confession of Faith and the Shorter Catechism have been published in the native languages, and we hope such others of the symbolical books of our church as may be adapted to the capacity of the people, and their attainments in Christian knowledge, will from time to time be added. Dissertations and treatises of larger or smaller size, on religious, scientific, or literary subjects will, we hope, not be forgotten. The press is the great lever by which instrumentally to move the world—you must use it as a kind of substitute for the gift of tongues, availing yourselves, as far as possible, of the facilities which it affords to you.

You will not forget, dear brethren, that the church is a regularly organized society, her members duly ascertained, her officers properly constituted, her institutions carefully maintained, her laws conscientiously administered. Already the elements of Presbyterian order have been introduced in the organization of a church, and the constitution of a Presbytery. You will be careful to adhere to the forms and practices of the church in this land with which you are connected, as far as may be practicable and judicious in your peculiar circumstances. As soon as possible, “ordain elders in every city,” where you may establish a Christian church, and invest in due order with the office of the ministry such as you may think qualified to discharge its functions. Inculcate upon the members of the churches the duty of self-denial and benevolence, and while you are careful to let them see that you seek not theirs, but them, refrain not from stating and enjoining the obligation under which all men necessarily are placed of honouring God with their substance, and contributing as the LORD has prospered them for the support and extension of the gospel. It is our earnest desire that the churches formed among the heathen, should not only present a bright example of Christian purity and holiness, but also illustrate the comprehensive, universal benevolence of the Christian system. We wish to find them, therefore, supplying their own officers and teachers, and sustaining the ordinances among themselves; and still further, furnishing some who shall preach Christ crucified to those who may be at the time still more destitute than themselves, and thus aiding in the fulfilment of the injunction resting on the whole church wherever found, to teach all nations.

In making these suggestions, respected brethren, we are truly happy to be able to add, that we believe we are recommending to you no new or untried plans; we are only calling upon you to prosecute the same course as that which has been in times past so successfully followed. While, therefore, we may be mentioning only what has been already done, we think it proper by doing so to testify in this way our approbation, and to express our desire for its continuance.

You must be fully aware, beloved brethren, that your comfort and success in the work in which you are about to engage will depend very much on your own personal deportment, and to this, therefore, we would, in the second place, direct your attention. You go to the heathen, not to spend your time in ease and self-indulgence, not to accumulate wealth, not to escape the restraints of Christian influence and civilized society, but to spend a life of toil and self-denial in the service of the LORD JESUS CHRIST. You are eyed men. The heathen will quickly notice any inconsistencies between your character and your profession. The sincere followers of the Redeemer from Christian lands who may witness any misconduct will be deeply grieved and wounded, while the irreligious around you will regard you with contempt, and find in your failings a reason for unhallowed exultation. Above all, the eye of God is upon you, and you are surrounded by a great cloud of heavenly witnesses. The church at home also cannot fail to learn what are your movements, and how must Zion be wounded if her representatives and messengers prove unworthy of their position. We charge you, therefore, to be careful in regard to your entire deportment. Let your lives be lives of deep-seated, heart-pervading, all-controlling piety. Let your religious duties, whether public or private, be attended to with conscientious regularity. Be frequent and fervent in prayer, study carefully the word of truth, and daily walk with God by faith. Let your conversation be in heaven. Be denied to all ungodliness—abstain from all appearance of evil. Let not your superiority above the degraded heathen which your greater advantages cannot fail to cause, ever lead you to indulge any feelings of arrogance or pride. Be truly humble, and like your blessed Master, let each of you be among them as one that serveth—feel that you are not to be lords of CHRIST's heritage, but examples to the flock, and ever preach not yourselves, but CHRIST JESUS the LORD, and yourselves their servants for JESUS' sake. Be patient amidst all the privations you may experience and the afflictions you may endure—in all your trials remember that God has said HE will never leave you nor forsake you. Be not discouraged if you see not immediate or very speedy results arising from your labours. “Be patient until the coming of the LORD. Behold, the husbandman waiteth long for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it until he receives the former and the latter rain—be ye also patient and establish your hearts”—be industrious in the improvement of your time, arranging systematically your various duties and rigidly adhering to your plans—form your purposes with deliberation and great prudence, but when made do not abandon them hastily, but give any experiment you may be led to make, a sufficient trial, remembering that in your position especially, perseverance is almost essential to success. Cherish towards each other a spirit of pure and holy love—seek each other's sympathy in times of sorrow, and each other's counsel in times of doubt. Forbear with each other's infirmities, and cordially co-operate in all that may be calculated to promote not only the general good, but the happiness or usefulness of any of the brethren. Let no alienations of affection or division of counsel separate you from each other, and thus detract from your influence and diminish your comfort. Live in peace, and the God of love and peace shall be with you. In short, brethren, be diligent in business, be fervent in spirit, be always serving the LORD.

In your new abode you may expect, dear brethren, to be brought into contact with the followers of the Redeemer of other sections of the church; it is proper, therefore, in the third place, that we should advert briefly to your intercourse with brethren of other religious denominations. Recognise then, we would say, the principle that though there may be many branches, there is yet but one vine. Remember that the unity of the church arises essentially from the connexion of all her members with their living Head; wherever, then, you find any one who loves the LORD JESUS CHRIST in sincerity, regard him as a brother. While there may be points of difference which may separate you in your ecclesiastical organization, feel it to be your duty and your privilege to co-operate with the disciples of CHRIST with whom you may meet in every good work. In such cases as may render it proper, maintain your own peculiar views with candour and firmness, but treat with Christian courtesy and love those who may differ from you. Let the superiority of your religious creed be manifested by its influence, making your lives more holy, your labours more abundant, your entire characters more Christ-like.

Your relationship to the church at home, is the last point to which we would request your attention. Should you be spared to reach your destination, you will be, dear brethren, separated from us by a distance, according to the course of your journey, exceeding the world's circumference, yet you will not forget that we are united together in heart, and that we are also one in ecclesiastical communion. You are still members and ministers of the Reformed Presbyterian church; the Presbytery to which you will belong forms a constituent part of our General Synod. It is not likely, indeed, that we will often have the pleasure of seeing you personally in any of our church courts, but your absence may be in some measure supplied by your written communications; we desire, therefore, that you will be careful to send reports of your proceedings to be submitted to the Synod at its stated sessions, and we would also wish that there should be a free interchange of views on any subjects of interest to the cause of CHRIST; you will also feel the importance of keeping the church at home well informed in regard to your operations, and for this purpose will forward letters and journals with such other documents as may be suitable for publication. Correspondence with the ministers and members of the church generally, is also to be regarded as an important part of your work, tending to keep alive our interest in your movements, and thus by its reflex influence promote the welfare of the heathen among whom you labour. We are glad that the monthly concert of prayer has been long since established in your mission church, and we hope it will be kept up with great regularity. How delightful the reflection that your prayers and ours are blended together at that hallowed season before the throne of grace in heaven. And while, brethren, we assure you of our unceasing prayer for your success, we charge you not to forget us in your petitions—pray that the church at home may be kept pure—that her boundaries may be extended—that her zeal may be increased—her liberality become greater—her efforts more comprehensive, more persevering, and more vigorous. Let the light which we are endeavouring to throw upon benighted India be reflected home again—let us bear one another's burdens—let us be helpers of each other's faith.

You are engaged, beloved and respected brethren, in no common work, and you need no ordinary strength. If every gospel minister must cry out, "Who is sufficient for these things?" how much more must you! You are laying the foundations—you are planting the seed—an error now may be difficult to amend, and may be attended with very injurious and even fatal consequences. You are to be placed in the midst of the heathen; far separated from those hallowed influences which tend so much to cherish devotional feeling, and keep us near to God. You will find the impure religion of the heathen tending to corrupt your hearts, and to render sin more familiar, and perhaps less hateful; feel then, dear brethren, your need of divine support, let your sufficiency be of God. You have the promise of the Saviour's presence, you have the assurance of the SPIRIT's accompanying influences. Hardships, privations, discouragements, and afflictions you may expect to encounter, but they will all be light if you cast your burden on the LORD. Your God whom you serve is able to deliver you. He says to you, "Fear not, for I am with you; be not dismayed, for I am your God. I will strengthen you; yea, I will help you; yea, I will uphold you by the right hand of my righteousness." You are independent of immediate results, for it is the faithful, not only the successful servant who receives the crown. You may labour, and other men may enter into your labours, but yet both he that soweth and he that reapeth will rejoice together. The ultimate triumph of the truth is certain, and you may be sure that, though you may not live to see it, the whole earth shall be filled with "the glory of the LORD." "Messiah must reign until he shall have put all enemies under his feet." The developments of divine providence lead us to think that the time is near at hand when the Gentiles shall flock into the church as the doves to their windows, and nations shall be born in a day. Bright prospects are before you, and though your lips may be sealed in death, and your bodies may be mouldering in the grave before the results of your labours are developed, if you have lived for CHRIST, you cannot have lived in vain. As you now go forth bearing precious seed, you may be weeping, but yet you shall assuredly at the last come again rejoicing, bringing your sheaves with you. Go then, beloved brethren, in the strength of the LORD God—may you win many souls to CHRIST—may you do great things in his cause, and when you have fought the fight and finished your course and kept the faith, may the LORD, the righteous judge, give each of you the crown of unfading glory.

Missionary Intelligence.

FAREWELL MISSIONARY MEETINGS.

The departure for India of our missionary brethren, Rev. J. R. Campbell, and Rev. J. S. Woodside, with their families, naturally excited a deep interest in the various congregations of our branch of the church in this city, and also, we are happy to be able to add, among several of our sister churches, especially our Associate, and Associate Reformed brethren. Numerous and exceedingly agreeable and edifying meetings were thus occasioned, of which, however, our limited space will permit us to give only a very brief account.

From the intimate connexion which the missionaries had sustained to the Sabbath Schools of the churches with which they had been connected, the teachers and pupils of these schools were desirous to express to them their respect, affection and confidence, as well as to unite with them in religious exercises, and receive instruction from them in regard to that great and good work to which they were about to devote their lives. The Kensington Sabbath School Association held a meeting on the evening of Monday, July 17th, at which a copy of Lardner's Credibility of the Christian Religion, in ten volumes, a very valuable work, was presented to Mr. Woodside, who had been connected with the school since its organization. Mr. Pearson, on behalf of the Association, made an interesting address, to which Mr. Woodside responded in a very feeling manner. Some remarks were then made by Messrs. Montgomery and Steenson of the congregation, who were followed by Messrs. Hill and Wylie. We have received a full account of the proceedings, but, to our great regret, we are unable to find room for its publication.

On the evening of Thursday, July 27th, the Sabbath School Association of the First Reformed Presbyterian church held a meeting of a similar character. In the name of the Association, with which both of the missionaries had been connected, the superintendent of the school, Mr. G. H. Stuart, presented to Mr. Campbell a pair of gold spectacles, a case of mathematical instruments, and a beautiful and ingeniously constructed inkstand, and to Mr. Woodside, a valuable gold watch; after which, a collection of interesting and useful books was presented to Mrs. Campbell and Mrs. Woodside. Addresses were made by the missionary brethren and others who were present, and a deep interest appeared to be excited in the large audience who were present on the occasion.

Several meetings were also held for Sabbath School children. At one of these, persons were present from eight different schools, forming a very large and most delightful assemblage. Some of the philosophical apparatus purchased for the use of the mission schools in India was exhibited, and addresses were made by a number of ministers present. At a meeting on the following Sabbath with the pupils of the School of the First Reformed Presbyterian Church, an opportunity was afforded to all the pupils and teachers to obtain a parting grasp of the hands of the beloved missionaries.—It was a most interesting occasion, and the exercises so solemn and impressive, that we cannot doubt that an influence of the most favourable character was exerted. When these children arrive at the period of active life, what may we not expect from the impressions made by such meetings?

The general farewell meeting was held in the Eleventh Street Church, on the evening of Sabbath, July 23d. After singing, and prayer by Rev. Dr. Cuyler, the Corresponding Secretary of the Board read the instructions to the missionaries, which are to be found in another part of this number. Addresses were made by the missionaries, who were followed by Rev. Dr. Cuyler, Rev. Dr. H. R. Wilson, and Rev. Dr. Wylie. After prayer by Dr. Wylie, and singing, the meeting was dismissed. The audience was large, and appeared to feel a deep interest throughout the whole of the services.

The missionaries took their departure from this city on Saturday, July 29, in view of spending the following Sabbath in New York. Special arrangements having been made with the officers of the steamboat Sun, a large company assembled on board that boat, to accompany them to Burlington. During their passage up the river, devotional exercises were conducted, and addresses made by a number of ministerial brethren and others, the whole services being of the most impressive and affecting character. At Burlington, Mr. and Mrs. Campbell, with many tears, bade farewell to their two sons, whom they have left in this country, and to the large number of Christian friends, who had gone thus far with them to express their deep interest in their welfare and usefulness. During their short stay in New York, several interesting meetings were held, of which we have received the following account.

FAREWELL MEETINGS IN NEW YORK.

On Sabbath, July 31st, a farewell meeting of our missionary brethren and their families was held in New York. Rev. Mr. Woodside preached, in the morning, in Dr. M'Leod's church, and Rev. Mr. Campbell in the afternoon. At the close of the sermon, Dr. M'Leod delivered an address to the missionaries, assuring them of the continued interest taken in them and their work, by the Reformed Presbyterian church, New York, and, in the name of the congregation, commending them to God. Mr. Campbell responded in the name of the missionaries, and at the close of the service, hundreds bade them farewell.

At the request of several ministers of the General Assembly, and others, another meeting was held, in the evening, in Dr. M'Elroy's church. A large audience, composed of missionary friends from other congregations, and many clergymen, was present. The meeting was opened with prayer by Rev. Dr. M'Leod, and addresses were delivered by Hon. Walter Lowrie, Dr. M'Elroy, Rev. Mr. Rankin, Rev. J. R. Campbell, and Rev. John S. Woodside. The meeting was one of great interest, and an impression, powerful for good, evidently made.

The last meeting was held in the house of Dr. M'Leod, on Monday, between the hours of 10 and 12, M. It had been announced that it would be purely devotional, and the apartments were crowded with friends who had appeared to take leave. A delightful and chastened hour was spent in prayer and praise. All felt it good to be there. The fountains of the heart were opened, and many a petition ascended to the throne, in behalf of the departing friends. God will hear the prayers of his own prompting. In the afternoon the missionaries and many friends set out for Boston, where they remained till the morning of the following Thursday.

On the morning of their departure from Boston, a meeting was held in the Ladies' parlour of the hotel at which they were lodging, and another on board the vessel. Both were deeply affecting. Every heart appeared to be touched, and with fervent supplications and strong faith, the beloved missionaries were committed to the care of the great Watchman of Israel, and to the guidance of his HOLY SPIRIT. The following account is taken from a Boston newspaper, with some slight modifications and corrections.

SAILING OF MISSIONARIES.

MESSRS. EDITORS,—Your insertion of the following notice may be gratifying to some of your readers.

On Thursday, the 3d inst., the Rev. James R. Campbell, his wife and two children, accompanied by the Rev. Jno. S. Woodside and lady, sailed from this port, in the ship Dolphin for Calcutta. Mr. Campbell has previously laboured as a Missionary in Saharunpur for above eleven years. He returned to Philadelphia in October last for the benefit of Mrs. Campbell's health, to leave his two sons, Thomas and James, (of the ages of 12 and 10 years,) for their education, and to reinforce his missionary company.

These brethren, together with the Rev. Joseph Caldwell, (who has been the assistant of Mr. Campbell for the last six years, and has now charge of the station in his absence,) belong to, and are supported by the General Synod of the Reformed Presbyterian Church in this country. They have an auxiliary connexion with the board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church, and act as a Presbytery subordinate to their own synod. The missionary spirit of this synod is worthy of imitation. Numbering about 34 settled congregations, its members support three foreign missionaries, with their families and helpers—and as an evidence of their zeal, (many of them living in rural districts, and remote from markets,) on a visit from Mr. Campbell, they contributed about five thousand dollars for his present outfit.

As a token of their fraternal regard, about fourteen persons from Philadelphia and New York, "accompanied" the Missionaries "to the ship."

On Thursday morning, for nearly two hours, religious exercises were conducted, by the above persons, and other friends residing in this city, in one of the parlours of the Merchants' Exchange, previous to their embarkation. The exercises were commenced with a brief address by the Rev. Jno. N. McLeod, D. D., of New York, who presided, and was followed in prayer by the Rev. Jno. C. Lowrie, assistant secretary of the Presbyterian board of New York—by the Rev. T. W. J. Wylie, Corresponding Secretary of the board of missions of the Reformed Presbyterian church—George H. Stuart, Esq., a ruling elder from Philadelphia, and by the Rev. Alexander Blaikie of the Associate Reformed Presbyterian church of this city.*

At intervals the company joined in praise, singing in the metrical version from the second Psalm.

"Ask of me, and for heritage
The heathen I'll make thine;
And, for possession, I to thee
Will give earth's utmost line."

* We would take the opportunity to express thus publicly on behalf of the missionaries and the board, our acknowledgments of the kind attentions of Rev. Mr. Blaikie of the Associate Reformed Church in Boston.

And from the 23d Psalm ending,

“Goodness and mercy all my life
Shall surely follow me:
And in God’s house, for evermore,
My dwelling-place shall be.”

A brief address of the most affecting nature, was then given by the senior missionary, after which the junior one followed. The exercises were then closed by the apostolic benediction, pronounced by the Rev Mr. Campbell.

While the larger number of the friends, “sorrowing, most of all, that they should see their faces no more, accompanied” the missionaries “to the ship,” and there took their final “farewell,” others availed themselves of the opportunity of returning by the steamer which towed their vessel to the bay. The final parting of Messrs. Wylie, Stuart Darragh and M’Leod, Jun., (who were of this party) from them, was one of deep emotion.

Different portions of scripture were read and observations made. A portion of the word of God was then sung from the 91st Psalm.

“He that doth in the secret place
Of the Most High reside,
Under the shade of him that is
Th’ Almighty, shall abide.

“I of the Lord my God will say,
He is my refuge still;
He is my fortress and my God;
And in him trust I will.

Assuredly he shall thee save,” &c. &c.

Then the apostolic benediction closed the worship in which beloved friends had engaged, and which they hope to resume in heaven.

The Dolphin, with her officers, passengers, and crew, (in all, twenty-one souls,) now stood out for the Atlantic, and the returning steamer soon rendered the distance too great for vision to her sorrowing passengers who had bidden these heralds of the cross “God speed.” May we not hope that some of the fifteen souls with them in this ship, these “servants of the most high God” may be instrumental in “showing the way of salvation;” especially as the senior member was an instrumentality honoured of Christ, on his former voyage to Calcutta, in the conversion of a part of the crew with which he then sailed.

A colporteur, with a basket of books and tracts, on his errand of benevolence, reached the ship just at her departure, and added much to the interest of the moment. “Casting his bread upon the waters, may he find it after many days.”

It will be pleasing to our readers to learn that the ship Dolphin, in which our brethren have sailed, is an excellent vessel, having the character of a safe and rapid sailer, and affording unusually good accommodations for so long a voyage. The captain and crew appear to be kind and obliging as well as skilful, and all the circumstances attending their departure seemed to be of the most auspicious character. Our brethren anticipated a very pleasant voyage, and hoped to have opportunities of much usefulness on board the ship. We trust the prayers of all our readers will be constant and fervent in their behalf, and that we may soon be able to announce their arrival at the port of their destination.

EXTRACT OF A LETTER FROM REV. J. CALDWELL.

Saharanpur, June 7th, 1848.

DEAR BROTHER STUART,—Your kind and welcome communication of March 24th came duly to hand a day or two ago. I thought, when I wrote to Mr. Wylie, in March last, that I should certainly write to Philadelphia in April again, but from some cause or other, my writing has been postponed till this time.

Instead of my fourth scrap on India, please accept the enclosed few notes of a short missionary tour. I shall, probably, send you some extracts from my home journal one of these days.

You express a wish that I should write much oftener than I do. Well, I think, myself, I ought to write a little more frequently; but, these days, I really have so much business on hand, that I scarcely know whether I would be justifiable in spending a larger portion of my time in writing home. I think I mentioned, in my last letter to you, that I had commenced the building of our Hindustani church. The superintending of this building, which, of itself, is almost enough to occupy one's whole time, has been superadded to my other numerous duties. I am thankful to state that the building is now nearly erected, and part of it roofed. The rains have set in, this season, one whole month earlier than usual. On this account, I have had considerable anxiety about the unfinished building. Very heavy rains have already fallen, but the building has sustained little or no injury yet. Notwithstanding, should a continuous rain of several days occur, as is frequent in this country during the rainy season, the walls, while in their present state, might receive considerable injury. "We must hope for the best" in the case. The whole building, inside and outside, is to be plastered with lime and mortar. Were the outside once plastered, the walls would be quite secure against rain. I hope that within a week from this, I shall have all the outside work finished. The site of our new church, I must repeat, is one of the best that could be obtained any where, either in the city or its suburbs. It has, to be sure, cost considerable to fill it up to a proper height. The spot being just on the bank of a small stream, was some 10 or 12 feet lower than much of the surrounding ground. The foundation walls, therefore, of the building had to be built proportionably high, and both inside and outside of them, earth filled in to a height corresponding to the ground in its immediate vicinity.

I am grateful to state that matters, generally, at the station are prospering. The English school, it is true, is not in a very flourishing condition, and I believe this is owing, in part at least, to the fact of a number of the lads who generally attend our institution, keeping back until the school is opened in our new church, near the city. The orphan lads, to whose number one has been added since I last wrote, seem to be still getting on about as well as could be expected. The native brethren are all in good health, and are moving on as heretofore. Preaching is performed by me as hitherto, in Urdee, twice on the Sabbath, and on Wednesday evenings our prayer meeting in the same language, is still held weekly; nor must I neglect to mention our Bible class in Urdee, held, as hitherto, each Friday, and continues as interesting as before. The two young men of the former Orphan Institution, Theodore Wylie and Samuel B. Wylie, still prosecute the study and translation of McDowell's Bible-class manual. I spend as much of each day as I can command in the study of the native languages. Although I am able to preach, with some degree of fluency, in Urdee, and I believe am generally understood, yet I consider it my duty to make still farther progress in the acquirement of that language, and also of Hindi.

I am rejoiced at the prospect of brother Campbell bringing with him two other brethren to labour here. May the Lord protect them all till they reach India.

My family and self are quite well—thanks to our heavenly Father. Mrs. C. joins me in kind, Christian affection to yourself, Mrs. S., and all our Philadelphia friends.

Your affectionate brother in Christ,

J. CALDWELL.

NOTES OF A MISSIONARY TOUR, FROM SAHARANPUR TO DELHI, AND RETURNING.

December 7th, 1847. Aba. A small town. Left Saharanpur yesterday accompanied by one of our catechists, Theodore Wylie, and arrived at this place a little before dark last evening. My route to Delhi lies along the bank of the Drab canal, and is furnished with a staging bungalow at the end of each march of twelve or fifteen miles, in which we may make a temporary stay with considerable comfort.

Enjoyed a favourable opportunity this morning of preaching to a number of the inhabitants of this place. My audience, however, consisted chiefly of Mahomedans, who generally attend the preaching of the gospel with the view of opposing it. After my address, one of this class commenced to offer their usual arguments against Christianity. "God," said he, "cannot be a father. He is immaterial; he is Light of light, and it is highly sinful to speak of him as of a material being. Why then do you teach that God is the Father of Jesus Christ?" I endeavoured first to set him right on the subject of Christ's Sonship, and then to correct his opinion respecting the Divine essence. "You allege," said I, "that God is immaterial. This is entirely correct. But then you say 'God is Light;' which, as you understand the phrase, declares Him to be material; according to your own argument you are mistaken on this subject." The Mahomedans constantly urge, that they consider all attempts to represent God by any thing material, as gross idolatry; and yet no expression is oftener in their mouths in their discussions with missionaries, than "Allah nur hai"—God is Light. This expression, in the sense of the apostle, is one of the most sublime ever uttered; but as the poor ignorant Mahomedan understands it, it is erroneous in the extreme, for he takes it in its literal acceptation.

December 8th. Berkheri. An insignificant village. This morning I had for an audience a group of Hindus who paid the closest attention to my discourse. One man, after I had finished my address, intimated that God had made us like himself. This gave me an excellent opportunity of explaining to him and the crowd around, the Scriptural doctrine on this subject. It is quite remarkable, that some of the doctrines of Scripture are occasionally, as if by accident, hinted at by the natives here, in their intercourse with the missionaries. A few weeks ago, while on my way to our annual meeting, I was one day, as usual, preaching to a crowd in the bazaar of a small town, when an individual in the crowd, of his own accord, introduced in pretty plain terms, the doctrine of original sin. Some of our modern Pelagians might have been put to shame by that unenlightened heathen. His view was, not that we are sinners simply because we are the offspring of sinful parents, but that we are involved in the guilt of our first father's transgression. How the man came by this piece of knowledge, I am unable even to guess. I merely state what came under my own observation on the occasion referred to.

Bhainswal. A small town. Was prevented from entering the town this morning to preach, the whole place being surrounded by water in some places to the depth of several feet. I however met with a good number outside the town, to whom I preached for nearly an hour, and humbly hope not altogether in vain. My audience again attentive. They intimated that they were severely dealt with by Providence. Some lake or other piece of water in their neighbourhood had burst its bounds, flowing down round their town, and almost cutting off their communication with the surrounding country. This had been the state of things too, for some months. I endeavoured to improve the subject of their calamity to their spiritual advantage. The Lord grant that they may not be cut off from the means of salvation.

Baranth. A large town. I feel thankful for the excellent opportunity I enjoyed this morning, of making known the way of salvation to a large crowd of people at this place. On my way into the city, having to pass by a native manufactory of sugar, I stopped to inquire something about the process. This brought a number of people around, to whom my catechist made quite a sensible address on the general subject of salvation through Christ. Having reached the bazaar, my catechist made a second short address, during which a large crowd collected. I endeavoured to improve the occasion, by instituting the inquiry, "Where shall salvation be found?" "Will washing in the Ganges," I asked, "remove our guilt?" "Shall we be made holy by visiting Hindu shrines?" "Will worshipping idols save us?" My audience listened attentively to all I had to advance against their mode of worship. I next endeavoured to point them to the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world. O may some of them at least, believe on him to the saving of their immortal souls.

Sabbath—Daula: a considerable town. Yesterday evening, on my way hither, I had the pleasure of meeting brother and sister Morrison, who were on their way up the country. Having met them on the march, our interview was necessarily confined to a very short time. The few minutes, however, which we had to spend together were well improved. Spent a couple of hours to-day in the bazaar, quite profitably, as I trust. My catechist having made an address to the crowd, of some length, I commenced to read to them the account of the giving of the law on the Mount Sinai, and then spent a considerable time in explaining and enforcing the subject. I afterwards took occasion to animadvert on the character and conduct of some of their duties, which was taken in good part by all except one man, who seemed disposed to enter into disputation. He intimated that as obedience to the officers of the government of the country was obedience to the government itself, so worship of the inferior deities was the same thing as worship of the Supreme Being. It was, of course, an easy matter to meet his objections.

Monday—Same place. I enjoyed another excellent opportunity, this morning, of making known the way of salvation to a large crowd, most of whom had never before heard of Jesus, the Saviour. After my catechist had finished, I addressed them on the subject of Christ's incarnation. Near the end of my discourse, I was surprised by hearing a respectable-looking Hindu intimate that their brahmins lead them astray from the way I had just been showing as the only way of salvation, and which he admitted to be the right one. I replied, that their brahmins, being their religious guides, ought to direct them to the true God, and that if they did not, they were, of course, much greater sinners than the common people, who were, generally, like blind men, groping their way to their home—they wished to reach their Heavenly Father's house, and surely it was the bounden duty of their spiritual guides to lead them thither, at least to teach them the way thither. When leaving the crowd, I overheard an individual remark on the propriety of worshipping the Creator as I had told them.

Katanli—A pretty large town. Spent a few days in Delhi with Mr. Thompson, Missionary of that place, and am thus far on my way homeward. My journal, which I generally write daily, has been neglected for some days past; indeed I had but little to record, having made very rapid marches from Delhi to this place. Arrived so late this evening that I was unable to accomplish any thing in the bazaar; but this is the less to be regretted, as I shall, if spared, spend to-morrow here, (the Sabbath.)

Same Place.—A good number, this morning, listened first, for a short time, to my catechist, and afterwards to myself, while the fundamental doctrines of grace were made known to them. After I had finished, an individual inquired of me how long Hindustan had been inhabited. His object appeared to be to intimate, that since this country had been inhabited for so many thousands of years, and the Hindu religion being co-eval with the people, must of course be true. The Hindus, when contending for the truth of their religion, almost invariably adduce its antiquity as an irrefragable proof of its divine character.

Muzaffarnagar.—A much larger audience than usual attended the proclamation of the gospel, this morning, at this place. By almost the whole of the crowd, too, a serious attention was paid. Before declaring to them the only way of salvation, I, as I have frequently done before, asked whether their Brahma, their Siva, or their Vishnu, could redeem us from sin, and its awful consequences. Amongst other evil deeds recorded in their Shasters of those three deities, called by them triden, I referred to the story of their going, with the worst design, to the house of Anasupa, the wife of Atri Muni, and one of the most virtuous of women. It appears that they all three assumed the disguise of mendicants, and went to this lady's door begging alms. She came out to offer them food, which they refused, and at the same time stated that she must undress herself and serve them up a dinner, or they would go off without giving her the opportunity of acquiring merit by bestowing charity on holy men, as they were. Anasuya, alarmed at hearing this, took her husband's leave, and proceeded to comply with their wish; but, just as they were about to sit to dinner, she took a little water and sprinkled on them, when they instantly became little children, "and were greatly ashamed." Having fed them, she put the whole three to sleep in a cradle, nor were they released till their wives came and most importunately interceded for them. "How," cried I, "can such gods save you, or can your idols grant you salvation?" One man endeavoured to bring forward the old apology for idol-worship. He alleged just what the papists offer as an apology for the use of images in their church—that they were needed to aid their devotions! O may the time soon arrive when they shall cast their idols to the moles and bats, and worship the true and living God.

QUESTIONS.—For you, my reader, are they—young or old, rich or poor, male or female. I wish to have you answer them, if you can.

1st. Are not the six hundred millions of heathen, who are perishing in ignorance of the gospel, famishing spiritually?

2d. Is the famishing of the soul less lamentable than that of the body?

3d. Are not those six hundred millions famishing for the bread of life, dependent on us, who have it, for a supply of it?

4th. Has not our Lord Jesus Christ told us to supply them with it?

5th. If they are as truly dependent on our sending it, as on his providing it, should not we be as willing to devote our lives to carrying or sending it, as he was to devote his to providing it?

6th. If we refrain from many expenditures which fashion demands, that we may do the more to save them, will it cost us more than it did him, to leave heaven, and go to the manger, the garden, and the cross, to save men?

7th. If we refrain from many expenditures for which taste pleads, that we may be able to do more for them, shall we do more than he did for us, when he took the form of a servant, and subjected himself to contempt and insult, and a public execution with criminals?

8th. If we even deny ourselves some comforts and conveniences, for their benefit, shall we be going farther in self-denying benevolence than he did?

9th. Was he more benevolent than he would have us be?

10th. Would it be more painful for us to refrain from many expenditures which fashion demands, and for which taste pleads, and even deny ourselves many comforts and gratifications, for the sake of giving them the gospel, than it would be for them, if we should not give it, to "have their part in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone?" (See Rev. xxi. 8.)

11th. If it would not, then is it not our privilege and duty thus to refrain and deny ourselves?

12th. Would you not be more Christ-like, more happy, and more useful, if you should do it, than you would be, if you should not?

13th. Will you do according to your answers?

MOVEMENT AMONG THE ITALIAN CLERGY.

We quote the following from "Eco di Savonarola," of last month, which cannot but be interesting to every Protestant, as it is a most significant sign of the state of feeling in Italy, as to Clerical Celibacy. "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear." "We have heard, by letter, that there are upwards of fifty priests in Italy who intend to leave the Church of Rome, if the Pope will not permit them to take lawful wives. God grant that this example may be followed by that portion of the ecclesiastics who have not been plunged into the darkest criminality by the law of celibacy." On this important announcement, the London Patriot makes the following remarks: "The Pope cannot grant his priesthood this freedom. He cannot change the system of Romanism, and, therefore, we must understand that an appeal to him in this case would be merely a matter of form; but that his necessary refusal might be taken as a grievance, and made the fulcrum on which to rest a movement for Ecclesiastical Reform. Whatever be the proposal of these Italian priests, it may be hailed as another symptom of the disorganization of Popery on the Continent, and is, at the same time, a challenge and an encouragement to the friends of Italy to pour into that country a constant stream of evangelical instruction. No time should be lost in taking advantage of this opportunity."

Theological Discussions.

SCATTERED THOUGHTS ON ZION'S PROSPECTS.

"By whom shall Jacob arise? for he is small." This language, expressive of unbelieving despondency, ought never to pass the lips of the child of God; but when used in view of the pardoning mercy of God in Christ, and under a persuasion of the all-sufficiency of our Almighty Father, as giving utterance to earnest, confiding expostulation of soul at the throne of grace in the day of trouble, it is appropriate, dutiful, and consolatory. Except our Father in heaven, in the time of Jacob's calamity, none can save; and with him we are authorized to employ the strong language of an humble, earnest, and fiducial entreaty: Come, and let us reason together. In this spirit the prophet addressed himself to the hearer of prayer, when he used the language now quoted.

Jacob is, and indeed always has been, comparatively small. Little reason has any department of the true Church of God, in point of numbers or earthly power, to exult over any smaller portion of the family to which they belong. The largest section of the visible Zion is, as to numbers and worldly splendour, small when compared with the antichristian empire, that of the impostor of Mecca, or the pagan world. The largest part, as well as the smallest, has ample reason to plead for the compassion of heaven, in the language of the prophet of Tekoah, — By whom shall Jacob arise? for he is small.

The source of consolation and the support of faith are found in the declaration — Not by might nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord. The reproof, too, of unbelief encourages hope. Who hath despised the day of small things? Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom. It should not be forgotten that mere numbers, whether few or many, prove nothing either for the goodness of a cause, or its final success. The cause of Zion, with which the devout and enlightened Christian has identified himself, is, in the light of eternal truth, judged of by its own intrinsic worth; and his ground of confidence for final success he seeks, not in the numbers, nor in the earthly treasures of those professing adherence to it, but in the approbation and promise of his God. That of which God approves is good; and what he promises to sustain and bless shall succeed. In the assurance of this the soul of the good man finds repose. Yet this assurance is no security against temporary disappointments, and, in our estimation, long delays in, and much opposition to the gaining of that which is so much desired by the sanctified heart,—the triumph of true religion over falsehood, delusion, criminal dispositions, evil doings, and their dreadful effects. He who presides over all and with whom is the residue of the Spirit, has warned his people of what for many ages they might expect. "If ye were of the world, the world would love its own; but because ye are not of the world, therefore the world hateth you." To any community, in an evil age—in a bad state of society, it is no flattering consideration that its numbers are great, and that they are in friendship with the world. Such circumstances seem to be a call on those whom it concerns seriously to institute the inquiry, whether the spirit and the principles of an evil world have not made an entrance, and among them found a pleasant lodgment. The friendship of the world is enmity with God. This is an awful announcement. A worldly sanctuary is not the sacred abode of him who is glorious in holiness.

But it behooves us to remember that the Redeemer's flock will not always be a little one. The handful of mountain corn shall spring up like the trees of Lebanon; and the little stone cut out of the mountain without hands, is destined itself to be a mountain which shall fill the earth. In the grace of the Saviour men shall every where be blessed, and all nations shall call him blessed. For the realization of these announcements, the church is called on to put forth her exertions, diligently to employ her children, and use her means; and that with patience and perseverance. That she may not be discouraged by reverses, apparent delays, or disappointed expectations, by the voice of prophecy she and her children are distinctly admonished of long ages in which iniquity shall reign over the fairest regions of our world, and amidst the accumulations of wealth and grandest displays of civilization, a counterfeit religion shall triumph against the true. "The Holy City shall be trodden under foot." The Woman, the Bride, the Lamb's wife, and her consecrated progeny, shall be exiles in the wilderness. In the recesses of that wilderness state the most faithful of her offspring may expect to pitch their tent. So it has come to pass, and thus it is. Those ages of darkness and misrule have not yet passed away. On the rights of man a blighting influence in every quarter of the globe is felt, proceeding from this "man of sin;" and, in one form or another, in every Christian community, is experienced the malign effect of his strong delusions, in the production of evil. As long as this bad condition of the world continues, the purer portion of the church cannot be "very large." Under such circumstances, something else than fewness of numbers must be found as matter of reproach, or cause of shame.

During the agitations of centuries, in many a dark and cloudy day, the Reformed Presbyterian Church has been sustained by an unhesitating faith in the covenant promises of the God of Zion. It is true, in numbers and earthly resources she has become smaller than she once was. This she knows and feels; and, since left by her other Presbyterian friends in a position somewhat distinctive and alone, she has calculated that, for an appointed time, such must be her condition. On this score she experiences at present no disappointment. And though with her the social principle is sufficiently strong to make her sensible of the undesirableness of a very limited fellowship, yet under existing circumstances she does not despond. With her Redeemer and Head is the residue of the Spirit; and her cause, she is persuaded, is his, which at the appointed season he will remember and revive. Thus she pleads:—O Lord, revive thy work in the midst of the years: in wrath remember mercy.

In referring to the Reformed Presbyterian Church, a respectable periodical has said,—and, as we take it, in no unkindness of spirit,—that, “This body is small—and on account of its distinctive principles is never likely to be very large.” Never likely to be very large. With the respectable author of that opinion, though he accedes not to his judgment, the Reformed Presbyterian will have no dispute. It is believed the subject, by him, has been viewed through a hazy medium, and all that is needful to bring him to a more correct decision is the seeing of the matter as it is in itself. The mists by which it is enveloped will pass away. They shall be dissipated by the sun of a brighter day. When, on this subject, smallness or enlargement is spoken of, the chief bearing is on the principles; for adherence to it by men is rather an incidental matter. If those “distinctive principles” be false, they ought not to have adherents; if founded in the eternal truth of God, the paucity of the numbers that embrace them at any specified period presents no insurmountable obstacle to their success. But what are those “distinctive principles” of this body, if indeed they have such, that are so repulsive to the human mind as to secure at all times a general rejection? It may be well to ascertain how far this disrelish of them, in our own times, is referrible to the principles in their own character, or to a consistent profession of them, or to a morally bad condition of the public mind. If there be nothing particularly objectionable in the two former of these causes, and the true cause of disrelish be found in the last only, an adherence to the first and a perseverance in the second may be found the most effectual means of removing the obstacle to the enlargement of the body. A sound principle meeting a sound state of the public mind will soon tell in the happy results. But let us see what these “distinctive principles” are. We give a summary of them.

I. The supreme dominion of the Lord Jesus Christ over his own Church, and all things for his Church, specially exercised in the giving of her system of doctrine, laws, ordinances of worship, principles of government, and form of order, to the exclusion of human contrivances, and the rejection of all usurped dominion, in these matters, by Popes, Kings, or mass multitudes of men.

II. That in accordance with the requisitions of the divine law in the hand of Christ the Mediator, where it is revealed, men ought, as individuals, and in the social relations of life, that is, in the domestic circle, in the church, and in the commonwealth in affairs of state, to know, and acknowledge God to be the only true God, and THEIR God; and in their respective spheres, and by the means appropriate to those spheres, to worship, serve, and glorify him accordingly.

III. That in the Church, Christians, whilst to a great extent bearing with the infirmities of the sincere and upright in heart, ought to discountenance all false principles in doctrine, worship, order, and morals, as calculating, by corrupting and dividing, to injure the household of God; and in the State, to refuse allegiance to every constitution of government that is in hostility to the kingdom of Christ, or the natural rights of man.

These positions, so far as "distinctive principles" are concerned, cover all that is peculiar in the profession of this church. In the maintenance of these principles she is decided, and with opposition to them uncompromising. Believing them to be sustained by the authority of God, while in the profession and practical application of them she is conscious of great infirmity and many defects, which she laments, she desires to be upright and consistent, fully persuaded that to the principles themselves and to their complete development and application in life, there is no hostility but that which arises from the bad state of the human heart, the manifestations of that bad state of heart in a bad condition of society, and in a morally corrupt public opinion, by which that bad condition of things is sustained. Well assured, at the same time, that these evils, great and deplorable as they confessedly are, may be and will be removed by the church's clear, full, faithful, and emphatic ministerial exhibition of the whole truth, through her ordinances and under the regulations of her firm, temperate and spiritual order; with all of which she is intrusted. Let the church understand her means, feel her power, and refusing the world's bribes, put forth that power in the name of her living Head, and the mouth of iniquity as now opened in a profane and senseless public clamour will soon be stopped. In the "distinctive principles" of the Reformation, it is not believed that there is any thing to forbid a belief, a well grounded assurance that those who profess them shall be very numerous. Let us keep in mind what these distinctive principles are, and with candour consider the evidence for and against their prevalence. Consider,—

1. That there is no greater obstacle to their spread and extensive adoption than there is to the universal circulation of the Bible, the understanding of its discoveries, and the universal adoption of its principles, laws, and institutions. The universal spread of the scriptures and reception of their truths form the aim and hope of every Bible society and Bible agent. All know that this end is yet but partially obtained; but when gained, it will present the result sought by those supposed distinctive principles. That the body professing those principles will be large, is just as probable as that the number who shall receive, understand, believe, profess, truly and fully act on Bible truths, will be large. The name, names, or nick-names of parties may and doubtless will cease; what we speak of is substantial faith and character, embodied in the profession of the cause of Jesus Christ.

2. That few well understand, fully believe, or consistently profess and advocate those principles, is no reason why they may not at a future day universally prevail. The prospect of their final triumph, to the eye of reason, is not so dark as that before the eleven obscure missionaries of the cross in the evening of that day on which the commission of the Redeemer was given to them to go forth in the work of saving a world then in arms against him and them. And at later periods, how unpromising, in the conclusions of mere human probabilities, the missions of Wicklif, of "the child of the Swiss mountains," and of the Monk of Wittemberg, when going forth to battle with the legions of the "man of sin!" Yet they succeeded in commencing and, to an extent exceeding expectation, in carrying on a great work—work yet in progress. To that work these "distinctive principles," so lightly esteemed, are the very life's blood; and when the friends of that Reformation shall understand, consistently and practically profess them, which they will do, that work will have its consummation. Thus we cherish the confidence that the body professing those distinctive principles, and through means of them, shall be very large. The doctrine of Christ's headship alone will be found "a living principle of life."

3. Of all this the whole tenor of the volume of prophecy assures us. In that dark page, Rev. xi., which contains the melancholy delineation of the desolations of the holy city, of the exile of the woman to the wilderness for many ages; and of the mournful fact, that among her children, only two, during those long ages, would be found as witnesses fully to assert Messiah's claims as Head of Zion, and as the Prince of the kings of the earth,—My two witnesses,—by which character they are distinguished from their brethren of the Woman's seed—in that dark page we have the assurance given that those two witnesses for Immanuel's rights, in their plea for the moral order of society, according to the word of God, though they shall be slain, shall rise again; and with them the cause of God and man; then the sanctuary shall be cleansed, and "the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ." Then the body professing those distinctive views shall be very large; for the kingdom and the dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High,—and all dominions shall serve and obey him.

4. In the belief of these "distinctive principles," so called, Reformed Presbyterians are not absolutely alone. Good men, ministers and others, among the churches, give them credit and rejoice in the persuasion of their ultimate prevalence. The truth is, that the extensive combination of gospel doctrines held in common by all evangelical parties, to have its full effect requires the development, in profession and in action, of these supposed peculiar views. In a special manner true Presbyterianism in the fulness of its scheme, embraces them all. Hence it is the destined instrument, we think, of reforming and blessing the world. Partially as it has been employed it has done much; but what from untoward circumstances, what from an unworthy mixing and dilution of her principles and sacred institutes with foreign and heterogeneous material, and what from the recreancy of not a few of her misguided children, the Presbyterian Church, in no land, has been able to bring the hallowed principles of her system to fully bear, as it is capable of bearing, on the personal character and social state of men. Obstacles, however, shall cease to be in the way, and a true, pure, enlightened, and liberalizing Presbyterian influence shall go forth and be felt to the ends of the earth. Then the body will not be reckoned by a few thousands, but by millions; it will be Reformed Presbyterian indeed, and it will, mauger all the misgivings of worthy men, be very large. Then, too, no occasion will be found for Presbyterians to look askance upon each other. Why should they now? Are they not brethren?

5. To the confirmation of a living hope, on this subject, many an interesting event of Providence has lent its aid. To such events Reformed Presbyterians, as well as others, have not been altogether inattentive. The remarkable revolution of 1688 in the British Isles; in the eighteenth century, the two secessions from the revolution church of Scotland; the American revolution of 1776, and that of France in 1798; the disruption of the Presbyterian church in the U. S. in 1838, giving to one portion of that body a higher position than it ever had before; the remarkable secession of the Free Church of Scotland in 1843, by which a very noticeable approximation has been made to the platform occupied by the Reformed Presbyterians of this land; in all of which events, under one aspect or another, several of the points deemed distinctive have had a justification. And what shall we say of the agitations and revolutions at present convulsing so extensively the nations? They indicate the existence of a deep, though perhaps not yet well defined, conviction of the bad condition of the national establishments of Europe; and we see the necessity of their removal, that "the people may be brought to feel that they are bound to obey all lawful enactments of men, out of a regard to Christ, and bound as a part of their allegiance to him, to disregard all human enactments that conflict with his revealed will."* They teach churchmen not to model their standards in accordance with, and in subordination to, the imperfect, corrupt establishments of the nations, but to look to a higher rule. The civil and religious rights and freedom of men must be secured on a firmer basis than they generally are, before they can be completely possessed or safely kept. Of this we are admonished by the events now passing before us.

6. For the interests of men and the advancement of the kingdom of Christ, it is well that the principles of a high moral order should be ahead of the actual attainments of a low condition of society. Of a distinguished man it is said, "he lived before his time." Not too soon, indeed, for bringing into view the true laws of sound and efficient philosophical inquiry, but before the time in which those laws were appreciated. Thus, too, Moses lived before his time. His brethren of Israel did not readily understand him. It has, however, been well that, in this respect, prophets, apostles, confessors, martyrs, and reformers lived before their time; and it is still well that those principles which ought to govern the affairs of men, and which are destined to regulate and bless the nations, should be avowed and perseveringly maintained by a few, though not appreciated by the multitude, and though deemed by some, who should judge better, repulsively peculiar. In all such matters the inquiry should be, Is it right? Ought it to succeed? Has God said that it shall be finally attained? Satisfied on these points, the well ordered mind, regardless of the clamour of the crowd, will not hesitate as to where his stand must be.

"Truth crushed to earth will rise again;
The eternal years of God are hers,"— and when she thus arises, her votaries will not be few.

Practical Essays.

CHEAP PREACHING.—BY REV. DR. JOHN M. MASON.

When men consecrate themselves to the religious weal of a people, and do by that act forego the opportunities open to all others, of providing for themselves and their families, a competent maintenance is the least remuneration they have a right to claim. It is the dictate of common sense, common justice, and common humanity. It is also the express commandment of the Lord Jesus Christ. But notwithstanding these considerations, the ministry is little better than a starving profession. Not one in twenty, were he compelled to live upon the salary allowed by his congregation, could escape from beggary and rags. The certain effect is, on the one hand, to deter young men of respectable talents from the ministry altogether; and, on the other, to discourage, depress, and finally to ruin those who are in it already.

The degree of talent which fits one, as far as intellectual endowments go, for a useful minister of the gospel, is much rarer than many seem to imagine, and, humanly speaking, has its temporal prosperity in its own power. When other pursuits invite by the promise of, not only a maintenance, but of gain, and even of opulence, it is idle, it is unreasonable, to hope that youth of talent, without fortune, whatever be their piety, will serve the church of God at the expense of devoting themselves to infallible penury, and all the wretchedness which belongs to it. They may desire, they may wish; and in some instances from that simplicity which never calculates, or which flatters itself that something favourable "will turn up," they may venture; but, in general, they must turn away, with a sigh from the employment which, of all others, their hearts most long after. Let us not hear of self-denial, spiritual-mindedness, and a heroic indifference to worldly things as characteristic of the true minister of Christ. Self-denial does not mean starving. The spirituality of the father will not stop the cravings of his children when they cry for food; nor is there any heroism in preferring tatters and a hovel to decent clothing and lodging, when they may be had. It is very convenient, no doubt, for men who are adding house to house, field to field, thousand to thousand, to harangue in a religious style, on the necessity of a minister's imitating his Master, "who had not where to lay his head;" when the practical inference from all this is in favour of their pockets. They are wonderfully concerned for the spirituality and self-denial to be practised by their minister; but as to their own share of these virtues, as to their parting with a pittance of their pelf to render him comfortable—why that is another affair. It is one of the most wicked forms of hypocrisy to plead for the cultivation of a minister's heavenly-mindedness, by way of apology for cheating him out of his bread. The sin of neglect complained of is not equally gross in all. In some it proceeds from thoughtlessness; in others, from incapacity to make a right estimate; but in most, it is the fruit of downright covetousness. There has been, on this subject, an absurd squeamishness in those whom the Lord has authorized to "live by the gospel." They have borne and foreborne; they have submitted to every species of sacrifice, rather than disoblige the people; and their reward has been an accumulation of injuries and cold-blooded contempt. It is time for them to claim their due in a modest but manly tone, and throw the fearful responsibility of expelling an enlightened ministry from the Church upon those who are able, but not willing, to support it honourably. We say enlightened ministry, for we have no conception that niggardly provision will soon strip her of every thing in the shape of a minister. You cannot place the pecuniary recompense so low, as that it shall not be an object for somebody. Fix your salary at fifty dollars a year, and you shall not want candidates. But then they will be fifty dollar men. All genius, all learning, all high character, all capacity for expansive usefulness, will be swept away, and rudeness, ignorance, impudence, and vulgarity, will become the religious directors of the nation.

In the meantime, such ministers as are better qualified for their station, are not only decreasing in proportion to population, but, with few exceptions, are prohibited from cultivating the powers which they possess. Remote from literary society; without libraries; without leisure to use what books they have; distracted with anxiety for their immediate subsistence; doomed to the plough, or some other secular employment to keep themselves fed and clothed, their intellect becomes enfeebled; their acquisitions are dissipated; and their ministry becomes barren; their people indifferent; and the solid interests of Christianity are gradually, but effectually, undermined. Let churches be warned. They have long slept on the edge of a precipice, the ground is caving below them, and still they are not aware. Not a place of any importance is to be filled without the utmost difficulty. The search must be made from Dan to Beersheba, often, very often, unsuccessfully; and when successful, it is only enriching one church by the robbery of another. The population of our country is increasing with unexampled rapidity, very incompetent means are used to furnish an efficient ministry, and the people, themselves, are throwing the most fatal discouragement in their way. All denominations seem engaged in a practical conspiracy to starve Christianity out of the land. Let them tremble at their deeds, let their loins be loosened, and their knees smite together, at the mere possibility that they may succeed.

WANDERING THOUGHTS.—Many vain intruders often task me most at such seasons as I most desire to be freed from them: they follow me into the pulpit and meet me at the table. I hope I do not love them nor wish to lodge them! Often in my prayers some idle fancy buzzes about me, and makes me forget where I am, and what I am doing.

I compare myself to a man upon his knees before the King, pleading for his life, or returning thanks for some great favour; in the midst of his speech he sees a butterfly; he immediately breaks off, leaves his speech unfinished, and runs away to catch the butterfly. Such a man would be thought mad; and my vile thoughts prove that I am not free from spiritual insanity. Is it so with you? I believe it is at some times and in some degree, though I hope you are not so bad as I. As we all spring from one stock, though our features differ, depravity is the common family likeness which runs through the whole species; but Jesus came into the world to save sinners; he died for us, and

With sanctifying grace.”

We hope in a little time to see him as he is. Then, and not before, we shall be completely like him; and while we are here, his precious blood cleanses us from all sins, and makes our defective services acceptable to God.—John Newton.

THE REPARATION OF CHURCHES.—If a man's private house wherein he dwelleth is decayed, he will never cease till it be restored up again: yea, if his barn, wherein he keepeth his corn, be out of reparations, what diligence useth he to make it in a perfect state again; if the stable of his horse, yea, the sty of his swine, be not able to hold water and wind, how careful is he to do cost thereon. And shall we be so mindful of our common base houses, deputed to so vile employment, and be forgetful toward that house of God, wherein be entreated the words of our eternal salvation, wherein be ministered the sacraments and mysteries of our redemption?—Homilies.

The Sabbath.

SABBATH TRAVELLING.—It is known that very great changes in public sentiment in reference to Sabbath observance have, within a few years, been effected through the judicious and friendly efforts of the “American Foreign Sabbath Union;” and that an annual expense of sixty thousand dollars was saved by the stopping of Sunday mails, at one time, by the late Postmaster General, chiefly in New England, where there is now no Sunday mail or rail-car for travellers.

A similar change of sentiment, to a great extent, has also been silently effected in this and some other states. The Rochester Advertiser says:—

A few years since our public thoroughfares presented the same bustle and activity, the same crowd of goers and comers, on the Sabbath, as on any other day of the week; and business men improved then what they generally regarded as a day of leisure, for commencing their journeys. Now, however, there is a wonderful change. Instead of the day-boats on the Hudson on Sunday being crowded, as formerly, they have been withdrawn entirely, the proprietors finding that it did not pay. So also with the rail-road companies between Albany and Buffalo. We venture the assertion that not one of them upon the whole line, from their receipts on Sunday, pay the expenses incurred.

AN APPRENTICE CASE.—Judge Parsons of Philadelphia, discharged a barber's apprentice from his indentures on the ground that his master compelled him to work on the Sabbath. The legislature, the judge remarked, had determined by law that sixty hours weekly should be the duration of human labour, and it was ordained by God that the seventh day should be set apart for rest. To compel an apprentice, then, to labour every day, was not only a violation of the laws of God, but of the state, and he had ever held, and should continue to hold that it was a sufficient cause for the breaking of an indenture.

Temperance.

TEMPERANCE STATISTICS.—Mr. Delavan, the temperance lecturer, gives the following statistics relative to the progress of the cause in this country and in Europe.

In the United States, there are 3710 temperance societies, with 2,615,000 members, which includes the Sons of Temperance. In England, Ireland, and Scotland, eight hundred and fifty temperance societies, 7,640,000 members. In the Canadas, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, there are nine hundred and fifty temperance societies, with 370,000 members. In South America, there are seventeen thousand persons who have signed the temperance pledge. In Germany, there are fifteen hundred temperance societies, with one million three hundred thousand members. In Sweden and Norway there are five hundred and ten temperance societies, with one hundred and twenty thousand members. In the Sandwich Islands, there are five thousand persons who have signed the pledge of total abstinence. At the Cape of Good Hope, there are nine hundred pledged members. Upwards of seven thousand persons annually perish in Great Britain through accidents while drunk, and the losses to the working classes alone, through drinking, appear to be annually five hundred and fifty million dollars. The enormous sum of four hundred and ninety million dollars was expended in Great Britain, last year, for intoxicating beverages, and five hundred and twenty millions of gallons of malt liquors were brewed last year in Great Britain. In Russia all temperance societies are strictly forbidden by the Emperor. In Prussia, Austria and Italy, there are no temperance societies. In France, the temperance cause, although yet in its infancy, is greatly on the increase. The first temperance society in the world, as far as discovery is known, was formed in Germany, on Christmas day, in the year 1600.

Miscellaneous.

INFLUENCE OF CLEANLINESS.—A neat, clean, fresh aired, sweet, cheerful, well arranged, and well situated house, exercises a moral as well as physical influence over its inmates, and makes the members of a family peaceable and considerate of the feelings and happiness of each other; the connexion is obvious between the state of mind thus produced, and habits of respect for others, and those higher duties and obligations which no law can enforce. On the contrary, a filthy, squalid, noxious dwelling, rendered still more wretched by its noisome site, and in which none of the decencies of life can be observed, contributes to make its unfortunate inhabitants selfish, sensual and regardless of the feelings of each other; the constant indulgence of such passions renders them reckless and brutal, and the transition is natural to propensities and habits incompatible with a respect for the property of others, or for the laws.

AWFUL CALCULATION.—An ingenious, authentic, and valuable statistical work, published a few years since, states that the number of inhabitants who have lived on the earth, amounts to about 36,627,843,275,075,846. The sum, the writer says, when divided by 3,096,000, the number of square leagues of land on this surface of the globe, leaves 11,320,698,732 persons to each square league. There are 27,864,000 square miles of land, which, being divided as above, gives about 1,314,522,079 persons to each square mile. Let the miles be reduced to square rods, and the number, he says, will be 1,853,173,500,000, which, being divided as above, gives 1283 inhabitants to each square rod, which rod being reduced to feet, and divided as above, it will give about five persons to each square foot of terra firma on the globe. Let the earth be supposed to be one vast burying ground, and, according to the above statement, there will be 1283 persons to be buried on each square rod, capable of being divided into twelve graves, it will appear that each grave must contain 100 persons, and the whole earth has been dug one hundred times over to bury its inhabitants! supposing they had been equally distributed.

What an awful and overwhelming thought! what a lesson to human pride, to human vanity, ambition! What a lesson to the infatuated being who has centred all his hopes and affections upon the evanescent pleasures of this truly transitory life!

TO DISTINGUISH OXALIC ACID FROM EPSOM SALTS.—Take the solution; first, Epsom salt is bitter, oxalic acid sour. 2d. Pour a little tincture of red cabbage into the solution, when if Epsom salt be present, the colour will be unchanged—if oxalic acid be present, the colour will be destroyed and turn of a yellowish shade. This is an easy mode of distinguishing between the two. Many accidents have occurred from oxalic acid being given in place of salts, as the crystals of both look much alike.

When a person takes oxalic acid for salts, the best antidote is the white of eggs; it will immediately nullify the deadly effects of the acid.

GLUE.—Melt a little isinglass in spirits of wine, add thereto about a fifth part of water, and using a gentle heat; when perfectly melted and mixed, it will form a transparent glue, which will unite glass so fast that the fracture will be hardly perceived.

Religious Intelligence.

TOLERATION IN ITALY.—The correspondent of the New York Evangelist, in Italy, mentions several evangelical works which have been recently issued from the press, having passed the ordeal of censorship and been approved. Among these he names the Assembly's Shorter Catechism in Italian, and a volume of excellent sermons, translated from the French of Monod, Malan, Audebez, and others, fresh from the Florence press. Also, numerous valuable little works of 30 to 100 pages, among which is one entitled "The reading of the Holy Scriptures, commanded by the Fathers," a compilation of strong passages from the writings of the Greek and Roman Fathers, arranged in chronological order. These have all passed through the censorship at Florence, and are being put into circulation as fast as means can be obtained for the purpose. Last and best, we have the Epistle of Paul to the Colossians, translated into the Tuscan language by Father Zacharia, of Florence, of the order of St. Mark. The Presbyterian Confession of Faith is in progress of translation, and there is every reason to believe that its publication will be allowed. Mr. Salvatori Ferretti, who lately visited London to obtain funds in support of the Eco di Savonarola, a paper through which he is endeavouring to enlighten the minds of his countrymen on ecclesiastical questions, states that the opportunity for diffusing the Scriptures is as large as the zeal of the British churches could desire. There is no practical impediment in the way.—Epis. Rec.

THE MALTA MISSION, recently established and managed by six converted Italian priests, is successfully engaged in the distribution of Bibles and religious tracts in their native country. A journal entitled "L'Indicatore," the object of which is to compare Roman Catholic teaching with the Scriptures, is printed on the Island, and has several hundred subscribers in Italy.

CHURCH AND STATE IN FRANCE.—Among the matters of interest in the French National Assembly is the action of the Committee of Worship, in the election of bishops. The project of direct and spontaneous nomination of bishops by the government, has been rejected, and a plan for nominating them by the head of the State, from a list of candidates, adopted instead. It remains to determine who shall prepare the list of presentation. M. Arnaud, member of Arriège, who is in favour of the separation of the church from the state, withdrew from the committee when they had agreed upon the intervention of the government, which he objects to under any circumstances.

BRIGHTER PROSPECTS.—A national synod of the Protestant church is to be held in Paris, on the 9th of September, for the purpose of bringing about a combined re-organization of the various churches. This will be an exceedingly interesting meeting, as it is the first which has taken place since the revocation of the edict of Nantes; the last one was held in 1659, at London. Since the time of the revolution, the principal synods or consistories have been allowed to meet; but, though every effort was made, the government constantly refused to allow meetings of a national synod. The revolution of February has removed this restriction, and accordingly a preparatory meeting was held in Paris in May last, to arrange the basis for the election of delegates to the proposed assembly. These delegates are to be chosen by the provincial synods, one-half to be clergymen, and the other, laymen. The synod will contain ninety-four members, two of whom are appointed by the theological faculties of Strasburg and Montauban. Its deliberations will, without doubt, be of great importance, and will make a new era in the cause of Protestantism in France.—Epis. Rec.

CIRCULATE THE SCRIPTURES.—The British and Foreign Bible Society was established in 1804. It has circulated more than 20,000,000 copies of the Scriptures. The gross expenditure has exceeded £3,000,000. Annual income £51,000.

SOUTHERN BAPTIST BOARD OF FOREIGN MISSIONS.—The receipts of this body last year were $19,500. They have five churches in China under their care, and thirteen American and seven native missionaries. They acknowledge the receipt of $500 from the American Tract Society.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH.—The statistics of the annual conferences just published, give white members, 334,859; coloured members, 127,240. Itinerant preachers, 1,400; local do., 3,143.

CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIANS.—The General Assembly of this church met on the 16th of May, in Memphis, Tennessee. Connected with this body there are seventeen synods, and seventy presbyteries. The assembly consisted of about 100 members, principally from Kentucky, Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, Tennessee, Mississippi, and Texas.

GOING TO CHRIST.

“Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out.”—JOHN vi. 37.

Just as I am, without one plea,
But that thy blood was shed for me,
And that thou bidst me come to thee,

O Lamb of God, I come!

Just as I am—and waiting not
To rid my soul of one dark blot,
To thee, whose blood can cleanse each spot,

O Lamb of God, I come!

Just as I am—though tossed about
With many a conflict, many a doubt,
Fightings within, and fears without,

O Lamb of God, I come!

Just as I am—poor, wretched, blind;
Sight, riches, healing of the mind,
Yea, all I need in thee to find,

O Lamb of God, I come!

Just as I am, thou wilt receive,
Wilt welcome, pardon, cleanse, relieve;
Because thy promise I believe,

O Lamb of God, I come!

Just as I am—thy love unknown,
Has broken every barrier down;
Now, to be thine, yea, thine alone,

O Lamb of God, I come!

DEPARTURE OF THE MISSIONARIES.

In a preceding part of this number our readers may find a detailed account of the departure of our missionary brethren. All the circumstances attending this event were of the most impressive and affecting character, and calculated greatly to cheer our departing brethren, and to encourage the hopes of the friends whom they left behind. We should however, be careful to remember that the great work of the conversion of a perishing world is not to be effected by any human might or power, but by the SPIRIT OF THE LORD, and while, therefore, we honour and love the men, “our faith and hope must be in God.” Let us, therefore, earnestly and perseveringly beseech God for the out-pouring of His Holy SPIRIT, that the planting and watering of our beloved missionaries may be followed by the increase which He alone can give. The interest which our whole church has taken in this subject may be regarded as a token for good, and we trust that this interest will not flag. Let the liberal contributions which have been made be followed by constant and importunate prayer for the divine blessing, presented not only in private, but also in the family, in the fellowship meeting, at the monthly concert, and in the sanctuary. If this be done we may confidently expect the happiest results.

OTHER THINGS.

While the liberality manifested in sustaining our foreign missionary efforts is worthy of approbation,—although we suppose none can think that we have done more than it was our duty to do, or even so much as that,—it must not be forgotten that there are some other things connected with the operations of our church, which require special and immediate attention. A considerable amount of the sum required for the support of the Theological Seminary, and for the personal salaries of the missionaries yet remains unpaid. Several of the presbyteries have fallen behind in these accounts, and there are many congregations from which nothing has been received. The distribution made of the amount required was such as affords all an opportunity to give something, while none would be burdened. Let every one feel a personal responsibility in this matter, and determine to contribute something, however little. As the meeting of Synod is at hand, it is hoped that this subject will receive attention, and that no part of the Church may appear delinquent. We hope every minister will take measures to have the amounts required from his particular charge collected in time to be brought by him to Synod, and that the elders will attend to it in vacant congregations. A statement of the amounts due for the purposes mentioned, may be found on the cover.

INTERESTING COINCIDENCE.

After the vessel in which our missionaries sailed had left the wharf, and while awaiting the arrival of the steamboat by which it was to be towed out to sea, it was found that a supply of religious tracts for distribution among the sailors, and in India, had been forgotten. One of the brethren attempted to return to the shore in a small boat, to obtain some, but was unsuccessful, and it was supposed that the voyage must be made without them. Just at this moment a small boat approached the vessel, carrying a Bethel missionary, who had ascertained that the ship was sailing, and who brought with him a large number of excellent religious publications. Their being obtained in such circumstances appears worthy of remark, and has led to the hope that He who brought them so unexpectedly, designed to make them the means of great spiritual good.

CAPTAIN THOMAS S. SULLIVAN.

The tracts referred to in the preceding notice as obtained by the missionaries at the moment of their departure, were brought by Captain T. S. Sullivan, a gentleman who has devoted himself to labouring in the cause of seamen. Captain S. was himself formerly a ship-master, and subsequently a missionary on the canals and rivers of the west. Impressed with a view of the moral destitution of seamen in the port of Boston, he has turned his attention specially to that locality. It appears by his circular that about 100,000 seamen annually arrive in Boston, and that a very large proportion of these are neglectful of their spiritual interests. Capt. S. has laboured with great assiduity, having visited nearly 400 vessels, and distributed 16000 pages of tracts, exclusive of books and pamphlets. We had the pleasure of his society in the religious exercises held on board the vessel, and have reason to believe him well qualified for the work of faith and labour of love in which he is engaged. Capt. S. is sustained by an association of which Mr. F. S. Allen, 42 Milk St., Boston, is Treasurer. Those who are disposed to give their aid in efforts to benefit seamen, may feel confident that the means intrusted to Capt. S. will not be misapplied.

ACCURATE CALCULATION.

The present year has been remarkable for the important events which have occurred during it, so unexpectedly and in such rapid succession. It will doubtless be noted in history as the commencement of a new era in the political and religious condition of the continent of Europe, and in some measure, of the world. Our attention has lately been directed to a calculation made by Rev. Dr. Black, which may be found in a note appended to his sermon on Church Fellowship, published in 1819. In this the Dr., after an examination of the prophetic numbers in the Book of Daniel and the Apocalypse, expresses his opinion that the year 1848 will witness the downfall of the anti-christian system, with the great political convulsions which attend that event. His interesting remarks on this subject may be expected in another Number.

THE CATHOLIC HERALD.

In a late number of "the Catholic Herald," of this city, we find a glowing panegyric on the scriptures, taken from an address delivered in Madrid, before the Spanish Academy of Languages. In this address, which the Herald pronounces excellent, the Bible is extolled as the great source from which the most eminent poets of the Christian nations have drawn their inspiration, and as containing compositions far surpassing any to be found elsewhere. Its free and general use is both directly and indirectly advocated and recommended. We have been truly glad to find such sentiments expressed in the centre of Catholic Spain, and reiterated by Romanists in this land. But we cannot tell how to reconcile such a course with adherence to the decree of the Council of Trent, which declares that more harm than good has come from the reading the scriptures by the common people, and that it should be forbidden, unless in special cases. This decree is in practical operation in the city of Rome, where a recent traveller informs us he searched every bookstore for a copy of the Bible, and could find none, the universal answer to his inquiries being, "it is prohibited." We hope to find the Herald continue to use its influence to induce its readers to search the scriptures.

THE TITHE SYSTEM AND THE EPISCOPAL RECORDER.

The Episcopal Recorder introduces a notice of the effect of the abolition of the octroi, or meat tax, in the city of Paris, which appears to have been an increase of profit to the farmers and butchers, without any diminution of price to the consumer, and with a great loss of revenue to the government, and considers this analogous to the result which would follow the abolition of the tithe system in England. "After all the abuse," says the editor, "which the church is made to suffer by her opponents on account of this so called odious and oppressive impost on property, would not the removal or destruction of tithes be merely giving that amount to the proprietors of the soil, who never paid for the tenth part which is subject to tithial claim, while it would in no degree benefit either the cultivator of the land, or the millions who eat its produce?"

It is strange to find an advocate for the tithe system in this land and it is to be much regretted that a paper which has so much influence with leading men of the evangelical party of the Church of England should give it any countenance. The reasoning is quite fallacious, as the question must turn upon the justice of compelling men to pay for the support of any religion, and especially one which they do not profess. If the money be improperly obtained, it is best for the church to have nothing to do with it.

CHURCH ORGANIZED IN REDFIELD.

We have to record another organization by the Northern Presbytery. A committee of the Northern Presbytery, (Dr. M'Leod and Rev. A. G. Wylie,) appointed in pursuance of a petition from sundry persons in Redfield, Oswego Co., New York, proceeded to that place, and effected the organization in due order, on the 12th August, 1848. Mr. Peter Cooper, a ruling elder, formerly in connexion with the Associate Reformed church, having been received, and being elected by the people, was recognised as an elder in the new church. Mr. James Abbot was also chosen and ordained to office. The sacrament of the Lord's supper was dispensed on the Sabbath, and many of God's people were refreshed. The various services were held in the Presbyterian church, (old school.) A very large audience, among whom were several clergymen of various denominations, were present, and manifested the greatest interest in the exercises. May the Lord bless his own cause!

INSTALLATION OF REV. DR. CRAWFORD.

The Rev. Dr. Crawford having accepted the call made for his pastoral services by the 4th Reformed Presbyterian church in this city, his installation took place on the evening of Thursday, August 17th. The sermon was preached by Rev. A. W. Black; the questions were proposed, and the charge to the pastor delivered by Rev. R. J. Black; the address to the people was made by Rev. W. Sterrett.

MEETING OF SYNOD.—The General Synod of the Reformed Presbyterian church, in North America, will meet in the city of New York, on the second Wednesday of October, (11th day,) 1848, at half-past 7 o'clock, P. M.

The respected moderator of the last meeting having been removed by death, it is expected that the sermon, at the opening, will be preached by another.

By order of Synod, the usual collection for the contingent and travelling expense fund will be taken up in all the congregations under their direction.

The draft of the book of discipline, in overture before the church, and to be finally acted upon at the coming meeting, will be found in the American Christian Expositor, vol. 1, pp. 326—338. The committee having the subject in charge are Dr. Wylie, Dr. Black, Dr. M'Master, Dr. M'Leod, and Dr. Heron.

Signed, JOHN N. M'LEOD, Stated Clerk.

New Publications.

Life of Martin Boos. Philadelphia. American S. School Union, pp. 192. 18mo.

Martin Boos was a Roman Catholic clergyman of Austria, who was led to embrace the great doctrine of justification by faith, and in consequence of preaching it, was exposed to severe and relentless persecution from the ecclesiastical and civil authorities. His life is a very instructive development of Christian experience, and illustrates the power of genuine religion in sustaining the soul in times of trouble. But we have felt it especially interesting as showing that even in the Roman Catholic church, anti-christian as it is, there may be some of Christ's followers, while the opposition of the Papal system to evangelical truth is shown by the persecution to which such persons have always been subjected. The work is one published by the union in concert with the London Religious Tract Society, and is sold at the very cheap price of 12½ cents.

Walks of Usefulness in London, and its environs. By Rev. J. Campbell. Philadelphia, Presbyterian Board of Publication. pp. 172. 18mo.

The writer of this work represents himself as taking advantage of such opportunities for conversation as were presented in his rambles through London, and its vicinity, to inculcate important religious truths. To what extent his plan should be adopted, we are not prepared to say, but we have no hesitation in expressing our approbation of this book, as presenting, in a very animated, attractive and impressive manner, the most valuable instruction. The great variety of illustration, and the lively, spirited and simple style in which it is written, make it very interesting; and we suppose scarcely any one can read a part of it, who would not desire to read it all. Its author is the well known traveller in South Africa, whose services were so useful to the London Missionary Society.

Family Secrets, pp. 36. Last Ride, pp. 23. Passing Bell, pp. 36. 18mo. American S. S. Union.

These little works are interesting and instructive, both to young and old. The first is meant to show that the way to be truly happy, is to be good. The second illustrates the nature of repentance. The third contrasts the condition in this world, and the prospect of happiness in the world to come, of the rich miser with the sincere Christian, whether suffering reverses of temporal prosperity, or in the lowest state of affliction and poverty. Like all the works of this excellent institution, they are well adapted to communicate the most salutary truth, and to impress it upon the heart.

Old Anthony's Hints to Young People, to make them both cheerful and wise. Presbyterian Board of Publication. pp. 162. 18mo.

This work contains many useful suggestions, presented in such a manner as to instruct without wearying the mind. It not only contains good advice for the young, but also shows the old how they may be useful to the rising generation, and in being so, may also be respected and happy.

A Catechism of the Government and Discipline of the Presbyterian church. 2nd American, (enlarged,) from the 3rd Glasgow Edition. By Rev. A. Blaikie. Boston, 1848. pp. 32. 18mo.

This little manual was compiled by a number of Irish Presbyterian ministers, and has been introduced to the American public by Rev. Mr. Blaikie, of the Associate Reformed church, Boston, who has made some additions to it from his own pen. While we do not feel prepared to express an approbation of every sentiment it contains, we feel warranted to accord to it a general commendation, as a brief, perspicuous, comprehensive and well arranged exhibition of the distinct ecclesiastical position occupied by the Presbyterians. In the community where its respected editor is placed, such a treatise is much required, and indeed it is calculated to do good wherever it may be read. We hope it may have an extensive circulation.

The Cedar. The Olive. The Vine. The Palm.—By Rev. James Hamilton. The order, the rites and ceremonies of the Christian Church.—By Rev. James Wharey. pp. 24, 18mo. A Pastor's Inquiries addressed to the Communicants of his charge. pp. 12. 18mo. Book of Proverbs. Miniature quarto.

These works are recent publications of the Presbyterian Board, all excellent, suited to the times, and should have a general circulation.

Theological Discussions.

ANTICHRIST AND HIS DURATION.

BY THE REV. DR. BLACK.

The following interesting remarks are taken from a sermon on church fellowship, by Rev. Dr. Black, of Pittsburgh, published in 1819, nearly thirty years ago. The remarkable developments of divine Providence at the present time, especially in Europe, both continental and insular, seem to confirm the accuracy of the views deduced so long ago from an examination of the prophecies. Such discussions, at all times interesting, possess at present, an especial claim upon the attention; and we feel sure that the following observations will be read both with pleasure and with profit.—Ep.

The power against which the witnesses direct their testimony, during the 1260 years in which they are to prophesy, clothed in sackcloth, is, in scripture, denominated Antichrist; 1 John ii. 18, Ye have heard that Antichrist shall come. If we compare with this text, 2 Thess. ii. 8, And then shall that Wicked be revealed, whom the LORD shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming, we shall find clearly ascertained, the fact, both of his existence and his destruction.

Two questions engage the attention of inquiring Christians, with no small degree of interest—What constitutes the Antichrist?—When shall he come to his end? We shall offer a few observations on both these.

Antichrist signifies an opposite Christ, or one in opposition to Christ. One may be opposite to another, as an avowed enemy, or he may be opposite, as a rival, or a competitor, for the honour which, really and of right, belongs to the other. It is in this last sense that Antichrist obtains this name, as being an opposer to Christ, by pretending that the honours and rights which exclusively belong to the Lord Jesus Christ, belong also to him. We may, generally, learn what really belongs to Christ by the presumptuous claims and arrogant pretensions of Antichrist.

Antichrist is a complex term. Sometimes, indeed, it is represented in scripture as one person, that wicked—the man of sin—the son of perdition. The mystery of iniquity is there personified. But, the apostacy—the antichrist, is really a complex system. “It includes the beasts of the pit, of the sea, and of the earth; the head, the horns, the image of the beast; the mother of harlots, and all who are drunken with the cup of her intoxication.”*

Its grand constituent parts are given in detail, in the 13th chapter of the Revelation, under the symbolical representation of “a beast rising up out of the sea, having seven heads and ten horns,” verse 1; “a beast coming up out of the earth with two horns like a lamb,” verse 11; and “an image, which the second beast causes to be made to the first,” verse 14. These three, the beast of the sea, the beast of the earth, and the image of the beast, include all the component parts of the antichristian system, and to one or the other of these, or to them all together, every other description of antichrist, under whatever symbol, may be referred.

The beast of the sea is the civil power of the Western Roman empire, in its divided state; for it is represented as having seven heads, and ten horns with crowns.

The seven heads refer not only to the seat of this power, "the capitol of which was located on seven well known hills,"* "the seven heads are seven mountains, upon which the woman sitteth," but also to the seven different forms of government, under which the Roman empire passed "and there are seven kings."

The ten crowned horns are the ten different kingdoms, or dynasties, into which the Latin or Roman empire was divided. They correspond exactly with the ten horns of the fourth beast in the vision of Daniel, chap. vii. 7, and with the ten toes of the image in Nebuchadnezzar's dream, chap. ii. 41, 42. These ten horns, or ten toes, are the different powers within the limits of the Western Roman empire, after it ceased to be one great sovereignty under one despot. The beast appeared to John with these ten horns. This sets aside all application of the beast of the sea to Rome pagan, because the empire was not divided into ten kingdoms, until after the death of Constantine, when the empire was become, at least nominally, Christian.

The "beast of the earth" is the ecclesiastical hierarchy, embracing all ecclesiastical power, order, and worship, devoted to the support of the antichristian apostacy. It symbolizes with the "little horn" "which makes war with the saints," and "speaks great words against the Most High,"† and with the "mother of harlots," that is seated upon the "scarlet-coloured beast," and "drunken with the blood of the saints,"‡ also with the "false prophet," who works miracles before the beast, with which he deceives them that have the mark of the beast, and worship his image.§ This beast is seen "coming up out of the earth, and he had two horns like a lamb, and he spake as a dragon." This system is earthly in its origin and nature, as opposed to the true church of Christ, which is of heavenly origin, and of a heavenly nature.

He has "two horns like a lamb." He professes the mildness, the meekness, and the innocence of a lamb, but he is really a beast of prey, and speaks like a dragon. Instead of preaching the gospel in its purity, as the glad tidings of salvation, he utters blasphemies, and his speeches breathe of cruelty and death.

His two horns are the two orders of the Romish hierarchy—the regular and the secular clergy; the first, comprehending all the monastic orders, as being, in some measure, secluded from the world; the second embracing all the parochial clergy, who profess to live in the world and take the charge of souls.

This beast causeth the people who dwell on earth to "worship the first beast," that is, to yield submission to the civil power, however wicked and tyrannical, as if it were the ordinance of God. And finally it causes an image to be made to the first beast. This image is the papacy. The pope of Rome is the creature of the church. The cardinals as the representatives of the Romish church, or second beast, create him.|| He is made the image of the civil power or first beast; for "he is the common centre," "the principle of unity to the ten kingdoms of the beast," that is, the empire, and procures for the civil rulers "a blind obedience from their subjects." He delivers over to the secular arm at his pleasure. He claims to be set over the political empires of the earth, and to dispose of crowns and kingdoms. He is equally tyrannical with the first beast, for he has received power from his makers to cause that as many as will "not worship him shall be put to death." This whole complex system is the antichrist. There is observable in it, throughout, a regular derivation of power and dependence. The pope derives his power from the church—the "woman clothed in scarlet." She is supported by the "beast having seven heads and ten horns"—the civil governments of the Western empire. And the beast receives from the dragon his power, his seat, and all his authority: and the dragon is declared, Rev. xii. 9, to be "the devil." He is as the soul of the whole system. From beginning to end, through every part of this complex system of apostacy, which is to waste the true church of Christ, 1260 years, and finally slay the witnesses of the Redeemer, it is diabolical, and cannot be acknowledged as the ordinance of God, by any conscientious Christian.

* The city of Rome, "Ūrbs septicollis."

† Dan. vii. 8, 21—25. ‡ Rev. xvii. 3—6. § Rev. xix. 20. || "Quem creant adorant," whom they create, they worship.

The question, so anxiously asked by every lover of the church of Christ, "when shall the end of these things be?"—when shall Antichrist be brought down? demands our attention.

The time is fixed in Jehovah's decree, when the "mystery of God shall be finished," by bringing "the mystery of iniquity" to an end. But as it is a mysterious providence indeed, the sober Christian will not be confident in deciding, with certainty, when that end shall be.

The number of years during which Antichrist shall be permitted to exercise his complex system of misrule, tyranny, and superstition, is limited to 1260 days,* a prophetic day being put for a year.† The difficulty is to know when this period commences.

In Daniel's prophecy, chap. vii. 25, we are informed that the saints of the Most High "shall be given into the hand of the little horn." The little horn symbolizes the hierarchy of the church of Rome. The hand of the little horn will represent the power by which the church executes her designs. This power is the pope, whom she creates for this purpose. But some other power, distinct from "the little horn," must give the saints into his hand. There appears to be a league between the church and the beast of the bottomless pit. This beast causes her, and she, in return, causes the nations to "worship the beast," and receive "his mark in their foreheads," or at least in their right hands; open and avowed, or hidden and implicit subjection to the "thrones of iniquity," with activity in supporting their unhallowed claims.

We may expect, then, that in this mutual co-operation, the civil power will be that which will give the saints into the hand of the executive power of the church. We find a remarkable instance of this in the emperor Phocas, who, for brutality, tyranny, and blood-thirsty cruelty, may rank with Caligula, Nero, or Domitian, when, in the year 606, he constituted pope Boniface III. universal bishop, and head of the church, and required all the churches to acknowledge the papal supremacy. This was, indeed, giving the "saints of the Most High into the hand of the little horn." The year 606, therefore, seems to be the time from whence to date the rise of the antichristian apostacy.

† Ezek. iv. 6. Numb. xiv. 34.

By adding 1260 years to 606, we are brought to the year 1866. And if we are to reckon according to our own calendar, it will be so long until antichrist will come to his end.

There is, however, something in the numbers used by John, that seems to favour the mode of calculation in use among the Jews. Their months were 30 days each. Of course their year consisted of 360 days only. The period of antichrist's reign is represented by John under different forms. Twice it is said to be 1260 days.* Once it is denominated "a time, and times, and half a time.† And twice it is represented as 42 months.‡ All these point out the same period.

Time is put for one year,§ times will then be two years, and half a time will be half a year. Three years and a half, of twelve months each, make forty and two months; and forty-two months, of thirty days each, amount to 1260 days, that is years, according to prophetic style. Now, as all these point out the same period, it would seem that the same principle should regulate the whole—that no interpretation should be given to the days that would make them differ from the months. If the forty-two months are taken to be thirty-day months, according to the Jewish calculation, they will produce 1260 days. But if they contain either more or less, they will not. But twelve months of 30 days each, will not make one year of our calendar. They will produce 360 days only. The difference of five days, and almost six hours each year, during the whole 1260 days, will amount to eighteen years, round numbers. These, according to this calculation, must be subtracted from 1866, which would bring us to the year 1848. If this calculation be correct, less than 30 years will put an end to the antichristian system.

This mode of calculation will be further justified by the coincidence of the probable destruction of one of the principal horns of the beast, which will appear by another process of calculation, taken from the specific threatening of the second commandment.

Of all the civil powers that belong to the ten horns, none have so remarkably distinguished themselves in the support of the hierarchy and the image of its creation, as the present British government. Though professedly protestant, yet have they done all in their power to aid and support the tottering fabric of the "man of sin." Rome has been saved from destruction by British cannon. How warmly has this power testified her attachment to popery, by establishing it in Canada, and in Corsica during the short time it was attached to the crown of Great Britain! And has she not been the principal support of the antichristian system, against the terrible attack made on it by Revolutionary France? It is true, that in the late re-establishment of the pope, after the downfall of Bonaparte, the power of the Greek church united with the power of the English church; that is, Russia and Britain joined heart and hand. How strikingly are they exemplified by the "two women with the wind in their wings," Zech. v. 9, who bear away the ephah, with the "woman of wickedness, to build it a house in the land of Shinar," and to establish it, and "set it there on its own base." Thus did these two powers restore to, and re-establish the Roman pontiff in, his ancient antichristian dignity, in his own Babylon. This was to establish the woman of wickedness—the scarlet woman—on her own base. Yet still, in the whole history of the transactions of the British government, in relation to the pope and his interest, they are the most active and zealous supporters, and to them he acknowledges he is the most indebted. It is reasonable, then, to suppose that they should stand and fall together.

According to the threatening of the second commandment, the iniquities of the fathers shall be visited upon the children of them that hate the Lord, to the third and fourth generation; that is, in relation to public or national wickedness, persisted in from generation to generation, God will not delay the execution of national judgments longer than the third or, at farthest, the fourth generation.

The present British government was constituted upon the ruins of the ancient reformation. The blood of the martyrs, shed in the times of persecution, was never purged from the throne of Britain.

The period of a generation, according to scripture reckoning, is forty years.* The present government of Britain commenced with the revolution of 1688. Let us then add four generations (the longest extension of divine forbearance, in relation to national punishments,) to the commencement of the British government. Four times forty make 160. This number added to 1688, brings us to the year 1848, precisely the same year in which, according to the former calculation, the whole system of antichrist is to give up the ghost. It is astonishing how the one synchronises with the other.

Let us, however, beware of deciding, peremptorily, in this mysterious calculation. The prophetic numbers are certain, and the prediction infallible, but human calculations are liable to mistake.

These 42 months of 30 days each, and their product, 1260 days, may refer, not to the kind of years, but to their number only. Neither more nor less than 1260 days, is the point expressly determined. They may be solar years. These are “true years,” for they are according to nature. If they are to be thus reckoned, the “man of sin” will retain his power, at least to a certain degree, for 47 years, yet to come.

There are other numbers mentioned by the prophet Daniel, which ought not to be overlooked, because they must have reference to a period either immediately preceding or succeeding the commencement of the Millennium. These are found in chap. xii. 11, 12—“And from the time that the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate set up, there shall be a thousand two hundred and ninety days. Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh to the thousand three hundred and five and thirty days!”

There are here two specific periods, one of 30, and another of 45 years, making 75 years, distinct from the period of 1260 years. If these succeed the commencement of the Millennium, as is generally supposed, then it would appear that 30 years from that period, will bring about a general improvement of the world. All nations shall have begun, and considerably progressed in the work of reformation—the Jews brought to the knowledge of Jesus Christ, as the promised Messiah, and the heathens, generally, made acquainted with the true God, will have embraced Christianity. But it will require 45 years more, or 1335 years from the commencement of the antichristian system, until the Millennium be at its height; “when the light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun, and the light of the sun shall be seven fold"—when the glory of the church shall shine in all its meridian splendour.

Whatever be the mode of calculation, one thing is certain, the period of antichrist's reign draws near to a close. A few years only remain until "the mystery of iniquity be finished." But much has to be done in these few years. "The kings of the earth must hate the whore, and burn her flesh with fire." Forgetful of their vain determinations, and their futile leagues for an everlasting peace, they shall soon hear the alarm of war, and speedily be engaged in it. The remainder of the harvest must be reaped—the vintage must succeed the harvest, and its judgments are terrible. The witnesses must be slain, and lie dead three years and a half, and rise again. Remarkable changes must take place before these things can be accomplished. Popery may be established in Britain before the slaying of the witnesses takes place. They must be slain where they exist; and it would seem reasonable, too, where they exist in the greatest numbers. All who are acquainted with their true character, will admit that this is in the British dominions.* If popery be established there, where the reformation was the most perfect, we may expect it, generally, over all Europe. And it scarcely appears possible, that the witnesses could be slain without such an establishment. To persecute to the death—to shed the blood of the martyrs of Jesus, requires all the sanguinary principles of the scarlet woman, aided by the power to carry them into execution. Let us never forget, however, that when God has work to be done, a short time will suffice. "One day is, with the Lord, as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day."

THE WORK OF THE HOLY SPIRIT.

It is one of the beauties of the Christian religion that it embraces all mankind, Jew or Greek, Barbarian, Scythian, bond or free: unlike the dispensation to which it succeeded, it is not confined to a single nation; the invitation is, "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters." "Let him that is athirst come: whosoever will, let him come and take of the waters of life freely."

True, indeed, it is that many of our race have never heard the glad tidings of salvation, and as the SPIRIT works by the appointed means, for them, alas! there seems to be no hope. God has indeed provided the means, and he has committed them to his church, and has commanded her to use them, promising that his blessing shall follow. On whom then lies the guilt of 600,000,000 of heathen? Unless the church can say that she has done ALL that she could have done, it lies on her. To us, joyful truth! these glad tidings of salvation are addressed. Our duty, then, it is to give the more earnest heed to the things which we have heard, lest at any time we should let them slip; for how shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation!

The result which the SPIRIT produces being effected only by divine

* We do not decide positively. It is highly probable Britain will be the place; but it is a matter of little moment where. Wheresoever it may be, the effects will soon spread themselves elsewhere, and the consequent change shall shortly be universal.

power, is itself superhuman, and might be called miraculous; yet it is effected by means: but that the means themselves produce not the result is evident, because they are often used unsuccessfully.

The manner in which the SPIRIT operates is worthy on the one part of his own divine character, and on the other of the subject, a being endowed with reason, and originally created in the image of his God. It is by the power of TRUTH on a mind enlightened to perceive it, and a heart excited to love it. "Sanctify them through thy truth."

The age of individual revelation has passed. The volume of inspiration is now complete. The whole system of truth is contained in the word of God. In it is to be found all that is necessary to a theoretical knowledge of the nature of God, of man's condition and responsibility, and of the relation which he sustains to his Maker. But though it bears upon its face marks of its heavenly origin, man will not yield to the truth. All the wicked principles of his nature are in opposition, and he "will not come to the light." Then the agency of the SPIRIT is excited; he subdues the opposition of the soul, he draws it by his gentle yet omnipotent influences to the throne of grace: he helps our infirmities, he makes intercession for us in our prayers, and he at last seals us as the children of the covenant, the heirs of the promise.

In all this work man's impotence is most conspicuous. He could not discern the truth, the SPIRIT reveals it to him. He can make no use of it, although it has been laid open before him, the SPIRIT applies it to his heart. "GRACE, GRACE," may well be shouted when the foundation is laid, and when the building of mercy is complete.

But we have been considering only one part of the SPIRIT's work; not only does he commence, he also carries on the work of grace. This is absolutely necessary: as well might a fire be sustained in an exhausted receiver, as any good be done by man when left to himself. "It is not in man that walketh to direct his steps." Every moment he is exposed to new snares, every moment he needs the direction of his heavenly guide. "Grieve not the SPIRIT," then, is a caution addressed not only to the unregenerate, but also to the believer.

We cannot do much more than name some of the ways in which the SPIRIT brings home to the heart the truths contained in his word. We might mention, 1. The preaching of the word. This, which the philosophic Greeks despised, and which the bigoted and superstitious Jews considered as profane, is the chief instrument employed to lead to a knowledge of the truth. Under the guidance of the Holy Spirit the early apostles preached the gospel throughout the Roman empire, and perhaps beyond its confines, in India or China. Since then in every age it has been the chief machinery of the gospel. It adapts itself to the capacity of the hearer. It gives the portion of meat in due season. "Line upon line, precept upon precept." "Milk for babes," strong meat for those more advanced in the knowledge of the truth.

2. The reading of the word. Now-a-days the "schoolmaster is abroad;" and few can be found who cannot read, and we might say none in Christian land, who cannot obtain a copy of the word of God. Now in public and in private old and young may read the scriptures, and learn their duty and how they may be saved. The truth is to be received with faith and love, the blessing of the SPIRIT to be implored, his influence to be acknowledged as necessary, his directions to be laid up in the heart and practised in the life.

3. Prayer. If the Christian would be named from what should be his chief employment, he would be called a man of prayer. "Pray without ceasing." Prayer should accompany every exercise in which the Christian is engaged. By it he gains the aid of Omnipotence to his powerless efforts. By it he secures victory over all his foes.

Other modes by which the SPIRIT operates might be mentioned, as the sacraments, the ordinances of fasting, thanksgiving, pious conversation, providences of various sorts, but they are so numerous that we could not dwell upon them all. Whatever they may be, they produce from his divine power their appropriate results. These are, in brief, regeneration of nature and sanctification of life.

The change which the SPIRIT effects on the heart is a mystery which man cannot understand. As in the human eye he knows the organ by which vision is effected, and observes the wonderful adaptation of every part to the purposes for which it was designed, so here, (though his knowledge is in this case beyond comparison more limited) he may discern the mental powers affected, the means used, the effects produced; but how the agent acts, or how these results are caused, is beyond human conception.

Man has departed from God. The scriptures inform us that Satan was the cause of his fall, and that to him may be traced all that is evil in our natures. Now Satan has no creative power, he could not add a single faculty to the human mind. He must have produced his woful destruction by other means. What then were these? We answer the destruction of the moral symmetry of our natures, that is, the giving undue prominence to improper faculties, and changing the tendencies of their powers. Now the work of the SPIRIT, it appears to us, is to restore man to his original state, to change, in regeneration, the tendencies of his nature, and direct his faculties from himself to his Creator, and to renew, in sanctification, the harmony and due subservience and proper relation in which they should all exist and operate.

This view of regeneration and sanctification is, 1. Consistent with scripture. The very term, renewing, implies the restoration of qualities previously possessed. The new man "is renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him," Col. iii. 10. With this compare Gen. i. 26, "Let us make man after our image, after our likeness." The very terms "renewing of the HOLY GHOST," "renewing of your minds," refer to the same thing.

Again, the scriptures represent the believer as having (after conversion) the same faculties as before; but (1.) His supreme love is directed to God, and (2.) All his faculties are modified or controlled by this ruling principle. Thus the apostle speaks of sorrow, carefulness, exculpation, indignation, fear, vehement desire, zeal, revenge, as exercised by the penitent Corinthians, 2 Cor. vii. 11. Do we not also see in Paul himself the same zealous and honest impetuosity and firmness after as before conversion. Though in the latter case guided by bigotry and ignorance, in the former, by true wisdom and holy love? Many illustrations of this might be given, but they are not necessary.

2. It is honouring to the character of God. It implies an original perfection in His creature. It shows that His power is sufficient to render abortive all the efforts of the prince of darkness. It destroys all appearance of mutability or a change of plan.

Since the SPIRIT works by means, it is manifestly in the use of the means that we may expect his influences. We should study with diligence his word, attend upon his ordinances, submit our hearts and minds to his directions, and in all things be conformed to his laws. It is not, indeed, in the power of man to save himself, but he has the blessed assurance that "Whoso seeketh findeth, whoso asketh receiveth, and to him that knocketh it shall be opened." Powerful and numerous are the enemies of our souls, but let us be fully determined never to submit, not to give place by subjection, no, not for a moment. Then grace will triumph in our hearts, and man be restored to the image and favour of his God.

THE BLESSINGS OF RAIN,—HINTS FOR FAIR-WEATHER CHRISTIANS.

Sing unto the Lord with thanksgiving: sing praise upon the harp unto our God: who covereth the heaven with clouds, who prepareth rain for the earth, who maketh grass to grow on the mountains. Ps. cxlvii. 7, 8.

. . . . This text, in accordance with the common usage of the terms in Scripture, admits of a spiritual application. The adaptation of the refreshing rain as an emblem of spiritual mercies is as beautiful as it is striking. The word of God—the precious promises and precepts of the gospel—are to the heart that thirsts after righteousness like the balmy drops of a summer shower, that fills the parched earth with gladness and makes the mountains break forth into singing. Thus Moses commences that sublime hymn of praise in Deut. xxxii., with these words: "Give ear, O ye heavens, and I will speak; and hear, O earth, the words of my mouth. My doctrine shall drop as the rain, my speech shall distil as the dew, as the small rain upon the tender herb and as the showers upon the grass: because I will publish the name of the Lord; ascribe ye greatness unto our God." In a similar strain Isaiah speaks of the blessings that flow from God's truth—"As the rain cometh down and the snow from heaven, and returneth not thither, but watereth the earth and maketh it bring forth and bud, that it may give seed to the sower and bread to the eater, so shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth; it shall not return unto me void; it shall accomplish that which I please, and prosper in the thing whereto I send it." Look at that man, who is smitten with the keen conviction of his guilt, and as his sins rise up in long array before him, he trembles at the gloomy hosts of darkness, and gives up all as lost. Not a drop of comfort is in his cup—all the springs from which he once drank greedily are bitter as wormwood and gall, and in his soul he loathes them. His moisture is dried up as the drought of summer. Oh! how sweet to that fainting sinner is the voice of sovereign mercy calling in tones of tender invitation—"Ho! every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money—come ye, buy and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk without money and without price." As cool water from the rock to the thirsty soul, as the plentiful rain that makes the trees clap their hands, so is the promise of salvation to him who lies gasping in the dust of death. With the hand of faith, trembling yet believing, he takes the cup of salvation and calls on the name of the Lord. He drinks and lives for ever. See that vineyard—it has been planted with care. It stands on a fruitful hill. The husbandman has fenced it and gathered out the stones and planted it with the choicest vines. There is the tower in the midst of it—and the wine-press is prepared—but the soil is dry, and as the wind stirs the leaves and tendrils of the vines, they are covered and choked with dust. There are plants apparently quite dead—there are trees whose fruit seems withered—the clusters that hang on the vines are few as gleanings after the vintage, and the things that remain are ready to die. But look again, and how changed the scene! The smell of that garden is that of a field which the Lord hath blessed. Upon every spray and leaf the drops of balmy rain are trembling in the gentle breeze, and sparkling like diamonds in the sun-light. Every plant smiles with grateful joy, save here and there one which is as the heath in the desert, that knoweth not when good cometh—the dry and dusty field has become fertile as a green meadow—its ridges and furrows are watered; the very birds that sing among the branches and fly rejoicing through the air, warble forth their hymn of thanksgiving, whilst hill and valley, rocks, floods and trees send forth their glad response to the voice of rejoicing nature. “Sing unto the Lord with thanksgiving; sing praise upon the harp unto our God, who covereth the heaven with clouds, who prepareth rain for the earth, who maketh grass to grow on the mountains.” The church is the vineyard, the vines planted in that fruitful hill are its members. The Father is the husbandman; the drooping trees are backslidden souls, who have forgotten their first love—the dusty withered fruit is the poor heartless offering of the Christian, polluted with worldliness. That rain which makes field and forest sing is the reviving power of the quickening Spirit which comes down like dew upon the mown grass and as showers that water the earth.

Christian brethren, shall we not bless God for the early and the latter rain? Oh! when the Sabbath dawns—God’s holy day of sacred rest, if the heaven is covered with clouds, should we not hasten to his house and sing unto the Lord with thanksgiving—yea, sing praise unto our God with the harp, who prepareth rain for the earth? If the wind shakes the casement, and the driving rain beats against your window—think of the perishing traveller in the sandy wilderness, and come to the sanctuary, that you may praise him who maketh rivers in the desert. When the interests of your country, or the welfare of the city, or the triumph of your party require the sacrifice, you can stand for live-long hours in the drenching rain, and endure the peltings of wind and storm, rather than forego the right or neglect the duty of casting a vote into the ballot box, and the voice of the public journals and the whole community is, “who cares for rain?” Is it less a duty, is it a meaner privilege to record your vows of praise in the courts of the Lord’s house? If the interests of your business and proper respect to the comfort of your wives and children require the inconvenience, you will breast the storm to provide food and raiment for yourselves and them, and you do well. But is the soul worth less than the body? Will you pamper the one and starve the other? You go to the market on a raining day, and never boast of the performance, will you forsake the sanctuary—because you think peradventure the clouds look a little squally on the Sabbath day? The Sabbath rain is not a whit more injurious to health than the showers that sprinkle you through the week; God can take care of your health on the Sabbath day, as well as he does on Monday or on Saturday. God commands his ministers, and you require your minister to bring beaten oil into the sanctuary, but is it not a hard case, if he is required to leave it on the Lord’s day that its light may shine on empty pews and seats deserted? Is not your duty to hear, equal to his duty to preach? And if, when the sky is overcast, or the clouds are dropping a sprinkling shower, he were uniformly to take his seat by the fire-side and leave the pulpit vacant, would you not soon send him on a pilgrimage? Now, let none suppose, that He whom we serve exacts any hard duty, or that he makes our privilege a penance. He knows our infirmities, and like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pities them that fear him. The infirm, the feeble, the sickly and the aged are in duty obliged to consult the condition and demands of their health, for God says, “I will have mercy and not sacrifice,” and there are times when we feel as though we ought almost to chide them, for not staying at home and cultivating their health with the assiduity manifested by some of more robust constitution. Oh! for the spirit of David, that should make every Christian say, “A day in thy courts is better than a thousand. I had rather be a door-keeper in the house of my God, than to dwell in the tents of wickedness.”

GOVERNMENT OF THOUGHTS.—You esteem it a dreadful thing to be obliged to live with persons who are passionate and quarrelsome. You undoubtedly judge aright: it is like living in a house that is on fire. Dismiss, therefore, as soon as may be, all angry and wrathful thoughts. They canker the mind, and dispose it to be the worst temper in the world, that of fixed malice and revenge. Never recall the ideas of, or impute upon, past injuries and provocations. This is the amusement of many in their solitary hours; but they might as well play with cannon balls or thunderbolts. They may work themselves up to distraction—to hate every thing and every body; and to have the temper and disposition of the Destroyer himself. Anger may steal into the heart of a wise man, but rests only in the bosom of fools. Make the most candid allowance for the offender—consider his natural temper—turn your anger into pity—regard him as ill of a very bad distemper.—Dr. Horne.

THE LOVE OF MONEY.

Money may be taken as a symbol of all that is seductive in the present world, of all that induced the reiterated cautions and pathetic warnings of our Lord and of his apostles against the love of the world. Under no form are we, perhaps, less apt to suspect the inroads of this fatal enemy to all spirituality and usefulness. When accused, it can always make out a good case." The love of gain is urged as duty; it is felt as necessity; it is even deplored at those intervals in which we for a moment awake to a sense of its injurious operation upon our hearts. Covetousness, however, is a vice the existence of which we are the last to perceive and the most backward to acknowledge in ourselves. We think we are "provident for our family," while we are only "covetous for ourselves." The atmosphere of the world is infectious: we find ourselves insensibly catching the tone of its estimates, and falling into its corrupt maxims.—"The unsuccessful aspirer after forbidden wealth is indeed not only avoided, but stigmatized; his crime lies not so much in the attempt as in the failure; while prosperous corruption easily works itself into favour." Interest is perpetually requiring this compromise of principle, this most dangerous species of conformity to the world,—opinion. But after all, perhaps the true source of the love of money, so disgraceful to the professors of a religion of self-denial, of diffusive charity, of believing expectancy, and of implicit reliance, may be traced to a secret desire of a more unlimited independence than that which regards our fellow-creatures. We are discontented with our allotment; we are impatient of the uncertainties and wants which are calculated to mortify our self-sufficiency, and to exercise our faith; we distrust the future, and would entrench ourselves in riches against the calamities inflicted by a chastening providence. We would willingly trust to Him for heaven, if we might but be permitted to secure to ourselves the possession of earth. Such is the heart of man. But in no instance does it more awfully exhibit the hardening influence of riches, than in that of men who profess to be religious, and who may be considered as radically sincere and devout Christians; who build upon the only true foundation, but whose work is "wood, hay, stubble," destined for burning, though they themselves be saved. Is there a more melancholy spectacle than that which often presents itself under forms of the greatest respectability,—a man in whom all the youthful affections, the bloom of character, the generous warmth of feeling, have been nipped and blighted by the spirit of the world; and in whom a cold, calculating policy has poisoned the sources of virtue? The liberality, by means of which these persons pacify their conscience, is often little better than a tax paid to public opinion; a part of the expenses of their character: and they "have their reward." How would such individuals, could they when young have surveyed, as in a prophetic mirror, their future selves dwarfed by prosperity, wrecked in the calm of life, have shrunk from the prospect, and devoutly implored the Almighty not to "give them the desires of their hearts," and "send leanness into their souls!"

TRUTH AND FICTION.—The Archbishop of Canterbury said one day to Garrick: "Pray inform me, Mr. Garrick, how it is that you gentlemen of the stage can affect your auditory with things imaginary as if they were real, while we of the church speak of things real, which many of our congregations receive as things imaginary?" "Why, my lord bishop," replied Garrick, "the reason is plain: we actors speak of things imaginary as if they were real, while too many in the pulpit speak of things real as if they were imaginary." The bishop tacitly acknowledged the justice of the remark, and bowed to the reproof of the actor.

PROFANITY.—There is nothing, in our estimation, so degrading to the character of a man, as the use of profane oaths—it lessens his dignity in the eyes of all who come in contact with him, and is indicative of a coarse and vulgar mind. “To swear is neither brave, polite nor wise,” is a true adage, and should be borne in mind by such as are addicted to profanity. It is heart-rending to the virtuous part of our community, to hear the blasphemous expressions that emanate from the mouths of men who wear the exterior of gentlemen—but more withering is it to hear the horrid oaths that spring from the tongues of many of the lads who perambulate the streets. Hear the Father of his country, the illustrious Washington:—“The foolish and wicked practice of profane swearing and cursing, is so mean and low that every person of sense and character detests and despises it.”

GAMBLING IN FOUR SCENES. BY REV. HENRY W. BEECHER.

Scene First.—A genteel coffee-house, whose human screen conceals a line of green nadier bottles, and hides respectable blushes from impertinent eyes. There is a quiet little room opening out of the bar, and here sit four jovial youths. The cards are out, the wines are in. The fourth is a reluctant hand; he does not love the drink nor approve the game. He anticipates and fears the result of both. Why is he here? He is a whole-souled fellow, and is afraid to seem ashamed of any fashionable gayety. He will sip his wine upon the importunity of a friend newly come to town and is too polite to spoil that friend's pleasure by refusing a part in the game. They sit, shuffle, deal; the night wears on, the clock telling not the passing hour, the prudent liquor fiend has made it safely dumb. The night is getting cold; its dark air grows fresher; the east is gray; the gaming, drinking, and hilarious laughter are over, and the youths wending homeward. What says conscience? No matter what it says: they did not hear, and we will not. Whatever was said, it was very shortly answered thus: “This has not been gambling, all were gentlemen: there was no cheating, simply a convivial evening: no stakes except the bills incident to the entertainment. If any body blames a little exhilaration on a special occasion, he is a superstitious old croaker: let him croak.” Such a garnished game is made the text to justify the whole round of gambling. Let us look at

Scene Second.—In a room so silent that there is no sound except the shrill cackling crowing the morning, where the forgotten candle burns dimly over the long and lengthened wick, sit four men. Carved marble could not be more motionless, save their hands. Pale, watchful, though weary—their eyes pierce the cards, or furtively read each other's faces. Hours have passed over them thus. At length they rise without words; some with a satisfaction which only makes their faces brightly happy, scrape off the piles of money; others dark, sullen, fierce, move slowly away from their lost money. The darkest and fiercest of the four is that young man who first sat down to make out a game. What says he to his conscience now? “I have a right to gamble, I have to be damned, too, if I choose; whose business is it?”

Scene Third.—Years have passed on. He has seen youths ruined, at first with expectation, then only with silent regret, then consenting to take part of the spoils; he himself has decoyed, duped, and stripped them without mercy. Go with me into that dilapidated house, not far from the landing at New Orleans. Look into that dirty room. Around the broken table, sitting upon boxes, or rickety chairs, see a filthy crew dealing cards soiled with tobacco, grease, and liquor. One has a pirate's face, burnished and burned with brandy, a lock of grizzly, matted hair, half covering his villain eyes, which glare out like a wild beast's from a thicket. Close by him wheezes a white-faced, dropsical wretch, vermin-covered and stenchful. A scoundrel Spaniard, and a burly negro—the jolliest of the four—complete the group. They have spectators—drunken sailors, and ogling, thieving, drunken women, who should have died long ago, when all that was womanly died. Here hour draws on hour, sometimes with brutal laughter, sometimes with threat, and oath, and uproar. The last few stolen dollars lost, and temper too, each charges each with cheating, and high words and blows ensue, and the whole gang burst out of the door, beating, biting, scratching, rolling over in the dirt and dust. The worst, the fiercest, most drunken of the four, is our friend who began by making up the game.

Scene Fourth.—Upon this bright day, stand with me, if you would be sick of humanity, and look over that multitude of men, kindly gathered to see a murderer hung. At last a guarded cart drags on a thrice-guarded wretch. At the gallows' ladder he courage fails. His coward feet refuse to ascend; dragged up, he is supported by bustling officers; his brain reels, his eyes swim, while the meek minister utters a final prayer.—The noose is fixed, the signal is given: a shudder runs through the crowd as he swings, free! After a moment his convulsed limbs stretch down and hang heavily and still: and he who began to gamble to make up a game, and ended with stabbing an enraged victim whom he had fleeced, has here played his last game—himself the stake!

CHEAP PLEASURES.

Did you ever study the cheapness of pleasure? Do you know how little it takes to make a man happy? Such trifles as a penny, or a smile, do the work. There are two or three boys passing along—give them each a chestnut, how smiling they look, they will not be cross for some time. A poor widow lives in a neighbourhood who is the mother of half a dozen children: send them half a peck of sweet apples, and they all will be happy. A child has lost his arrow—a world to him—and he mourns sadly; help him to find it, or make him another, and how quickly will the sunshine play upon his sober face. A boy has as much as he can do to pile up a load of wood, assist him a few moments, or speak a pleasant word to him, and he forgets his toil and works away without minding it. Your apprentice has broken a mug, or cut the vest too large, or slightly injured a piece of work, say “You scoundrel,” and he feels miserable; remark, “I am sorry,” and he will try to do better. You employ a man—pay him cheerfully, and speak a pleasant word to him, and he leaves your house with a contented heart, to light up his own hearth with smiles and gladness. As you pass along the street you meet a familiar face—say “Good morning,” as though you felt happy, and it will work admirably in the heart of your neighbour.

Pleasure is cheap—who will bestow it liberally? If there are smiles, sunshine, and flowers all about, let us not grasp them with a miser’s fist, and lock them up in our hearts. No; rather let us take them and scatter them about us, in the cot of the widow, among the groups of children in the crowded mart, where men of business congregate, in our families, and every where. We can make the wretched happy; the discontented cheerful; the afflicted resigned; at exceedingly cheap rates. Who will refuse to do it?

“As ye have therefore opportunity, do good unto all, especially unto them who are of the household of faith.” “Wisdom’s ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace.”

Obituary.

MR. SAMUEL C. EUWER.

Died in New Castle, Pa., on Thursday, the 8th of June, Mr. Samuel C. Euwer, in the 31st year of his age. The deceased was from early youth a member of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, and though called to pass through many temptations and to meet with much to try his faith, he always “walked worthy of the vocation wherewith he was called.” His clear and discriminating mind, comprehensive business talent and the deep interest he took in the affairs of the Church, made him an invaluable member of the congregation to which he belonged. He was one of those men on whose judgment we instinctively rely, and whose advice is not only sought, but followed by both old and young. The integrity of his character and the affability of his manners obtained for him the respect and affection of all who knew him, and his death has spread a gloom over our whole community.

On the 27th of June he was seized with hemorrhage from the throat and lungs. No immediate danger was apprehended until a short time before he died. When it appeared evident that he could not recover, he calmly arranged his business—leaving all his property to his widowed mother—bade farewell with his friends and fell asleep in Jesus. He has gone to the grave; and his friends, the congregation of which he was a member, and the community in which he dwelt, have suffered an irreparable loss, but they mourn not as those who have no hope. In the hour of death his faith did not fail, but in departing he left a well-founded and consoling assurance that he is in a brighter and happier sphere of usefulness—“where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest.”

SECRET SOCIETIES.

By Rev. Joseph T. Cooper.

At a conversational meeting of eight ministers of this city, including the writer, we enjoyed the satisfaction of hearing remarks from each individual relative to the character and tendency of secret societies. It was peculiarly gratifying to perceive the harmony of their views in relation to this subject. These views were, without a single exception, adverse to all such associations. Some were more decided in the disapproval than others in relation to the essential principles involved, but in relation to the injurious tendencies of present existing organizations there was but one opinion. As the subject is one of peculiar and general interest, we have concluded, at the suggestion of the brethren present, to lay before the public a brief synopsis of the grounds upon which this opposition was based, in the hope that it will awaken attention to what is conceived to be serious evils connected with the system.

The first and most obvious objection urged upon the occasion, was the principle of secrecy involved. This point received special consideration, and we shall briefly state the grounds of opposition urged against those societies in which this principle enters.

Perhaps it will present the matter in a clearer and more convincing light to confine the attention to the Order of the Sons of Temperance, inasmuch as this society is regarded as the least liable to objections in this and many other respects. Here a few questions present themselves.

1. Is this society, in common with the societies of Free Masons and Odd Fellows, a secret society? Of this we think there can be no doubt. There is now lying before me a printed copy of the "CONSTITUTION, BY-LAWS AND RULES OF ORDER OF THE HAND IN HAND DIVISION, No. 30, OF THE SONS OF TEMPERANCE, OF THE STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA." The 9th and 10th sections of Art. 4, entitled "DUTIES OF OFFICERS," thus read:—

"Sec. 9. It shall be the duty of the I. S. to attend the door—to admit none but members of the Order and candidates for initiation."

"Sec. 10. The O. S. shall guard the door outside, and keep off intruders."

Under RULES OF ORDER, the 9th item in the "Order of Business," as specified in Rule 2, is as follows, "Has any brother divulged, in violation of his obligation, the private affairs of the Order?"

There can be no reasonable ground to suppose that the laws of this division are different in this respect from that of any other. Here then, is clear proof that there are "private affairs of the Order" which every member is under an obligation not to divulge, and that no one is ever admitted but candidates and members. It is, therefore, a secret society. Whatever may be their affairs, they are private.

Let us then, reader, view it for one moment in this light. Are we in giving our countenance and co-operation to such an institution, acting in accordance with the principles enforced by the Saviour in his conversation with Nicodemus? John iii. 20, 21, "Every one that doeth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deed should be reprov'd. But he that doeth truth cometh to the light, that his his deeds may be made manifest that they are wrought in God." Are we imitating the example of Him who said, John xviii. 21, "In secret have I said nothing?" Surely, if these passages mean any thing, they mean that good objects of a public character should not be promoted by secret means. If this be not their meaning, what else can they mean? Those who were present at the meeting before referred to did not see how it would be possible to preach on these passages without condemning secret associations. Can the reader remove their difficulties?

Some one of the brethren remarked that the simple fact of secrecy could not be regarded as constituting in itself a ground of objection, and in proof adverted to the fact that families, church courts, and legislatures have their "private affairs." To this, however, it was replied, that these associations were not organized on the principle of secrecy. Pledges are not exacted, sentinels are not placed at the outside and inside of the door to guard the entrance. The privacy of their transactions is the result of circumstances of which each individual judges at the time; it has a special end, and in general but a temporary existence. But there is another feature of this secrecy which was regarded as peculiarly objectionable. This is the pledge exacted of all who are admitted to the order. A promise to keep secret any thing before we are made acquainted with it cannot, we are persuaded, but be viewed by any person who gives it his candid and serious consideration as exceedingly rash. That such a promise is given by the Sons of Temperance, (and no one pretends to assert that the Masons and Odd Fellows do not require it,) obviously appears from the following facts. 1. Without a promise of this kind the order must cease to exist as a secret association. If persons, before the promise be given, are made acquainted with the affairs of the order, and are left at liberty to publish them, they are no longer private. Why, then, place sentinels at the door? Why make the inquiry, "Has any brother divulged, in violation of his obligation, the private affairs of the order?" an item in the constitutional "Order of Business?" 2. The National Division expressly declares "All Grand and Subordinate Divisions shall be governed strictly by the rules laid down in the B. B., as well as by the established constitutions, from which they shall in no instance depart, unless by the direction of the National Division." Here the reader will perceive, 1. That there is a B. B., or Blue Book, containing "rules" apart from the "established constitutions." 2. Strict adherence to these rules is required of all grand and subordinate divisions. Now this B. B. without doubt contains the mysteries of the Order, and that an adherence to this is pledged before an acquaintance with it is evident from the "Form of application for Charter," which those who propose to constitute the lowest division must present. In this form they declare, "We pledge ourselves, individually and collectively to be governed by the rules and usages of the Grand Division, and also by those of the National Division." Can you, reader, in truth, in judgment, and in righteousness, "pledge" yourself as an applicant for a charter to be "governed by rules and usages" of which you are necessarily ignorant? Consider this question as it becomes an honest man and a Christian.

Again, this vow or pledge of secrecy was regarded by all the brethren as inconsistent with membership in the church of Christ. The church of Christ is an institution of divine authority. In this church

God has set pastors and teachers. Of these officers he has made it the duty to "watch for souls," to "feed the flock," to "reprove, rebuke, and exhort with all long-suffering and meekness." But how can these duties be performed toward church members while in the lodge-room? An individual is placed at the door, his pastor appears there and asks an entrance, but he is not permitted to cross its threshold. He is driven back as an "intruder," and yet this pastor must watch for the souls that are in that room as one that must give an account. Is it not plain that such institutions interfere directly with the duties of the officers of Christ's house? We contend not that the duties of such require an acquaintance with every circumstance connected with those over whom they have a spiritual oversight, but let it be borne in mind that they are excluded from an acquaintance with the conduct of persons while acting with others (and many of these doubtless the enemies of the church) and while professing to promote the interests of morality. As a member of the church, let the reader seriously consider this matter in another light—let him look at the effect which it will be likely to produce upon his moral and religious character.

We can readily believe that in entering into the Association of the Sons of Temperance he may be prompted by a desire to promote the cause of "LOVE, PURITY, AND FIDELITY." These are "good words," and to the Christian must ever possess peculiar attractions. Let it be remembered, however, that all other secret societies profess to have for their mottos these, or other no less essential virtues of the Christian character. And if the reader will consult an article in the Edinburgh Encyclopædia on this subject, he will find that mottos equally pure were emblazoned upon the banners, and the amelioration of mankind from serious evils presented as the exclusive object of those secret societies whose existence proved in other countries so disastrous to the cause of religion. After an account of their operations and their sad results, the author of the article thus remarks, "This recital is too well authenticated to be called in question, and too plain to need a commentary. Let it be a warning against all secret societies by whatever title of benevolence they may be designated by those who form them."

There never was an institution which had not for its professed object, the physical, moral or religious improvement of man. Without this it could not exist for a day; and we have little doubt that many of those institutions which it is well known subsequently became engines of cruelty and crime, were formed from the purest motives of benevolence. This perversion from the original object, was the natural result of the operation of the principle of secrecy which was originally admitted into the organization.

Christian friend, can you reconcile the titles applied to the members of the orders of Masonry, Odd Fellowship, and the Sons of Temperance, with that humility which should adorn the character of the disciples of Jesus. You read your Bible, and there you discover that you are a poor sinner—there you are instructed to be "clothed about with humility"—to "stand not in the place of great men"—to "mind not high things"—to "receive not honour one of another," but to "seek the honour that cometh from God only"—to call no man "Rabbi," "Master." You enter the lodge of the Sons of Temperance, and there you give and receive the appellations of "Grand Worthy Patriarch,"

"Most Worthy Patriarch," &c. Of the Odd Fellows, and you greet others, and are saluted yourself, with the title of "Most Worthy Grand Sire," "Right Worthy D. G. Sire," and a great many other Right Worthies and Grand Worthies. Is there not an inconsistency here? Would the Saviour or his apostles, think you, have given his countenance to an institution abounding with such high-sounding titles? Surely you cannot think so. Reflect for one moment, also, upon the relation which a connexion with any of these institutions will establish between yourself and many who have not the fear of God in their hearts. As a professed follower of Jesus, you doubtless will admit that the church of Christ possesses a divine organization. The relationship, therefore, existing between you and those who are connected with this organization, must be admitted to be of a most intimate character. This relation is expressed by the endearing and expressive name of "brother;" but you enter a secret lodge, you see there an individual who, though he may be a temperate man, yet whose conduct gives sad evidence that he has no love for the Saviour, for the Bible, the Sabbath, or the church of God—(alas! how many such are there in connexion with secret societies)—this individual you must address as a "brother," a "most worthy" brother. Let it not be said, that they are brothers as members of the same human family, for it is not as such they are addressed by this name, but simply as Masons, Odd Fellows, or Sons of Temperance. Here, therefore, is an institution establishing a brotherhood between certain members of the human family, to the exclusion of others, which is nothing but a voluntary association. Can the effect of this fail to diminish that respect and affection which professing Christians should cherish towards each other, as members of the family of Him who is "the First Born among many brethren?"

This relationship, which is the result of a voluntary association, exerts a controlling influence over those who sustain it in the practice of one of the most prominent of the Christian virtues, charity. It cannot be doubted, that membership with the order is regarded by the order as presenting the highest claim to the benevolence of its members. This appears from the very nature of the organization, from the character of its machinery; and an examination of its operations would make it abundantly plain. It cannot be otherwise. But we would respectfully submit it to the Christian reader, whether he is not dishonouring the name of the blessed Master, by passing by the claims of one of his own poor, but destitute, disciples, and selecting, as the object of his benevolent regards, "an alien from the commonwealth of Israel, and a stranger from the covenants of promise." Is it not a reversion of the apostolic rule, "As ye have opportunity, do good to all men, but especially (not to the mystic brotherhood, but) to the household of faith."

But let the reader consider this feature of the organization in another point of view. Let him inquire whether the money which he contributes professedly as a charity, is appropriated to that specific object. By an examination of the constitutions and by-laws of the order of the Sons of Temperance, we find that the initiation fee shall not be less than three dollars and fifty cents. Besides this, there is a weekly contribution of  $6\frac{1}{4}$  cents, making an annual contribution of more than three dollars. "On the death of a brother, each member shall pay the sum of 25 cents, and on the death of a brother's wife,  $12\frac{1}{2}$  cents." Five dollars must be paid by those applying for a charter for a sub-division, and twenty dollars for a charter for a grand division. Five per cent. of the receipts of the sub-division must be paid for the support of the grand division, and ten per cent. on its receipts for the support of the national division. These statements are all taken directly from the official documents before us. The expenses incurred by membership with the society of Odd Fellows are still greater. There are, doubtless, many incidental expenses. It will be perceived that these expenses, viewed in the aggregate, are considerable. Let the reader now inquire what proportion of this money is disbursed for the relief of the destitute. Let him inquire into the actual expenses incurred by the erection of halls, the purchase of regalia, banners, &c., &c., (to say nothing of the time spent at the meetings, which is more precious than money,) and we are persuaded, if he gives the matter a fair examination, he will be very far from coming to the conclusion, that it is an economical expenditure of his money for charitable purposes. All we ask is that he should, as he is certainly bound to do, as the Lord's steward, give the matter his serious attention.

Christian reader, look at the matter a little closer. Can the money thus contributed be called a charity? This is certainly an important inquiry, not only because all these institutions set up a claim to this Christian virtue, as that which entitles them to the approbation and support of the benevolent, but because of the high and holy character of the virtue itself. To this claim, the brethren present at the meeting before referred to, felt themselves bound, as messengers of that gospel which proclaims "peace on earth and good-will to men," to give their special consideration. The result of this was the conviction that it was unfounded. A few reasons for this may be given:

1st. It wants the name. True, "LOVE, PURITY, AND FIDELITY" are emblazoned upon the banners of the Sons of Temperance, and similar mottos breathing charity are displayed by other secret associations. But open the constitutions of its several divisions, and there you read of "FEES." Now a "fee" Webster defines to be "a reward or compensation for services." Can such a thing be called charity? Is it not degrading this heaven-born virtue to designate "a compensation for services" by such a name?

2d. The amount contributed professedly as a charity, is prescribed by the laws of the Association. It is something which he must pay, upon the pain of expulsion. Does this consist with the apostolic rule, "Let every one of you lay by him in store as God hath prospered him?" Does it consist with the no less authoritative direction "Every man according as he purposeth in his heart, so let him give, not grudgingly, or of necessity, for God loveth a cheerful giver."

3d. The money contributed is placed at the absolute disposal of a superior power. We refer not to the body of which the individual contributing is a member, and in the operations of which he has in common with other contributors, a voice, but to a power above that body. Is the individual a member of a sub-division of the Sons of Temperance? he contributes his money under rule 18th of the "CONSTITUTION FOR GRAND DIVISIONS." "Any division, neglecting to comply with the rules and regulations of the grand division, shall forfeit its charter and other property, if two-thirds of the members present at any regular meeting of the grand division concur therein: provided, however, subordinate divi sions, in all cases, shall have the right of appeal to the national division." Is the individual contributing a member of a grand division? he contributes his money under the following constitutional regulation of the national division: "Any grand division refusing or neglecting to enforce or comply with the rules, usages, or laws of the national division, shall forfeit its charter and all its properties, if two-thirds of the members present at any regular meeting of this body (the national division,) vote therefor. In such case, the representatives of the division under trial shall not be allowed to vote." Now passing over what might be said in relation to the dangers to be apprehended from such a supreme, and absolute, and irresponsible power extending over the whole Union, and its liability to abuse, let the Christian reader ask himself whether, in the light of God's holy word, money contributed under such a condition can be called a charity?

4th. The laws of these associations are exclusive and partial, and, consequently, wanting in true charity. The second section of article 14th of the by-laws of the Hand in Hand Division declares, that "persons between 45 and 50 years of age, shall pay fifty cents per year, in addition to the initiation fee; from 50 to 55, one dollar per year; from 55 to 60, two dollars per year, after which age no person shall be admitted to the division as a beneficial member." According to this provision, as the infirmities of age grow upon an individual, his fees are increased, and when he arrives at that age in which he becomes an appropriate object of charity, its kind hand is withdrawn. This provision may be prudent, viewing the society as a mutual insurance society; but does it breathe the spirit of charity? Does it consist with "The diffusion of good-will to all mankind," which is expressly declared in the "circular" published by the grand division of the Sons of Temperance of the State of Pennsylvania, to be one of "the objects of the order of the Sons of Temperance?" The laws of the order of Odd Fellows are still more exclusive and partial. Have we not, therefore, Christian reader, good reasons for coming to the conclusion, that such institutions are not animated by a true charity—a charity which seeks to infold, like the bright belt of Saturn, a world in her embrace? But it may be asked, are not the destitute relieved? Yes, but this relief comes to the individual as a quid pro quo; not as a charity. It comes to him on the same principle that it comes from a Fire Insurance company, after the destruction of his property. But who thinks of calling such an institution a charitable institution? Who thinks, when he is giving the insurance "fee," that he is exercising a spirit of charity?

Again, it may be asked, why not avail yourself of the benefits to be derived from such an association in case of necessity? We answer, for the reasons already specified in the foregoing part of this article. There are mutual insurance societies, presenting none of the objectionable features which characterize these institutions, and securing at less expense greater advantages. But, Christian friend, suppose there were no such institutions, you are a member of a society having confessedly a divine founder, and for its fundamental law love to the brethren. Do you really believe that the church of God possesses this character? If not, proclaim your disbelief to the world, and renounce your connexion with her, for unless this be her character in reality, she deserves, claiming as she does a relation to the pure world above, your indignant scorn and decided opposition. But so long as you continue your membership with this society you profess your belief that the "Love" which animates her members—that the "Purity" which dwells in their hearts—that the "Fidelity" which guards their interests are higher, and holier, and stronger, than are to be found in any earthly association. Are we, therefore, asking too much of you, as a Christian professor, to trust to the force of these principles in the hearts of your Christian brethren to extend to you relief in the hour of need? We are aware that the church is charged with criminal recreancy. From whom does this charge come? Is it from a friend? That friendship surely, if you have the spirit of Him "who loved the church, and gave himself for her," will prompt you to awaken her to her duty, and in order to this, set before your brethren an example of true active self-sacrificing benevolence. Let it be seen that so far as your example as a member of the church goes, the charge is unfounded. Let it be seen that your benevolence in that relation, which you cannot but regard as the most endearing of all relations, is worthy of a follower of Him "who, though he were rich, yet for our sakes became poor, that we through his poverty might be made rich."

But if you cannot confide in the "love, purity, and friendship" of the church, can you not confide in the care and kindness of your Heavenly Father—of Him who has said, "Trust in the Lord, and do good: so shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed?" "Thy bread shall be given thee, and thy water shall be sure."

Christian reader, there are two more thoughts on this subject which we beg leave affectionately to present to your serious consideration. In the first place look at the professions of these secret associations. Are you an Odd Fellow, you profess to be governed by the principles of "Friendship, Love, and Truth." Are you a Son of Temperance, you profess to be governed by the principles of "Love, Purity, and Fidelity." These are the mottos which you have inscribed upon your banners. Now look at these virtues. How holy, how exalted! Can the church of Jesus Christ occupy a higher position? Can she hold forth stronger claims to our affectionate regards than an association adapted to the promotion of these God-like virtues? Surely those in whose hearts Love sways her peaceful sceptre—upon whose understanding Truth sheds her heavenly beams—whose souls Purity regenerates and sanctifies, and whose dearest rights and interests Fidelity, with her watchful eye and strong arm, safely guards, surely such persons have but little need of the gospel of Jesus Christ, and the church which he has purchased with his blood. Is not your connexion, then, with societies putting forth such claims inconsistent with the views which, as a Christian professor, you are supposed to entertain of the blood-bought church of your Redeemer, her ministry and ordinances?

In the second place, look at the influence which a connexion with these societies, in many instances, exerts upon the young and inexperienced. Do you see their members, after this connexion has been formed, manifesting the same interest in religious matters? Do you see them observing with the same regularity the worship of God in their families? Do you see them attending with the same frequency and punctuality the weekly prayer meeting and lecture room? Do you see them exhibiting the same degree of interest in advancing the benevolent operations of the church? We believe that your answer will be no. Such at least was the united testimony of those whose free conversation on the subject has given occasion to these remarks, and this testimony was confirmed by a reference to not a few painful instances which had come under the observation of the brethren. If such, then, be the tendency of these secret associations, and if the considerations which we have presented have any force, permit me to submit to your serious reflection the question, "Is the lodge-room the place for a Christian professor?"

OLD PSALM TUNES.

To forward the favourable reception of such tunes, two facts, as to their original intention, must be practically borne in mind. They were sung faster than we usually sing them, and, what is better, by a far greater number of voices. It is a great mistake to suppose that old tunes should be sung in a heavier drawling style. Our forefathers in the church were cheerful Christians. A psalm of a dozen verses was but short to them. Hence as well from this as from other circumstances, it is clear that they sang in a quicker, livelier manner than is commonly conjectured. The Old Hundredth tune is made a dirge in our days, but in theirs it was a joyous and animating canticle. "All people that on earth do dwell, sing to the Lord with cheerful voice!" In like manner, York tune, which is shelved among the dull and obsolete, was little more than a century ago, the liveliest and most popular tune of the entire kingdom. But to hear old tunes to advantage, they must be sung in old style. Not only must they be sung with decent gravity and cheerful sanctity, but by masses of people, by a multitude of voices, "by all the people together," as the original direction states. Six thousand voices were wont to be heard at St. Paul's Cross; and "three or four thousand singing at a time in a church of this city is but a trifle," said the excellent Roger Ascham in a letter from Augsburg, dated the 14th of May, 1551. When Psalm tunes are sung after this fashion, there will be an energy and interest with which but few are now familiar. Without long and incongruous interludes, or opera-like whinings of select voices, our churches, when such psalmody returns to them, will present as much of "heaven below" as our sinful state will admit.

SYSTEM IN STUDY.

Said the distinguished Lord Chatham to his son, "I would have inscribed on the curtains of your bed, and the walls of your chamber, 'If you do not rise early, you can never make progress about any thing. If you do not set apart your hours of reading, if you suffer yourself, or any one else, to break in upon them, your days will slip through your hands unprofitable and frivolous, and really unenjoyed by yourself.'"

A HINT TO MINISTERS

AS TO HOW OFTEN THEY SHOULD PREACH THE SAME SERMON.

It was on a Monday morning that I called upon the Rev. Dr. P., of Edinburgh, (Scotland,) whom I found in a most merry laughing mood.

"Why, what's the matter, Doctor, that you are so merry so early in the morning?"

"Had you been here a little earlier," said he, "you would have been laughing too. Did you meet a man going down the court as you came up it?"

"I did, Doctor."

"Take a chair, then, till I can tell you the object of his so early visit to me on Monday morning."

He laughed again, after which, by screwing and bracing, he succeeded to finish the tale, when ——— laughed more than the Doctor.

"The person you met in the court," said the Doctor, "is one of my people, who felt it his duty to make so early a call this morning, to reprove me for a very great sin, which he conceived me to be guilty of committing yesterday.

"Yesterday morning I preached from such a text, and being under engagement as supply in the afternoon, for Rev. Mr. E., of Leith, who was sick, I preached the same discourse to his people. It so happened that this person, whom you met in the court, went down (after the morning service) to Leith, to visit his daughter, who was sick. Having seen the child, he went to hear Mr. E. preach, when, lo! who should preach but the man he had heard in the morning, and what should he hear but the same sermon!! This, sir, constituted the very heinous sin of which I was guilty—the preaching at Leith the same sermon which I had preached at Edinburgh. And so grievously great, in his account, is this my sin, that I ought therefore to be rebuked; and to discharge which act of brotherly kindness to me was the object of his so early visit this morning.

“As he was not in the habit of calling, his visit rather surprised me; the more so on Monday morning, at so early an hour.

“I could perceive by his rather hurried and confused manner that he wanted to say something which he knew not how to introduce. To assist him, therefore, I said, ‘John, I apprehend you have called upon me for some certain purpose; if so, proceed to inform me of the object of your visit.’

“After some humming, much ridding of the throat, accompanied by some few mutterings expressive of the regret and sorrow he felt that there should have existed such cause for his visit, he said, ‘Doctor, did you not preach yesterday morning from such a text?’

“‘Yes, John.’

“‘After morning service, I went down to Leith to visit my daughter, who is sick, and being there, thought I would step in and hear Mr. E. preach, but found you in the pulpit in his stead; and did you not there preach the same sermon you preached in your own church in the morning?’

“‘I did, John, and I will tell you why I did it. I was some miles off, in another town, and in another congregation. If my sermon was of importance to you in Edinburgh, it certainly was so for them in Leith. But, John, I very well observe the object of your early visit. The questions you have put inform me both of its nature and design. You do not intend, I presume, to number me among the ‘dumb dogs that cannot bark,’ but you rank me among the ‘idle shepherds,’ because I preached the same sermon at Leith in the afternoon that I had delivered in the morning at Edinburgh, being too lazy, as you suppose, to prepare another for them there; and you felt it your duty, did you not, to call upon me to reprove me for such conduct?’

“‘I did, Doctor; yet not exactly to reprove you, but to warn you against such conduct in future, as I consider it very improper, if not very sinful.’

“‘I thank you, John, and am willing to believe you my friend, and that you are sincere in what you have done.’

“‘I am all you say, Doctor, and more too.’

“‘That I am ready to admit, John; yet must tell you that I am more than a little skeptical as to what you affirm respecting the sinfulness and impropriety of preaching a sermon a second time, when preached under circumstances such as mine yesterday was, away from home, and to a new congregation. But skeptic as I am, and unable as I feel to believe exactly upon these points as you do, you now have it in your power, John, to convince me of another fact, if you will; namely, the propriety or impropriety of preaching more than once the same sermon to the same people. I felt, John, that that sermon was on an important and solemn subject; a subject eminently calculated, aided by the Spirit of God, to admonish and edify, not our church only, but every Christian society; and could not fail of meeting a cordial response in every sanctified breast that listened to it.’

“‘It was all you say, Doctor. I never have heard a sermon I liked better. It was indeed a solemn and impressive sermon; a convincing and stirring discourse—just such a sermon as the church of God, in her present circumstances, requires; and, with all, it was so plain that all could understand and remember it.’

“‘Well, John, as to the remembering it, you have had an advantage above all others, inasmuch as you have heard it twice, and by your remembering or forgetting of this sermon, you have it now in your power of convincing me of the propriety or impropriety of preaching the same sermon a second or more times even at home. Now from the fact that you have heard it twice, and that but yesterday, I hope you are able to repeat for the assistance of others, and the edification of your own soul, the greater part of it, and the more especially so since you say it was so plain and easy to be remembered. The introduction to the sermon was neither lengthy nor far-fetched; you are able to tell me how I introduced it?’

“After a good deal of shifting, and changing of his position on his seat, he said,

"Well, no, Doctor, I have pretty much forgotten the manner in which you introduced the subject."

"Well, John, you cannot have forgotten the divisions of the discourse. There was nothing artificial about them; they arose naturally out of the text, and were such as every reflecting mind could not fail to see. What was the first?"

"It, too, was lost in forgetfulness."

"Well, the second, what was it? Well, let us pass to the third; can you tell me it?"

"Nor could one of them be produced."

"Well, John, you cannot possibly have forgotten the improvement made of the subject. You very well remember, I doubt not, the many and various classes of characters therein addressed, and the many and important Christian duties inculcated. The improvement, John, was, of all the sermon, the most awful, solemn and impressive part. It you cannot surely have forgotten?"

"It was, sir, it was. It made a deep impression on my mind, and I could see very well it did on many others also; but, Doctor, I have a bad memory, and am sorry I can repeat but little of the improvement either."

"I waited some time for that 'little,' but found that the improvement also was lost. I then said,

"Well, John, so far are you from convincing me of the sinfulness and impropriety of preaching a sermon a second time when I go from home, that you have convinced me of the necessity of performing a new duty I never thought of before, namely, the preaching of important sermons twice and again at home."

"When you go home, John, you had better reflect upon the object of your visit to me; and while you are doing that I shall reflect whether it is not my duty to you to preach next Sunday morning, a third time, the same sermon, with a view to assist your so treacherous memory."

"I need not add that John retired, apparently suffering by most mortified feelings."

Where is that Church in which is not to be found many such Johns? All cry Fy, fy, at the repetition of a sermon, but try them as John was tried, and you will find that bad memories are the curse not of John alone. But how appalling the consideration of such a state of things! how discouraging to ministers, and how ruinous to immortal souls! How numerous in every church the 'wayside' hearers!—Christian Intelligencer.

Romanism.

PRESENT CONDITION OF ROMANISM IN THE UNITED STATES.

The Editor of the Catholic Herald gives the following view of the condition of the Church with which he is connected.

It is a singular fact that so few comparatively of the Catholic youth of this country devote themselves to the service of the Church in the holy Ministry. Among the many thousands of Catholic families in our country, there must be an immense number of young men who every year arrive at that period at which it is usual to decide the question of one's future occupation. But of this immense number how many turn their thoughts to the priesthood? We believe, if a thorough inquiry were instituted, the number would be found exceedingly small. Our own acquaintance may not be sufficiently extensive to form an accurate estimate of the number, but it embraces scarcely more than one or two! We have many colleges scattered through the land, at which hundreds of youths annually finish their education, but how very few of them embrace the ecclesiastical state? Our ecclesiastical seminaries generally contain, not more than ten or twelve students. And of this small number, very few, we believe, belong to families long residents in this country. Nearly all of them are young men who have been led by charity and zeal (worthy of all praise) to leave their land and their kindred for the missionary life of our country. But where are the young men of American birth, or at least, of American education? They are not to be found (with but few exceptions) among those who have devoted themselves to the ecclesiastical state. They have gone to swell the ranks of the various secular pursuits of life. This, we conceive, is a lamentable fact. When we consider how utterly inadequate is the present supply of clergymen, and how necessary it is that a host of labourers should be raised from among our own youth for the many destitute missions even now calling loudly and most imploringly for the ministrations of religion, we cannot but think it is a subject which deserves more attention than it has yet received. We believe the venerable prelates of our Church have not only set forth from time to time the importance of rearing up a body of native clergymen, but have also done what was in their power to accomplish so desirable an object. Indeed, if we mistake not, our Holy Father, the Sovereign Pontiff, has deemed the subject one of sufficient importance to demand his wise suggestions and counsels. Although in so doing he has but pursued that course which has always been the settled policy of the Church. A nation of people may be converted by missionaries from other lands, but sooner or later there must be raised up from its native population a body of men to take the places of those whose career of usefulness on earth has been finished, or else the work of salvation will not only fail to be carried on, but the ground already acquired will be gradually lost.

The devoted men who have come from other lands for our good, have done and are still doing much, for the spread of Catholicity over our country. But they are few in number, and indeed, wholly insufficient to do justice to the wants of the flocks which have already been gathered. Where then are the men to go forth and labour for the conversion of the millions of our fellow countrymen who know nothing of Catholicity, but what they have learned from its enemies? We look for them in vain. They cannot be found. And yet, without them the church cannot possibly extend her influence as she should. She may grow and grow with considerable rapidity, as is now happily the case, but unless there shall be a body of clergymen trained from among the young men of our country, it is manifest that Catholics, in point of numbers, must always remain a small minority, or, in other words, the great mass of our countrymen must remain what they are now. It is very true that the number of Catholics has greatly multiplied for the last ten years. But it should be remembered that while this increase has been taking place, the population of the country has also greatly increased. So that there is reason to believe that the number of Catholics in proportion to the population is not greater than it was ten years ago. The population of the United States at present is about twenty millions. The number of Catholics is estimated at 1,200,000. We are therefore only about one sixteenth of the entire population. And as our increase is scarcely more rapid than that of the population of the country, which is 32 per cent. every decade of years, it follows that at the present rate, we must for ever remain but one sixteenth of the people, or in other words, fifteen-sixteenths of the American people must remain strangers to the Catholic Church.

ROMAN CATHOLIC IMMIGRANTS.

We have often expressed the opinion that a large portion of Romish immigrants abandon their church after coming to this country. And this opinion has confirmation in a recent article in the Freeman's Journal, the Romish paper in New York. That paper says:

"These defections, alas, may be called not only numerous, but frightfully numerous. Every priest will attest, every town in the land is a crying witness of it. Week before last, two gentlemen, unacquainted with each other, called on us at different times. Each had recently arrived from Ireland, and the conversation chancing with the first of them to turn on the comparative state of the Irish at home and in America, he remarked with horror, that of his numerous acquaintances who had preceded him to this country, he found a fearfully large proportion of them who never went to church at all. And on our mentioning it to the second gentleman, he said he had found the same thing. They had become Kirwanites—infidels."

THE FEMALE ROCK.

Kirwan's letter V. to Bishop Hughes has just arrived, and I have devoured its contents with ravishment. His remarks on Rome's egregious "mistake" in pitching upon Peter for pope, instead of "one of the sons of thunder," are inimitable for their good humour, but especially for the deep incisions which they make into the bishop's false system. I am of the opinion that the bishop begins to find that if he is indeed "Giles Scroggins, (that's the question,) then he has lost a horse;" for he has fallen asleep in the old cart which used to carry him to market, more than half-way from home. Why has he quit the field at this time? the irresistible conclusion is, that he is the same "Giles Scroggins." I think that I, myself, can show reason why there must have been a "mistake" in the selection of a first pope; at all events, I find rather an insuperable barrier in the way of Peter being the one. It is found in the passage, "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church." I hope the bishop will look at this seriously, and if he does, he will find, though like Kirwan, the writer is a "private interpreter," that he can never ride on this horse again to old Rome.

On this passage I can hear him reasoning with his own "dear people" in words like these: "Why does the 'God-man' address Peter, whose name signifies rock, in this pointed and intimate manner, and then immediately add, 'upon this rock I will build my church,' if he does not mean that Peter is the rock to which he refers?" I would answer for them thus. Father Hughes, we have learned that there are two words in the Greek language which signify rock. The one is of the masculine, or male gender, and the other of the feminine or female gender. It may surprise you a little to talk of a male rock, and a female rock; but it was common with the ancients to apply gender to inanimate things; and I have heard geologists of the present day, when lecturing on the different layers or strata of rock, speak of species of rocks that answer to male and female.

Now the Greek word which denotes the masculine, or male rock, is Petros, and this is the Greek word for our English Peter. The Greeks would have called the apostle Simon Rock, while we call him Simon Peter.

But the word which denotes the feminine, or female rock, is Petra, a word of the feminine gender, entirely different from Petros, the male rock, and just so far opposite to it as masculine is to feminine. Any name prefixed to this rock, could not be the name of a male. It could not be Simon Rock, nor James Rock, nor John Rock. It must either be Mary Rock, or Elizabeth Rock, or, if you please, Joan Rock. The Greek language could admit of no prefixed name to this word, unless it were of the same gender with itself, which is purely feminine.

Now, dear Father Hughes, we pray you to observe that when the "God-man" addresses Peter in the above passage, he uses the masculine word Petros, the very word which denotes a male rock; but when speaking of the rock upon which he would build his church, he uses the feminine word Petra, female rock.

With all deference, Rev. Father, this proves to our minds, that the rock upon which the "God-man" designed to build his church, was a different rock from Peter, his name denoting a gentleman, this a lady. O that we had no minds of our own! for when we exercise them here, they prove to us that Peter was no female, and yet mother church fulminates eternal damnation against our souls, if we doubt that he was the first pope, "Lord God of the World."

But further. It is evident to our minds, that the "God-man" was drawing a distinct contrast between the two rocks here used; for he places the pronoun this, before the rock upon which he was to build his church, to show that he put more stress upon it than upon Peter. It is as if he had said, "I indeed say that thou art Petros, but it is upon this Petra that I will build my church." And, indeed, this is what he did in reality say, for the pronoun this, in the original is also feminine. The Greek words this rock are Tautæ Petra, which you know are both purely feminine. It is, therefore, clear to us, that in this passage there is a distinct contrast drawn between Petros, Peter; and Tautæ Petra, this female rock. "I indeed say unto thee, that thou art Petros, rock of the male gender; but upon Tautæ Petra, this rock of the female gender, I will build my church."

begin to fear that the successors in the popedom have all been of the wrong gender. There is a fearful mistake somewhere, and we are anxious to know whether or not it could be rectified. Would it not be better to say, that the Holy Virgin, instead of Peter, was the first pope? for her name prefixed to this Petra would be in keeping with the passage; and it would be more consistent to build the church upon one who loved the Master so tenderly throughout, being "last at the cross, and first at the grave," than upon Peter, who denied him with oaths and curses, and horrible blasphemy. And you know that she would have one proper successor at any rate. We mean Pope Joan, and it is time that we had more such. Then "Our Lady" would be both "Mother of God," and his vicegerent on earth besides. O admirable! admirable! "Our Lady" would be the first pope, and instead of Pius IX., we would now have some chaste nun to be the Lord of the World.—N. Y. Obs.

Ecclesiastical Intelligence.

By the following communication it will be seen that a pastoral connexion has been formed between the Ryegate Congregation and Mr. Hill. We hope it may produce great good to all concerned. We trust Dr. McLeod will comply with the request for the publication of his sermon, and thus add another to the valuable discourses which he has already furnished to the Christian community.

ORDINATION OF MR. HILL.

On Monday, September 4th, 1848, a committee of the Northern Reformed Presbytery met in the church in Ryegate, and ordained to the ministry Mr. Robert A. Hill, installing him pastor of the Reformed Presbyterian church in that place. The sermon was preached by Rev. Dr. McLeod of New York, from 1 Cor. i. 21, last clause, "It pleased God, by the foolishness of preaching, to save them that believe." The charges to the pastor and people were given by Rev. David J. Patterson of Brooklyn, and the solemnities of the day were waited upon by a very large and deeply interested audience, on whom a powerful impression for good was evidently made.

The Ryegate congregation is one of the oldest in the Reformed Presbyterian church. They date their origin from the commencement of the present century, and have, through various vicissitudes, continued to uphold the Reformed Presbyterian banner in that interesting part of New England where they reside, up to the present day. In the secession of 1832-3, a large number separated from them, and the pastor, who had formerly laboured among them, and who went with the secession, departed for the western country. Like their noble ancestors in Scotland immediately after the persecuting period, they were left for a season without officers. But they maintained their integrity. They applied to the Presbytery in whose bounds they are, and a commission being sent, four elders were chosen by the people, and ordained to office among them. Since that period they have been stately supplied with the ordinances of the gospel; and now God has rewarded their faith and patience by sending a pastor, we doubt not, "according to his own heart."

The ordination service took place in the old building where, some forty-eight years ago, Rev. Dr. Wylie, the oldest minister in the church, was ordained by Rev. Messrs. McKinney and Gibson; and there were persons present at Mr. Hill's ordination, who had witnessed the former service. While the service was progressing, many tears of joy were shed, and after it was over, many declared to the ministers who had been engaged, that they thanked God for what their eyes had seen and their ears had heard that day. It was a reviving time to Ryegate and its vicinity. Another circumstance, giving interest to the work of the day, arose out the peculiar position which the young pastor occupied to the church. He had offered himself to the foreign missionary work, and had expected labour abroad. But as his preparations were in progress, it became evident to the friends with whom he had advised, and ultimately to his own mind, that his work was at home. Very unexpectedly to him, the call to Ryegate was tendered, and he felt conscientiously compelled to accept it. It was felt by all that the hand of God was in all this, and He thought brought a hallowed influence over the solemnities of the day. A fine field of usefulness is thus opened before our devoted young man; and we would not be surprised to find that he will soon need a helper in its cultivation. The older ministers of the Reformed Presbyterian church will rejoice that one of her oldest posts is so successfully re-occupied; and others will rejoice with them. We understand that a copy of Dr. McLeod's discourse at the ordination has been requested for publication, and will probably be furnished. We wish (having had the pleasure of hearing them,) that the able, pointed, and eloquent charges of Mr. Patterson could go along with it. P.

MISSION TO NOVA SCOTIA.

It gives us great pleasure to find by the following article in The Guardian, of Halifax, N. S., that the services of our esteemed brother, Rev. H. GORDON, are so highly appreciated in the interesting field of labour to which he has been sent. We trust he may be honoured as an instrument of very extensive and lasting good:

"On the last Sabbath of July, the Lord's Supper was dispensed in the Reformed Presbyterian Meeting House of the above named place, to seventy-seven communicants. Several of the members were, to their great grief, unavoidably absent. Mr. Clarke was assisted on the occasion, by the Rev. Henry Gordon, recently sent to his aid by the Reformed Presbyterian Synod of North America. The order, decorum, solemnity, and devotional spirit, manifested by the congregation throughout the whole of the sacred festival, very far exceeded the most sanguine expectations of the lately arrived minister.

Mr. G. promises well. He is very young: only in his twenty-third year, and yet evinces a thorough acquaintance with the system of Evangelical Truth. Evidently willing "to spend and be spent" for the prosperity of the cause in which he has embarked, he is "received gladly" wherever he goes; and his services give great and universal satisfaction. May the God of Missions abundantly prosper the labours of his youthful servant, to the everlasting benefit of many, in the vast, important, and famishing field in which he is a commissioned helper.

Mr. G. has been four weeks in the place, and but little at rest, and has not been able to visit yet, more than the half of the field of Mr. C.'s labours. Twenty years has Mr. Clarke laboured in this field, ten of which he has been entirely alone. Although deeply to be regretted that ministerial aid was not much sooner in the field, it is a matter of both wonder and astonishment, as well as of great thankfulness to God, that Mr. C. has been enabled to hold together, for so long a time, the elements of a circuit, at least sixty miles square, and in the face of such opposition and discouragement. 'HITHERTO HATH THE LORD HELPED.'

THE ENDOWMENT OF THE IRISH PRIESTHOOD.—The London Daily News says: "The endowment of the Irish Catholic clergy is likely to be brought forward next session, with the support of the three influential parties in Parliament." The Cork Examiner believes that the subject will probably be shortly discussed by the Catholic hierarchy, and thinks that while they will unequivocally repudiate pensioning and State connexion, it is probable that the attachment of a house and glebe land to each parish as a permanent endowment will meet with their approval. The Scotchman, of Saturday, contains an elaborate article, animadverting on the modified scheme supposed to be contemplated by the leading parties in the State; viz. providing for the Catholic clergy out of exclusively Irish resources.

PRESBYTERIANISM IN PRUSSIA.—It is said that in reconstituting the ecclesiastical state in Prussia, it is the intention of the King to adopt the Presbyterian form of government. The King's own preference is said to be for Episcopacy; but the opinions of the people are decidedly in favour of another polity. In May of 1843, several ministers from Prussia were in Edinburgh, and witnessed the disruption of the Church of Scotland. One of these, Rev. Mr. Sydow, has since published a book on the subject, warmly espousing the Free Church side, and has stated, in the introduction, that the work was written at the suggestion of Prince Albert. The name of Mr. Sydow appears in the list of ecclesiastical commissioners empowered to make arrangements for organizing the Presbyterian Church of Prussia.

RECENT MEETING OF THE PHILADELPHIA REFORMED PRESBYTERY.

This Presbytery held a meeting about the close of last month, (September,) commencing sessions on the 27th day. Mr. John M'Millan, a student of Theology, delivered a discourse with much approbation, as a specimen of improvement. Mr. John G. M'Vickar, who had been a student of Theology under the care of the Ref. Pres. Synod, in Ireland, was received under the care of Presbytery on the ground of his testimonials, which were of a very excellent character. Mr. M'Vickar having delivered with approbation the usual pieces of trial, and sustained a satisfactory examination, was licensed to preach the everlasting gospel. May the divine blessing rest upon his labours, and may the excellent abilities which he possesses, prove eminently useful to all who may wait upon his services.

Petitions for stated supplies of preaching were presented from upwards of thirty persons residing in Penn's Manor, Bucks county, Pa., and from more than fifty in the district of Moyamensing. These petitions were referred to an appropriate committee. They lead to an encouraging hope that in a short time flourishing congregations may be built up in both these places, if persons could be found able and willing to preach to them. Are there not some who will offer themselves for the work of the ministry, to supply the destitutions of our own land, as well as to go far hence to the Gentiles? God is opening up fields of usefulness. Who will enter and occupy?

TOLERATION IN ROMAN CATHOLIC COUNTRIES.

WALDENSES,—SPAIN, &c.

"We lately announced that the Roman Catholics in Italy, abandoning their old habit of persecution, had allowed to the Waldenses of Piedmont the free exercise of their worship. We had the gratification to state that four bishops had signed petitions asking for the establishment of religious liberty. But the reality has not answered our expectations, and we gave the Romish church more credit for liberality than it deserved.

"From authentic information, we are authorized to say, that the late laws have afforded hardly any relief from the oppression under which the protestants of Piedmont have so long groaned. They can now, it is true, establish their residence in any part of the kingdom; but they cannot celebrate their worship. It is plain that a religious man will forego the temporal advantages of a new home, if he is not allowed to worship God according to his conscience. In the very territory of the valleys, the Waldenses are not allowed to build churches nor to settle pastors where they judge necessary. They must first ask leave of Roman Catholic magistrates who are dependent on the clergy. And so, though the Waldenses form in this part of the kingdom a large majority of the population, they are yet placed in fact under the control of the established church! The press has been declared free, but (for there are always butts to the favours granted by the Romish church) Bibles, catechisms and prayer-books cannot be printed without the bishop's leave. It depends, then, on the will of a Romish prelate, it depends on his caprice or jealousy to prevent the Waldenses from publishing any religious books! If this is liberty, what is slavery? But further. A new law respecting the press punishes with a year's imprisonment, and a fine not exceeding $400, writers who shall violate the 164th article of the penal code, which is as follows: "Whoever, by way of public instruction, by discourses, or by means of writings or engravings, published or circulated by him, attacks, directly or indirectly, the religion of the state, by expressing principles contrary to it, shall be punished, &c. Controversy is thus absolutely forbidden to the Waldenses. Any one may attack them, but they may not answer. A book of theology, or even of history, composed in proper language, will be condemned, because it attacks indirectly the Roman Catholic church. The Waldenses are then free to express their opinions through the press, provided they do not speak of what interests them most deeply!

"If we had needed further reasons against the detestable system of state religion, we should have found them in the unworthy shackles imposed on the Waldenses of Piedmont.

"But this reminds us of other facts of the same kind, or even more odious, which are occurring at the present day. We do not speak of Spain and of Portugal, where the most brutal intolerance is inscribed on the front of their institutions. We know that the penalty of death—yes, the penalty of death, has been pronounced by Portuguese courts against persons who have committed no other crime than that of having embraced the protestant doctrine. But we speak of the new constitutions of Italy.

In Italy there is an absolute prohibition of all dissenting religions. Catholicism claims for itself alone the right to live. So in Naples. In the States of the Holy See, Catholics alone possess civil and political rights. As to the liberty of the press, all direct or indirect attacks upon the church, her ceremonies, her ministers, are punished most severely; the penalty is stronger for this sort of crime than for attacks upon person and property. In Florence, inoffensive citizens who distribute religious tracts have been arrested, threatened with imprisonment, and banished from the country. The States of Tyrol oppose the religious liberty proclaimed in Vienna, and ask that the Catholic religion may reign to the exclusion of all others in the Austrian empire.

"The conclusion from these acts, and from a multitude of other similar facts which we might quote is this: Wherever the Romish priests, and particularly the Jesuits, have the power, they trample under foot liberty of worship. And if they allow it, it is only because compelled by the force of public opinion. In these very countries they do all that is possible to hinder in practice what the laws allow in theory."

THE FREE AMERICAN PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

The Synod of this church, at its late meeting, passed resolutions expressive of their sympathy with other anti-slavery denominations, and addressed a pastoral letter to the churches under their care. We take the following extracts from these documents.

"Whereas, The Slave Power in the United States has reduced many of the churches in this country to a voluntary, yet most disgraceful vassalage—forbidding their ministry to preach the entire gospel of Jesus Christ to the people—compelling them to receive no good and regular standing as Christians, thousands of persons who live in the practice of concubinage and adultery—forbidding them to give even to their own church—diminishing the word of God, and that measure of education necessary to read its sacred pages—embarrassing all the great national institutions of benevolence with prohibitions to visit and bless the very class of our population that most need their blessing: therefore, Resolved, &c.:—

The 1st and 2d paragraphs of the first resolution express sympathy with the steps taken to consummate a union between the "Associate," the "Reformed Presbyterian" and the "Associate Reformed" churches, and the desire of the Synod that such a platform should be laid as would render it consistent for the Free Presbyterian church to unite with them. They then proceed to say:

"That among the many desirable objects to be obtained by a union of true anti-slavery Presbyterians, we would be able more successfully to resist the unholy aggressions of the Slave Power upon the purity and freedom of the church at home, and effect co-operation in the important work of sending abroad a pure and unsuspected gospel, that will secure the approbation of Heaven, and commend itself to the acceptance of the perishing brethren.

2d. Resolved, That we regard the law of God as paramount to all others, and that it is a deplorable fact that not only the State, but the greater portion of the churches, have to a considerable extent adopted human instead of divine law as the rule of conduct.

3d. Resolved, That a religion destitute of humanity, that overlooks the woes and wrongs of the oppressed, does not meet the wants of the church and of the world, and will not commend itself to the conscience of the people; and that it is the duty of the gospel minister to bear a unanimous and decided testimony against every system that debases human nature, and robs mankind of their God-given rights; whether such system be sustained by the laws of the land or not.

4th. Resolved, That while we have to mourn over the defection of some who have faltered in the present struggle between right and wrong—justice and injustice—yet we have to rejoice in the evident tokens of the progress of the cause of human liberty; and above all in the firm conviction that it is of God, and must eventually triumph."

Foreign Missions.

CHILDREN OF MISSIONARIES IN THIS COUNTRY.

There are now in this country three sons of the Rev. James Wilson, a son and daughter of the Rev. Jesse M. Jamieson, two sons of the Rev. James R. Campbell, two sons and a daughter of the Rev. John H. Morrison, two daughters of the Rev. James L. Scott, and a daughter of the Rev. John E. Freeman; besides two daughters in England of the Rev. John Newton. These children are living in different places, under the care of their personal friends, in most cases, of their parents, and all attending schools at their several places of abode.

Some persons are disposed to call in question the propriety of missionaries sending their children to a distant country. Certainly no reasons but those of the strongest nature would make any parent willing to adopt such a measure. With our missionary brethren it is a question in most cases not of expediency, but of necessity. They cannot bring them up safely in the midst of the pollutions of a heathen population, nor provide for them a suitable education under the extremely unfavourable circumstances of heathen countries; and if they could do so, it would yet, in nearly all instances, be impossible to procure for them adequate employment when they become old enough to enter on the duties of active life.

The alternative, then, before the missionary parent is, either to leave his work and return home with his children, or to consent to their leaving their father's house, and seeking a home in a distant land. To yield them up, at so tender an age, to the care of others in a distant country, is the severest trial of missionary life. Those of our readers who are parents, can, in some degree, appreciate this sacrifice.

It is a sacrifice made for Christ. He will support those of his servants who are called in his providence to make it, by his all-sufficient grace. He will also watch over their children. But it is right that the members of the churches should sympathize with those of their brethren, who, for the promotion of our common work in Christ's name, are called to meet with these trials. Is it not proper, also, that the children should have an affectionate remembrance in the prayers of Christians?

For. Miss. Chron.

DONATIONS OF CHILDREN, FROM MAY 1, 1847, TO MAY 1, 1848.

The amount of funds received from this source, as acknowledged in the Foreign Missionary of this month, is $3,748 33,—exceeding the amount received in any former year by several hundreds of dollars; and this amount has been given by a great number of donors. This advance is truly encouraging.

If we view these donations as a part of the general funds of the Board, we see their importance in the fact that they are more than equal to the outlay for the American and Siamese missions together, or for the Chippewa and Iowa missions together; in other words, the operations of the Board in giving the Gospel to the heathen must have been diminished to the extent of these missions, in a pecuniary point of view, if it had not been for the liberality of our young friends. But, however important these donations may be for the support of the missions now, we prize them chiefly as the first-fruits of a blessed harvest, which shall be gathered in the future years of the church and the world.

We dwell, however, with still greater satisfaction upon the effects of these donations on our children themselves—promoting their intelligence, self-denial, and liberality; preserving them from the spirit of worldliness and self-indulgence; and above all, leading them to Jesus, not only as the guide of their youth, and their example, but as their God and Saviour. Such we believe to be the tendency of this work of piety. If our children are encouraged to engage in it heartily and from right motives we cannot doubt but that in greater or less degree, these happy results will be effected. Nor can we doubt that the Saviour himself smiles upon the efforts of the young members of his family to bring honour to his name. We verily believe that no ordinary blessing from on high will attend these efforts. And we trust that all who are parents or teachers will continue to promote an enlightened and prayerful interest among their children in this work of the Lord.—For. Miss. Chron.

AMERICAN BOARD OF MISSIONS.—The American Board of Commissioners for foreign missions convened in Tremont Temple, Boston, Tuesday, Sept. 13th, at 4 o'clock, P. M. From the report read by the Secretary, we derive the following statistics; the Board have under their direction 24 missions, 26 stations, 152 ordained missionaries, 5 licentiates, 4 physicians not ordained, 504 female assistants, and 130 native preachers or helpers. The whole number of labourers sent from this country is 394; the whole number of native labourers connected with the mission is 163, presenting a grand total of 557. Connected with the mission are 75 churches and 25,932 communicants, of whom 1,838 have been added during the year. At the different stations are 11 printing establishments, 7 type foundries, 46,173,345 pages printed within the last year, and 635,040,844 pages printed from the beginning. In the department of education are 12 seminaries, 18 boarding schools, and 802 free schools. The pupils are distributed as follows: in the seminaries, 586; in the boarding schools, 541; in the free schools, 10,718; total, 11,845.

The whole amount received into the treasury of the board, the last year, is $254,056 46, exceeding that of the year before by $42,653 70, being an advance of more than twenty per cent. The expenditure for all purposes, during the same period, amounted to $282,330 31, being $17,546 55 more than those of the last year, and $28,278 92 more than was received into the treasury; and, of course, increasing the indebtedness of the board by that amount. The excess in the outlay was owing to some unexpected expenditures in the distant missions. The debt, which at the last annual meeting was $31,616 86, was, on the 31st of July last, $59,890 78. The general tone of the report is that of hope and courage. The board have continued, through their missionaries and assistants, to prosecute their sacred enterprise in every quarter of the globe. Among the Armenians, the Porte, mainly through the exertions of Lord Cowley, the British ambassador, has recognised the protestants as a distinct sect, with the same rights as the other acknowledged sects. The success of the Chinese missions is limited, and the labourers are few. The mission among the Jews at Constantinople is relinquished mainly to the free church of Scotland. Among the Nestorians the patriarch has come out in open hostility to the mission. His influence, however, is not great; his own brother, Isaac, left him, and removed into the diocese of our old friend, Mar Yohannan, bishop of Ooromiah. Apparently, the greatest success of the year has been among the Indians of our Western country. At the Choctaw mission, which has been established thirty years, nearly fifty are added to the churches each year, 1,400 having been added in all. Last evening religious services were held in the Tremont Temple, and a sermon was preached by Rev. Dr. Ferris, of New York.—Boston Post, Sept. 13.

MISSIONS TO CHINA.—It is only a few years since the way was opened for the Christian church to reach the upwards of 365,000,000 of inhabitants in this dark land. The very first opportunity, however, of introducing Christianity there, has been improved; and now fourteen missionary societies in America and Europe, of which two only are out of Great Britain and the United States, the Basle Evangelical Society of Switzerland, and the Rhenish Missionary Society, are engaged in the great work. The whole number of missionaries is sixty-seven, of whom forty-three are American, nineteen English, two Chinese, two German, and two Swiss. Of these, ten are from the American board, and ten from the Presbyterian board, in this country. Dr. Bridgman, of Canton, who was sent out in 1829, by the American board, is the oldest missionary in the field.

MISSIONS AMONG THE CHOCTAW INDIANS.—This tribe of Indians now numbers about 20,000 souls. With the exception of 3,000 or 4,000, they are located on about 19,500 acres of land, in the territory appointed them by the United States government, between the Red and Arkansas rivers, west of the State of Arkansas. The climate and soil are good, and their government strictly Republican, after the model of our own; and their constitution and laws are of their own enactment. They are actively engaged in agricultural and mechanical pursuits, and are noted for their morality, intelligence and skill in the mechanical arts. There are six missionary stations having charge of ten large boarding-schools (five female,) and three academies, in each of which there are from 40 to 100 young persons seeking knowledge and usefulness. Six are studying Theology. The publication of a newspaper is in contemplation. Several standard works have been published in the Choctaw language, and the entire New Testament is nearly complete. So much are the fruits of missionary labours commenced among them about thirty years since.

Notices of New Publications.

CAUSES AND CURE OF SKEPTICISM.—Presb. Board of Publication, pp. 124, 32mo.

This little volume consists of selections from a work entitled, "A Father's Reasons for Repose," supposed to have been written by Rev. T. Fry, of England, the author of the interesting account of Legh Richmond and his family, published under the title of Domestic Portraiture. It contains an examination of four different causes of religious error, and an illustration of a number of inferences, calculated to prevent misconception in regard to the subject. "A short method with the skeptic," closes the volume. The style of the author is clear, animated, and interesting. The attention is kept up, and the meaning forcibly presented, by numerous appropriate illustrations. The sentiments are correct, and evince much judicious thought. Altogether the work is one of the best which we have ever seen on the subject.

A NEW TOKEN FOR CHILDREN.—Presbyterian Board of Publication, pp. 210, 18mo.

In this work we find an interesting collection of the lives of young persons remarkable for the early development of divine grace. It is a delightful volume, and well adapted to the religious instruction of the young.

COMMUNICANT'S MANUAL.—Presbyterian Board of Publication, pp. 219, 18mo.

This volume, by the venerable Dr. Janeway, contains some most excellent meditations on the Lord's Supper, accompanied by suitable prayers. It is the best work on the subject we have ever seen, and will be found very useful, not only to young communicants, but to every one who proposes to commemorate the Saviour's dying love.

COUNTRY SCHOOL HOUSE, pp. 69, 18mo. LOVE OF DRESS, pp. 72, 18mo. RALPH MOORE, pp. 24, 12mo. SILVER DOLLAR, American S. S. Union, pp. 72, 12mo.

These are all excellent works. The first contains familiar illustrations of several passages of Scripture. The second presents in an impressive manner the evils of a love of gay apparel. The third is a narrative, showing the awful sinfulness of profane language. The last teaches how to enjoy the luxury of doing good.

VARIATIONS OF POPEY: By Rev. S. Edgar, D. D., of Ireland, with an Appendix by Rev. John N. McLeod, D. D., of New York. New York, Holman and Gray.

Dr. Edgar's work on the Variations of Popery possesses a high character, and we are glad to find a republication of it in so neat a form. The appendix by Dr. McLeod, having reference, we understand, to the state of Romanism in this country, will add much to its value. By an advertisement on the cover of this Number, our readers will see the terms of this publication, and we hope none who are able to procure it, will be without so valuable a work.

MEETING OF SYNOD.—The General Synod of the Reformed Presbyterian church, in North America, will meet in the city of New York, on the second Wednesday of October, (11th day,) 1848, at half-past 7 o'clock, P. M.

The committee appointed by last synod to reply to the protest of Rev. Wm. Wilson against the decision of synod in the case of his appeal, reported verbally, that, inasmuch as the protestor, Rev. William Wilson, had withdrawn from the communion of the Reformed Presbyterian church, and his name was stricken from the roll of her ministers, it was not necessary, in the estimation of the committee, to give any further attention to the subject. The report was, on motion, approved, and the committee discharged.

The chairman of the commission, Rev. Dr. Black, appointed by last synod to adjust the affairs of the congregation of Cincinnati, reported that the commission did not meet at the time at first appointed, and that the necessity for its meeting subsequently, was obviated by circumstances well known to synod. Report of the Committee on Subordinate Synods.

The committee to whom was referred the consideration of the resuscitation of the subordinate synods, having given to the subject that degree of attention which circumstances admitted, beg leave respectfully to

Report:

That whilst persuaded that the principle which the subject embraces is sound, they doubt as to the expediency of acting on it in the present condition of the church. Such are the views of a majority of your committee, and the minority, though differing in opinion from their brethren in this, are not disposed to give expression to that difference in a counter-report. The following resolutions are recommended, in the matter, for the adoption of synod:

Resolved, 1st, That though approving of the principle of subordinate synods, when the condition of the church will justify the adoption of the measure, yet it is believed, that at present it is inexpedient.

Resolved, 2d, That the consideration of the resuscitation of the subordinate synods be referred to the presbyteries, and that they be required to report their judgment in the matter to General Synod at its next meeting. Respectfully submitted, by order of the

COMMITTEE.

Synod then adjourned, concluding by prayer.

Same place, Oct. 16, 10 o'clock, A. M.

Synod met, and was opened by prayer. Same members present as before.

Minutes of the last meeting were read and approved.

The committee on presbyterial reports presented their report. It was, on motion, accepted and adopted. It is as follows:

Report of the Committee on Presbyterial Reports.

The committee respectfully report to synod as follows:

That the reports of the presbyteries are of a highly encouraging character. They present no complaints or appeals. They present the brethren, in the several departments of the church, as of one mind, striving together for the faith of the gospel; and show that the ordinances are duly dispensed, and, in many cases, attended with considerable success. From them, we also learn, that the number of ministers and licentiates, of organized congregations and missionary stations, has greatly increased, since the last reports to synod.

That the cry from all departments is for more labourers, and that the harvest is great, and the labourers are few. For this state of peace and prosperity in all our borders, we are called to thank God, and to take courage for the future. As the days have been, in which we have seen evil, so may they be, in which we will see good. From the reports before us, it appears, that a wide and extensive field of ministerial labour, is before the church. She should endeavour to go forth and occupy it. By doing so, we may expect to see the fulfilment of the promise, that the "Lord will comfort Zion, he will comfort all her waste places, he will make her wilderness as Eden, her desert as the garden of the Lord; joy and gladness will be found in her, thanksgiving and the voice of melody." The committee conclude with the following recommendations:

1. That suitable extracts from these reports, be published with the minutes of synod.

2. That presbyteries, in preparing their reports, do it with brevity, confining themselves to what is strictly presbyterial, with a view to their entire publication.

Signed,

COMMITTEE.

Report of the Northern Presbytery.

To the General Synod of the Reformed Presbyterian Church in North America:—

The Northern Presbytery respectfully report to General Synod as follows: Since the last meeting of the supreme judicatory, there has been a very considerable revival of the interests of religion within their geographical boundaries. It has been the good pleasure of the Divine and only Head of the church, to make large accessions to the number of their people, organized congregations and ministers, and they trust, that there has been a corresponding increase of the spirit and practice of vital godliness. Their older congregations are at peace, their numbers are augmenting, and they remain faithful to their religious obligations. Sabbath-school instruction is observed, the stated ordinances of a public character are respected, contributions to the various institutions of the church, and to the commendable benevolent operations of the day, are not forgotten, and it is hoped that some influence for God and holiness, and the salvation of men, is exerted by all the societies under their care, in their respective localities. Presbytery desire to recognise, with gratitude and joy, the Divine favours dispensed to them so liberally during the past synodical year, and to derive from them a stimulus to greater efforts, for the promotion of the Divine glory, in the salvation of the souls of men.

On the 8th of December, 1847, Mr. Robert A. Hill was licensed to preach the everlasting gospel. And on the 4th of September, 1848, he was ordained to the ministry, and installed pastor of the Reformed Presbyterian church in Ryegate, state of Vermont. And thus, in the good providence of God, this old post of the church is re-occupied, and its excellent people and their pastor, the object of their unanimous choice, have commenced together a new career of usefulness.

At our meeting, in April last, a petition signed by sixty-two individuals of the city of Brooklyn and its vicinity, asking for the organization of a congregation under the care of presbytery, was presented. The petition was granted, and the First Reformed Presbyterian church, Brooklyn, N. Y., was organized, according to the due order. A unanimous call was presented by that people to Mr. David J. Patterson, licentiate, and being accepted by him, he was ordained to the ministry and installed pastor on the 25th of April, 1848. The new congregation is in a highly promising condition. At the same meeting of presbytery, a petition was presented from Rev. Alexander Clarke and congregations, for admission to connexion with presbytery. Mr. Clarke had been for several years a missionary connected with the Reformed Synod in Ireland, before the disruption of that body, but owing to a variety of circumstances, growing out of the state of the divided church, and the peculiarities of his own position, he had not considered himself as responsible to that body, for some time past. Mr. Clarke was known to presbytery, as a man and minister of the best character and standing; as firmly attached to Reformed Presbyterian principles, and as occupying a large and most important field of missionary enterprise. Presbytery cordially received him and his people, and proceeded to take steps to send him a helper.

A coadjutor to Mr. Clarke was soon found in the person of Mr. Henry Gordon, student of theology of the third year. He offered himself to the work. The offer was accepted, and after having passed, with great acceptance, the usual trials and examinations, Mr. Gordon was ordained to the ministry, and designated a missionary to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, on the 2d of July, 1848. Mr. Gordon's outfit was furnished by the ladies of Dr. McLeod's church, New York. He has arrived at his field, and met with a most cordial welcome. For further information respecting the large field added to their former sphere of operations, presbytery would refer the synod to a document prepared by Mr. Clarke, and herewith transmitted.*

At a meeting of presbytery, held on the 29th of June, 1848, a petition was received from a number of persons in Redfield, Oswego co., N. Y., praying for an organization as a congregation. The request was granted, and a committee of presbytery appointed to carry it into effect. The congregation, composed of sixteen persons, was duly organized, on the 12th of August, 1848. Could it obtain a stated supply of ordinances, there is every prospect that it would soon become a large and flourishing church. Every where, the Northern Presbytery can assure the General Synod, opportunities of church extension are opening before them. In the Atlantic cities, the flourishing towns of New England, or the state of New York, and the British provinces in their neighbourhood, are most inviting fields of usefulness. But where are the men to occupy them? God, in his good providence, has shown to presbytery during the past year, that he is able "out of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham." We look to him for the accomplishment of his own promises, but the means must be used. We implore synod not to suffer us to be neglected in the distribution of the aid they possess.

Presbytery would respectfully recommend to General Synod, to re-publish the Testimony. It is now out of print among us, and a great call is made for it, from inquirers after the good old paths.

Presbytery have now under their care but one licentiate, Mr. D. McAleese, who has been, for some time, labouring with acceptance in our bounds. He is now destined to a region in Canada, in the immediate vicinity of the United States, as destitute as it is promising. The people there earnestly desire a supply by him for six months, and this being granted, no other aid to our vacancies can be had without the aid of Synod.

We have two students of theology, Mr. John Young, who is still prosecuting a preparatory course, and Mr. Alexander G. McCaully, who recently acceded to our communion from the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church. Both these young men will, we trust, be ere long prepared to spend some time in the theological seminary, the great importance of which, to the church, is deeply felt by presbytery.

Presbytery have now six ministers, all of whom are pastors. The apportionment for the seminary, assigned to them by synod, has been paid. A considerable increase in their disbursements for foreign missions has taken place, and they have added, by resolution, one hundred and fifty dollars, per annum, to the obligations heretofore incurred for domestic missions.

That God may continue his blessing to the whole church, represented by General Synod, is the prayer of presbytery.

All which is respectfully submitted.

DAVID J. PATTERSON, Presb. clerk.

* See Appendix, Document G.

Report of the Philadelphia Presbytery.

The Reformed Presbytery of Philadelphia respectfully presents to General Synod the following report:

The time which has passed since the last meeting of your reverend body has been within our bounds a period of more than usual activity. We have, indeed, great reason, with shame and sorrow, to lament our own personal sinfulness, but even in view of this, we are constrained to express still deeper gratitude that the LORD hath not dealt with us according to our sins, and that he has not caused the department of the church under our care to languish in consequence of our unworthiness and guilt. At no former time has our general condition been more prosperous, and never before have our prospects been more encouraging. Since the last meeting of Synod we have been three times called upon to invest candidates for the ministry with that high and holy office. Mr. J. A. Crawford having accepted the call of the united congregations of Milton, McEwensville, and Washingtonville, Penna., was ordained on the 25th of August last. Mr. W. Sterrett having accepted the call of the 2d church, Philadelphia, was ordained on the 7th of April last. Mr. John S. Woodside, by the request of the Board of Missions, in view of his departure to India, as a missionary, was ordained on the 20th of June, having been licensed on the 26th of January previous. The two former brethren still remain connected with us; the last mentioned has departed on his journey to his distant field of labour, and as it is expected he will be united with the other missionaries in the re-constitution of the Presbytery of Saharanpur, his connexion with us may be considered as terminated. We feel called upon to express to Synod the esteem and affection which our entire intercourse with him has led us to cherish towards him, and we rejoice that one in whom the church may repose so much confidence, has been found to engage in a service so responsible and arduous. While in our bounds, and during a brief visit which he made to Ireland, his native country, he laboured with great diligence and acceptability, and appeared to have effected much good. In the interesting position in which he is now to act, we trust he may prove himself worthy of his lamented predecessor, and his present honoured associates.

Since our last meeting we have been favoured with a visit from Rev. Mr. Campbell, our esteemed and beloved senior missionary. Being compelled, by the ill health of his wife, to return to this country, he took up his abode among us, and was invited to act as a member of our Presbytery while he should remain in this land. We had numerous opportunities of enjoying with him delightful, official, and private intercourse, and found our hearts refreshed by his fellowship. His labours, while with us, were abundant, and his influence appeared to be very beneficial to the cause to which he was devoted.

The congregations under our care appear to be in a flourishing condition. Since the last meeting of Synod, several of them have received large accessions of members, not only persons formerly in connexion with other churches in this, or in distant lands, but also individuals making for the first time a profession of their faith. There is reason to believe that there is increased attention to fellowship meetings, and family religion. In general there is a consistent adherence to the Christian profession, and a spirit of zeal and liberality to sustain the ordinances among ourselves, and to extend them to the destitute in our own land, and among the heathen.

A number of the members of the 2d church, Philadelphia, having an earnest desire to obtain the pastoral services of Rev. Dr. Crawford, petitioned for a new organization, which was granted, and the 4th church, Philadelphia, was constituted on the 10th of May last. Dr. Crawford having accepted the unanimous call of the congregation, was installed as their pastor on the 17th of August.—Shortly after the meeting of Synod, an application was received from a number of persons in Washingtonville, Columbia county, Penna., requesting to be organized as a congregation under our care; the petition was granted, and the new congregation united with the congregations of Milton and M'Ewensville, in a unanimous call for the ministerial services of Rev. J. A. Crawford.

By the preceding statements it will be seen that all our ministers have pastoral charges, and that we have no organized congregations remaining vacant. We have, however, within our bounds a very large and inviting field for missionary labour, and we need only proper persons to cultivate it, in order, with the divine blessing, to reap an abundant harvest. We have lately received an application for a supply of the ordinances from upwards of fifty persons residing in the district of Moyamensing, Phila., and a similar request has also been presented from more than thirty persons in Penn's Manor, Bucks county, Pa. In both these places, and in several others, we have no doubt flourishing congregations could soon be formed. Many places might be enumerated in the interior of this State, where the character of the population is such as to promise a large success. The fields are ripe unto the harvest; but the labourers—where are they? When all we need to do is to enter in and possess the land, it is indeed painful that so few can be found willing to go up to the help of the LORD, to the help of the LORD against the mighty.

Since your last meeting we have enjoyed the services of a number of licentiates, although we were disappointed in regard to those who were directed by Synod to spend the winter at the seminary, and from whom we had expected considerable assistance. Not one of these appeared in our bounds. Others, however, have been serviceable to us. Mr. J. W. Faries has, as heretofore, given such supplies as his health permitted, and circumstances required. At a meeting held on the 17th of August, 1847, Mr. David M'Alcese, who had recently arrived in this country, submitted to us very satisfactory testimonials of his standing and character as a licentiate under the care of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, and was received by us in the same capacity. After supplying for some months in the 2d and 3d churches, Philadelphia, both at that time destitute of pastoral services, he was dismissed to the Northern Presbytery. Mr. R. A. Hill, a licentiate of the Northern Presbytery, spent several months in our bounds, and was very usefully employed in preaching. Mr. Woodside also rendered seasonable and valuable services. Mr. George Lamb having completed his course in the Seminary, and delivered with approbation the usual pieces of trial, was licensed at a meeting held in July. He has been employed in supplying the pulpits of Rev. Mr. Crawford, whose feeble health led him to request a short exemption from pastoral duties, and has also preached in Moyamensing and Penn's Manor. Circumstances having prevented his going to the Western Presbytery, according to his original appointment, he is now reported to Synod as still remaining under our jurisdiction. Mr. John G. M'Vickar, having presented very excellent testimonials of his standing and character, as a student of Theology in connexion with the Eastern Reformed Presbyterian Synod of Ireland, after delivering the usual pieces of trial, was licensed on the 29th of September last, and is now referred to Synod for the control of his future movements.

We have at present, under our care, only three students of Theology in regular standing, viz., Messrs. James Pierson, John M'Millan, and W. S. Darragh. There are, however, several other young men, in various stages of preparation, who contemplate being engaged in the work of the ministry. But we still need to reiterate the call so often made for more to devote themselves to this "good work." What higher honour, what more delightful employment could parents desire for their children, could the young seek for themselves, than to be ambassadors of the MIGHTY GOD? Alas, that the church should call so often and so frequently in vain, "Whom shall we send, and who will go for us?"

The subject of domestic missions possesses a deep interest in our own minds, and the minds of the people under our care. The expectations we had entertained from the plan adopted by Synod at its last meeting, have been entirely disappointed, and we hope Synod may devise some means which may draw out, concentrate, and properly direct the energies of our church on this subject. Were this done, we have no doubt as much might be raised for domestic missions as for foreign, and even more. In view of the duty of liberality for this object, our Presbytery has resolved to endeavour to raise for it $300, during the coming year.

One of the congregations under our care being desirous to do something for the benefit of that large and neglected class to be found in all parts of our land, which the ministry cannot reach, has been sustaining a Scripture Reader, whose work it is to visit those especially who attend no church, read to them the scriptures, distribute among them Tracts and religious books, hold meetings for prayer with them and for them, and to endeavour, by all suitable means, to bring them under the influence of the church, within the sanctuary, to the fold of Christ. Mr. W. S. Darragh, who has been thus employed by the session of the 1st church, has been labouring for about a year with much assiduity and success. The manner in which this work is conducted is the same as that pursued in the case of the 1st church in New York, of which so full and interesting an account was given in the report of the Northern Presbytery to the last Synod.

The interest which is felt among us in regard to foreign missions has been increased by the visit of Mr. Campbell. The amount which was assigned for the salaries of the missionaries has been paid, and a large sum collected for the outfit of the reinforcement.

Regarding the seminary as the great source from which the church must derive a supply of intelligent and godly ministers, we feel earnestly desirous of its success. The sum which was required from our Presbytery for its support has been paid, and we have resolved to raise, during the coming year, a considerable amount additional, to be used, if not needed for other purposes, in sustaining young men in preparing for the ministry.

With the prayer that the divine blessing may rest upon your deliberations, we respectfully submit our report.

T. W. J. WYLIE, Moderator.

Report of the Presbytery of Pittsburgh.

The Pittsburgh Presbytery of the Reformed Presbyterian church, respectfully report to General Synod:

That since the last meeting of Synod, we have met three times in semi-annual sessions, and four times by adjournment. At the meeting held in Pittsburgh, June 24th, 1847, Messrs. David Heron and Alex. M. Watson, having passed the usual trials, were licensed to preach the everlasting gospel under the direction of presbytery. The former of these, Mr. David Heron, is labouring in our vacancies to the satisfaction of the people—but the latter, Mr. Watson, after preaching a few months, returned his license to presbytery, and, at his own request, his name was stricken from our roll.

At the meeting held April 5th, 1848, the melancholy tidings of the death of one of our members, Rev. Gordon T. Ewing, were announced to presbytery, and the following minute adopted on that subject:

“Whereas, a paper from Rev. Gordon T. Ewing expressing his desire, that presbytery should take his congregation under its especial care, during his absence on account of his declining health, was received; and

“Whereas, it is ascertained that on his way to N. Orleans, he departed this life, on the 21st of March, leaving his congregation vacant, his loving wife a widow, and his children bereaved; and

“Whereas, the deceased by his courtesy, his highly cultivated mind, and his devotedness to the service of God in the exercise of his ministry, rendered himself not only eminently useful in the ministry, but also endeared to the members of presbytery, therefore

“Resolved, That presbytery have, with deep feelings of sorrow, heard of the death of our beloved brother, Rev. G. T. Ewing, and that we deeply lament the loss we have sustained.

“Resolved, That we deeply sympathize with Mrs. Ewing and her children in their sore bereavement.”

At a meeting held at Austintown, Mahoning Co., Ohio, May 25, 1848, Mr. Robert M'Cracken, having previously accepted the call made on him by the Austintown congregation, was, after the usual examinations, according to the good order of the house of God, by prayer and the laying on of the hands of the presbytery, solemnly set apart to the office of the holy ministry, and installed pastor of that congregation.

Mr. William Montgomery, a licentiate from the Monongahela Presbytery, of the Associate Reformed church, was received by us, on certificate of good moral character and regular standing, and is now labouring in our vacancies. Thus, while we are called to sing of judgment in the untimely death of our lamented brother, Rev. G. T. Ewing, and to mourn the departure of Mr. Watson from the work, our hearts are gladdened by the accession of two to our number; one to take part with us in this ministry, and the other to labour as a licentiate.

We have, within our bounds, six settled congregations and ten vacancies, five of which are ripe for settlement and anxiously desirous of obtaining pastors.

We cannot meet the numerous and pressing calls for the dispensation of the word and ordinances, made upon us, and, therefore, earnestly solicit a large amount of supply from Synod. The cry for preaching, coming up from our vacancies, is distressing, and the hearts of many parents are grieved, by seeing their children growing up without the fostering care of the church.

We number now, six ministers, and have two licentiates and three students, Messrs. Samuel Heron, David Gillespie, and James Scott, under our care. Our settled congregations are generally advancing, and we are not without tokens of the Divine presence. The days of thanksgiving and fasting have been observed, and harmony in judgment, and concert in action, prevail among us.

By order of presbytery.

JOSIAH HUTCHMAN, Clerk.

Report of the Presbytery of Ohio.

We have very little of general interest to report. The section of the church which has been placed under our inspection, remains much in the same condition as when our last report was given in. Some changes, however, have taken place, which require to be noticed.

At our semi-annual meeting, in October, 1847, the Rev. William Wilson informed the presbytery, that he and his congregation had concluded to change their ecclesiastical relations, by connecting themselves with the other division of the Reformed Presbyterian church, and that their application was then before a presbytery of said body, to that effect. Whereupon the presbytery gave Mr. Wilson a certificate of character and standing. He then withdrew, and his name was stricken from the roll of presbytery. At a subsequent meeting of presbytery, a petition for supply of gospel ordinances was received from the congregation of Cincinnati. The presbytery granted the petition, and have, since that period, been giving them all the aid and encouragement in their power. Our other vacancies are pretty much as at the date of our last report.

Mr. H. M'Kelvey, licentiate, appointed by the Synod for our bounds, from October to February inclusive, prosecuted his studies during a part of the winter under the direction of presbytery, and the remainder of the time preached in our vacancies with acceptance. Mr. M'Cracken fulfilled his synodical appointment in our bounds; but Mr. Watson neither appeared nor assigned to us any reason for the failure.

A call from Garrison congregation, to the Rev. Dr. A. Heron, has been sustained and presented, which call is still under advisement.

At our semi-annual meeting, in April last, a petition from brethren in Xenia, to be organized into a separate congregation was received, and the prayer of the petition granted. Subsequently, a unanimous call on the Rev. H. M'Millan, as pastor of said congregation, has been sustained, but not accepted. Consequently, the congregation of Xenia is added to our list of vacancies.

At a meeting of presbytery, held at Massies' Creek, in June last, Rev. Dr. G. M'Master presented a certificate of good standing and dismissal from the Western Presbytery, and his name was added to the roll of this presbytery.

Mr. G. R. M'Millan, student of theology, has been spending the summer in our bounds, and attending to his studies under the inspection of presbytery. At our present meeting he has delivered a discourse before presbytery, which has been unanimously sustained as evincing diligence and improvement.

Gospel ordinances are generally attended throughout our congregations with commendable regularity, and peace and harmony generally prevail throughout our bounds. But we have cause to lament the prevalence of a spirit of deadness and formality, and to pray for "a time of refreshing from the presence of the Lord."

We cannot close our report, without expressing our fervent desire for union with our sister churches, which has been so long the subject of negotiation; and our hopes that efforts for the attainment of this great object, will yet be brought to a prosperous issue.

We trust, that our necessities will not be overlooked in the distribution of missionary labour. Owing to distance and other causes, our vacancies in Tennessee have been wholly neglected during the present year. And we see no prospect of doing any thing efficient on their behalf ourselves. We would respectfully urge the Synod to take these vacancies under their more immediate care, and make such provision for them as may be practicable. It would be cause of exceeding regret, should these congregations be suffered to wither and die, after having struggled so long and so faithfully in the cause. We would suggest also, that, if at all practicable, some pecuniary aid should be given them from the funds of Synod. It is one of the clearest dictates of Christian obligation that "the strong should assist the weak."

All which is respectfully submitted, by order of presbytery.

ANDREW HERON, Presb. clerk.

Report of Western Presbytery.

The Western Presbytery of the Reformed Presbyterian church, would respectfully report to General Synod:

That since they made out their last report, the number of their ministers has diminished by one, the Rev. Gilbert M'Master, D. D., who sought and obtained a certificate and dismissal to the Ohio Presbytery, of which, it is understood, he is now a member. We therefore report, as belonging to the presbytery, six ministers, all of whom have settled charges as pastors; and one licentiate, Mr. Hugh A. M'Kelvey, at present within our bounds and under our direction.

Whilst our ministers have diminished, we have, since our last report, organized another congregation in Rock Prairie, Wisconsin, in an exceedingly promising field of labour. We have thus, eight vacant organized congregations, some of which are ripe for settlement, both able and willing to sustain labourers of the right sort, who would be willing to enter into the harvest; whilst most of the others, with a little fostering care, would soon be in the condition also to sustain their pastors. It need scarcely be added, that with all the labour we are able to give from our own stated charges, the vacancies do not receive a tithe of the preaching which they require. Under such circumtances, they barely keep alive; whereas, they would generally, with the dispensation of ordinances and the blessings of the Spirit accompanying, grow and flourish. In the great west there is no famine of bread and of water, but, in many places, there is a famine of the word of the Lord. With respect to the persons appointed at the last meeting of synod to labour under our direction, we make the following statement:

Mr. Sterrett came into our bounds about the time fixed by synod, and laboured for some time in our vacancies, with acceptance; but circumstances having arisen which, it was thought, made it expedient for him to return into the bounds of the Philadelphia Presbytery, with the consent of the standing committee of supplies, he did return, having been with us about half the allotted time. Mr. Hugh A. McKelvey has been with us about all the time for which he was appointed; but owing to indisposition last spring, he was not able to render the full amount of service which, otherwise, he would have done. His labours have been received acceptably in the vacancies. The other person appointed to labour in our bounds, did not make his appearance.

It is hoped that the Synod, at its present meeting, will take the great extent of our territory and the needy condition of our vacancies into consideration, so as to give us our full share of such labourers as may be at their disposal.

The Rev. James R. Campbell, during the months of April and May last, visited all our settled congregations, and one or two of our vacancies. Every where he was kindly received, whilst he succeeded in exciting an interest in the cause of missions, which, it is hoped, may have some permanence. But whilst an interest is stirred up and we are doing so much, not, indeed, more than it is our duty to do, for foreign missions, ought not more to be done for extending our boundaries at home? Can it be wisdom to enlarge the superstructure without proportionably extending and strengthening the foundation? Ought not the church to do as much for enlarging her cause at home, as she is doing for the spread of the gospel abroad? Neglecting to do so, will it not be said to us by our common Lord, "These things ought ye to have done and not to leave the other undone."

Accompanying this report, is a petition from one of our vacant congregations, asking for a stated supply for six months or a year. It speaks for itself. You will give it such consideration and disposal as your wisdom will direct.

That the Head of the Church, by his quickening Spirit, may guide you in your deliberations and decisions, is our earnest prayer.

Respectfully submitted.

JOHN M. MASTER, Presb. clerk.

COMMITTEE.

The Rev. Dr. Crawford asked and received leave of absence for the remainder of the session.

Synod then adjourned, Dr. M'Leod concluding by prayer.

Same place, Oct. 17, 10 o'clock, A.M.

Synod met, and was opened by prayer. Same members present as before, with the exception of Dr. Crawford.

The minutes of the last meeting were read and approved.

Proceeded to the devotional services according to the order, as follows:

1. Rev. Dr. M'Master to preside, and commence by singing the praises of God.

2. Prayer, by Rev. Alex. Clarke.

3. Reading the scriptures, by Rev. A. W. Black.

4. Prayer, by Rev. Hugh M'Millan.

5. Singing and benediction, by Prof. T. A. Wylie.

Devotional services being ended, the Moderator resumed the chair.

On motion of Rev. Dr. M'Leod, it was

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to bring in a minute on the subject of the lamented death of Rev. Gordon T. Ewing, the moderator of last synod.

Drs. M'Leod and M'Master were appointed.

Dr. M'Leod presented a report on the Seminary. It was accepted and referred to the committee on Theological Seminary. It is as follows:

Report on Seminary.

The undersigned, one of the superintendents of the Theological Seminary respectfully reports to General Synod, that at the period prescribed in the constitution, he repaired to the city of Philadelphia, to attend the appointed meeting of the board. He regretted to find, that from a variety of adverse circumstances, none of the other members were present. No quorum attending, a formal transaction of business did not take place.

Meeting with the professors, however, the students were examined; ten public discourses were heard, and the students distributed to their appropriate classes.

During the past year, thirteen students, two of whom belonged to other denominations, were in attendance in the seminary, and they all gave evidence of talent of a high order, knowledge, and piety, most satisfactory to their instructors.

Of the students in regular connexion with the church and seminary, the following were of the first year:—W. S. Darragh, G. R. M'Millan, J. M'Millan; of the second year, James Pierson; of the third year, R. A. Hill, H. Gordon, J. S. Woodside, G. Lamb. All these students have been advanced to the next higher class, or recommended for licensure to their respective presbyteries.

The undersigned regretted to find that the small sum assigned by synod to the senior professor, as an acknowledgment for his services, had not been paid. It is earnestly recommended to synod, to enjoin on the presbyteries to send forward their quotas, and to be careful hereafter to admit no deficit in their accounts.

The undersigned most earnestly recommends to the General Synod, that they foster this school of the prophets, as one of the hopes of the church. Let it be sustained, for a blessing is in it. Respectfully submitted.

JOHN N. M'LEOD.

The committee on the signs of the times presented their report. It was accepted and adopted. It is as follows:

Report of the Committee on the Signs of the Times.

CAUSES OF FASTING.—Christians are required to be wise markers of Divine providence. Sometimes God makes the church prosperous, and turns the wilderness into a standing water, and dry ground into water springs. Again, they are diminished, and brought low through oppression, affliction, and sorrow. Whoso is wise, and will observe these things, even they shall understand the loving-kindness of the Lord. In the day of prosperity be glad, but in the day of adversity consider. According to the aspects of Divine providence, the church is bound to conduct herself, and direct her operations. In the day of mourning, it becomes her to be clothed in sackcloth, and humble herself at the footstool of the throne of God, confessing her sin with fasting, weeping, and mourning. Such, in many respects, is the day in which we live. There appears, however, to be little difference in the aspect of providence this year from the last, in relation to causes of fasting. To them therefore we refer.

CAUSES OF THANKSGIVING.

Amidst the numerous causes of mourning with which we are encompassed, we have still great ground of thankfulness. God has verified his promise unto us, "in the evening time it shall be light." "Grace hath been showed from the Lord our God to leave us a remnant to escape, and give us a nail in his holy place." We enjoy peace, and plenty, and health, in all our borders, when wars, and famine, and pestilence are desolating many other nations of the earth. We enjoy the gospel and gospel ordinances, while so many others have no vision, and are perishing in the darkness of paganism. God has greatly increased, in the past season, the number of our ministers. We are widely extended over a large portion of this great republic. There is a good report of our mission in Northern India, and a prospect of soon filling up the ranks that had been broken. The signs of the times are more favourable than formerly, in relation to the cause of freedom, and the abolition of slavery. Anti-christ, in the old world, is beginning to give signs of an approaching dissolution. The overturning proclaimed in ancient prophecy, begins to manifest itself among the nations devoted to destruction. "I will overturn, overturn, overturn it, and it shall be no more, until he come whose right it is, and I will give it him." Light is breaking forth in heathen lands. The word of God is translated into many languages, and the glad tidings of salvation are carried to many who dwell in the region and shadow of death. From the uttermost parts of the earth we have heard songs. Let us rejoice with thanksgivings.

The committee, therefore, recommend that the fourth Thursday of November next be observed as a day of thanksgiving, and the fourth Thursday of February, 1849, as a day of fasting by all under the care of this synod.

Submitted by THE COMMITTEE.

The committee on Christian union presented their report. It was accepted and adopted. It is as follows:

Conference on Union.

The committee to whom was referred the subject of "Christian Union," as recommended by the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church of 1847, and brought before us in pursuance of the action of a conference of members of several churches, held at the Mission Rooms of the Presbyterian church, in the city of New York, on the 4th and 5th of October, 1848, respectfully

Report:

That the subject of "Christian Union," dear to the heart of every friend of God and lover of Zion, is by us judged to be worthy of the most serious, deliberate, and earnest consideration. The caution, indicated in the recommendation of the General Assembly, meets our approbation. It is not a hasty and thoughtless amalgamation of distinct denominations that is proposed, but a candid inquiry, how those ecclesiastical bodies who, on the subject of doctrine, worship, principles and forms of order, occupy, in common, a very extensive ecclesiastical platform, may more nearly and efficiently concur in action for the extension and application of their common faith. Cordially approving of the proposal, your committee recommend to synod the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, 1st, That Synod approve of the action of those ministers of the Reformed Presbyterian church, who met in the conference on the 2d and 3d inst., in the city of New York, in taking a seat with the brethren of the other churches in that conference.—(See Appendix, Document H.)

Resolved, 2d, That this Synod appoint three members, two ministers and one ruling elder, to meet such delegates of other churches, as may be commissioned to assemble in New York, on the second Tuesday of April next, in pursuance of the recommendation above referred to.

Resolved, 3d, That, confiding in the intelligence and fidelity of the delegates now appointed, that no measure inconsistent with the authorized profession of this church, will, in said conference, be approved of by them, Synod deem it unnecessary to furnish them with any specific instructions, as to the matters which may come before them. All of which is respectfully submitted, by the

COMMITTEE.

Synod then proceeded to the appointment of the delegates to the conference, by vote. Rev. Dr. McLeod, Dr. Black, and Mr. Thomas Cumming, ruling elder, were chosen unanimously. Rev. A. G. Wylie to be alternate to Dr. Black.

Rev. H. McMillan offered the following resolutions, which were seconded. Proceeded to their consideration separately. The first reso-tion was adopted, and Rev. Dr. M<sup>c</sup>Master and H. M<sup>c</sup>Millan appointed the committee which it contemplates.

The second resolution was lost. They are as follows:

1. Resolved, That in accordance with the action of synod, at its last meeting in Pittsburgh, on the subject of Christian union, a committee of two be appointed to report at the next meeting of synod, "a statement of the ground on which the whole church of God, may be, and ought to be, united in one organic body."

2. Resolved, That ——— be appointed as delegates to maintain a friendly correspondence with other churches, on the subject of church union, in whatever way may be agreed upon as most advisable.

3. Resolved, That the domestic missionaries who have accounts against the treasury, present them to the board of domestic missions, to be liquidated as soon as possible.

Proceeded to the consideration of the Book of Discipline.

Articles fourth, fifth, and sixth, of section third, chapter fourth, and the whole of chapter second were adopted.

When, on motion, synod adjourned to meet in the lecture room of Prince street church, at 7 o'clock, P. M., Rev. A. W. Black concluding by prayer.

{ Lecture room, Prince st. church,
{ 7 o'clock, P. M.

Synod met, and was opened by prayer. Same members present as before.

The minutes of the last meeting were read and approved.

Proceeded to the consideration of the Book of Discipline. All the remaining chapters being read, were adopted.

It was moved and seconded that the book, as now considered and approved in detail, be adopted as a whole.

Resolved, That a member be called upon to address the throne of grace. Rev. Dr. Wylie offered prayer. The roll was called, and each member proceeded to vote, adopt or not adopt. Whereupon, the Moderator declared that the whole document was adopted by synod, as "the Book of Discipline of the Reformed Presbyterian Church in North America."

Resolved, That a fourth edition of the "Declaration and Testimony" be published, and that the "Book of Discipline" be appended to it.

Resolved, That the Stated Clerk and Treasurer of Synod be a committee to carry this resolution into effect, in such way as they may deem most expedient, and without any unnecessary delay.

Resolved, That a committee (consisting of Dr. M<sup>c</sup>Leod and Rev. A. G. Wylie) be appointed to prepare a system of rules for judicatories, and forms of order, to be reported to the next meeting of Synod.

The special committee on the preparation of a minute, respecting the death of Rev. G. T. Ewing, reported. The reported minute was adopted. It is as follows:

Death of Rev. Gordon T. Ewing.

Whereas God, in his providence, has been pleased to remove by death, the Rev. Gordon T. Ewing, late Moderator of this Synod;—and, whereas, it is becoming the members of synod to recognise the Divine hand in the dispensation, and to make the proper improvement of it to their own spiritual benefit, therefore

Resolved, That in the death of our late respected friend and brother, the church has been deprived of a faithful, diligent, and successful minister, his family of a tender husband and father, and general society of an exemplary and influential member.

Resolved, That Synod receive in humility the divine admonition which is tendered to them, in the removal of their late moderator, and that they will endeavour to draw from it a stimulus to greater effort after personal holiness, and higher exertions in the discharge of public and official duty.

Resolved, That Synod condole with the afflicted family and congregation of the deceased, and most affectionately commend them to the abiding sympathies of the great High Priest of the Christian profession.

Resolved, That the stated clerk be instructed to transmit a copy of the above resolutions to the family of the late moderator.

The committee on the theological seminary reported. Report was adopted. It is as follows:

Report of the Committee on the Theological Seminary.

The committee to whom were referred the resignations of Drs. Wylie and Crawford, as professors in the Theological Seminary, respectfully report, that they have had the same under consideration, and, considering the necessity of preserving the seminary, for the training of the young men, now looking to the office of the ministry, and considering also, that these resignations are unexpected, on the part of synod, and, consequently, that synod is not in a state of preparation to dispense with their services, would recommend to synod not to accept their resignations. To accept their resignations, under existing circumstances, would involve the present dissolution or suspension of our seminary, and would have, we apprehend, most deleterious results on the best interests of our church. Under this view of the case, we trust these venerable brethren, and especially our aged father, Dr. Wylie, will not urge their resignations for the present, but consent to give their services until synod will be in a better condition of supplying their places, than at the present time. We would further add, that, inasmuch as the services of the department in which Dr. Crawford acts, are not of the same vital nature as those of the department of Dr. Wylie, and can be dispensed with, for a term, with less injury to the students, the committee would not urge the continuance of the services of Dr. Crawford, if found by him to be incompatible with his other numerous and important duties.

In reference to the report of the Superintendent, the committee report the following resolutions:

1. That the report of Dr. McLeod (one of the Superintendents) be adopted.
2. That the presbyteries found delinquent in contributing the amount assigned them for the support of the seminary, be and they hereby are enjoined to forward forthwith the sums due to the treasurer of synod, now in advance, for the same.
3. And, whereas, it is understood that it is not always practicable for all the students of theology, especially those in the west, to attend the seminary in Philadelphia, it is the mind of Synod, that students so situated, prosecute their studies under the care of their respective presbyteries.

Resolved, That Rev. Dr. Black be requested, if possible, to spend the time of the session of the seminary, the coming season, in Philadelphia, and co-operate with the senior professor in discharging the duties of his department.

All which is respectfully submitted.

THE COMMITTEE.

Rev. Dr. Wylie was earnestly requested by synod to recall his resignation as professor of theology. He consented to do so.

The committee on domestic missions presented their report. It was accepted, and, after amendment, adopted.

(See document B in Appendix.)

The report of the Board of Foreign Missions was taken up for consideration.

(See document C in Appendix.)

In connexion with the adoption of the report of the board of foreign missions, the following resolutions were presented and adopted:

On motion of Rev. H. M'Millan, it was

Resolved, That it is the mind of this synod, that all money contributed by the members of the church, and others, for missionary purposes, be exclusively applied to the objects for which they were contributed; and further, that the strictest economy should be observed in the administration of the business of the board.

On motion of Rev. Dr. Wylie, it was further

Resolved, That this synod highly approve of the course of Rev. R. A. Hill, in not proceeding to India as a foreign missionary, but in continuing in the service of the church at home.

Resolved, That the thanks of synod be presented to the Christian brethren of this city, for their hospitalities so kindly tendered to the members during the present sessions.

Resolved, That the thanks of synod be tendered to Rev. Dr. M'Master, for his sermon preached at the opening of the present session, and that he be requested to prepare a copy of it for publication.

Resolved, That the thanks of synod be tendered to the elders and trustees of the church in Waverly Place, for the use of their house of worship, during the present session.

Proceeded to the appointment of the Board of Foreign and Domestic Missions.

Rev. Dr. M'Leod and Mr. Wm. Agnew declined serving, and were excused by synod. The members of the board are as follows:

Rev. Dr. Wylie, Dr. Black, Dr. M'Master, Dr. Crawford, Dr. Heron, Rev. H. M'Millan, Alex. Clarke, John M'Master, T. A. Wylie, R. J. Black, W. Sterrett, D. J. Patterson, J. Agnew Crawford, A. G. Wylie, A. W. Black, T. W. J. Wylie, ministers; and Thos. Cumming, James N. Gifford, Wm. Matthews, T. M'Burney, George H. Stuart, Robert Guy, Jos. Fleming, J. M'Kendrick, W. Montgomery, J. M'Coy, Daniel M'Millan, ruling elders.

Mr. G. H. Stuart was re-appointed Treasurer of Synod.

Proceeded to the appointment of the Board of Superintendents of the theological seminary: they are, Rev. Dr. Black, Dr. M'Master, Dr. M'Leod, H. M'Millan, A. G. Wylie, J. Agnew Crawford, and R. J. Black.

The minutes of the present session were read throughout, and approved.

The stated clerk was directed to publish extracts of the minutes in the Banner of the Covenant, together with as many extra copies as might be deemed expedient. Whereupon, it was

Resolved, That synod do now adjourn to meet at the time and place appointed.

Adjourned, after prayer by the moderator, singing the 133d Psalm, and receiving the apostolic benediction.

Signed, ANDREW HERON, Moderator.

JOHN NIEL M'LEOD, Stated Clerk.

APPENDIX.

(Document A.)

To the Rev. John N. McLeod, D. D., Stated Clerk of the General Synod of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, in North America.

Rev. and Dear Sir:

At a meeting this day of the committee, appointed May 28, 1847, by the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church, in the United States of America, on the subject of Christian union, it was

Resolved, That a copy of the report and resolutions of the General Assembly on Christian union, be sent to the supreme ecclesiastical courts of the bodies named therein, with a request and invitation to them to send delegates to a conference, to be held at the mission house, in the city of New York, on the first Monday of October next, for the purpose of mutual consideration of the matters indicated in the report aforesaid.

In conformity with the above resolution, I enclose herewith, a copy of the minutes adopted by the assembly on the subject aforesaid; and respectfully request, that you will lay this communication before your synod at the approaching annual meeting. Very respectfully,

W. D. SNODGRASS, Sec. Gen. Assembly's Com.

New York, February 14, 1848.

ASSEMBLY'S ACTION ON UNION.

"The committee to whom were referred the memorials of the Synods of Pittsburgh, Wheeling, and Virginia, reported as follows, namely,

"It is well known that the manifestation of unity among evangelical churches, occupies a distinguished place in the public mind at the present time. Nor can it be alleged that it does not deserve the consideration which it has received.

"The convention held last year in London, has greatly increased the attention given to the subject among protestants, and it is hoped the results of that meeting may be extensively and permanently beneficial. If real Christians, who hold fast the form of sound words, and feel the purifying and elevating power of truth, shall perceive more clearly their substantial agreement, love one another more fervently, and co-operate in the work of faith and labour of love more extensively and zealously, the advantage to the common cause of Christianity would be real and great.

"We would by no means call in question the organization or operation of that branch of the Christian alliance which has been constituted in our country, but would rather bid those brethren God speed in their legitimate efforts, and pray that the blessing of the God of peace may abide with them always. Still it may be inquired whether some plan of intercourse and combined effort may not be adopted, which may specifically include those denominations who hold the same faith, and the same ecclesiastical form of government and discipline, substantially and truly, which we hold, that may greatly contribute to more intimate and complete unity in sentiment, affection, and practice. If this can be accomplished in a considerable degree, in a way which will be safe, and will not interfere at all with denominational peculiarities and interests, it will be much gain to the cause of truth and charity. And thus not only entire apostacy from true Christianity in its various forms, but errors of dangerous tendency may be more effectually resisted, and the system of salvation by free and sovereign grace, may be more favourably exhibited before the Christian public.

"It is to be particularly observed, however, that such a plan should bear no relation whatever to the amalgamation of those denominations who may be willing to enter into such an arrangement. This must be left to each in its own ecclesiastical capacity. Only that unity which is consistent with denominational distinction, should be embraced in the plan.

"It is therefore respectfully recommended that the General Assembly offer for consideration to the supreme judicatories of those denominations in the United States, who are of the description above mentioned, the following propositions:

"1. The General Assembly of the Presbyterian church, the Synods of the Associate Reformed Presbyterian church, of the Reformed Presbyterian church, the Associate Presbyterian church, the Reformed Dutch Protestant church, and the German Reformed church, will appoint both ministerial and lay delegates in such numbers as they shall deem proper to meet in conference at such time and place as shall be hereafter designated, and consult and decide respecting a suitable plan of intercourse, as may be deemed profitable and safe.

"2. The results of this conference shall be reported to the several bodies, and shall be regarded as adopted only so far as they shall be approved by each body.

"3. This assembly will appoint a committee who shall have the charge of previous arrangements, so far as we are concerned, and shall be authorized to communicate with the bodies above named, and confer with any committee by them appointed.

"This report was unanimously adopted." Very respectfully,

WM. D. SNODGRASS,

Sec. of the Com. of the General Assembly.

Report of the Special Committee on Domestic Missions.

The committee on Domestic Missions respectfully report, that the subject which has been referred to their consideration, is one which possesses great importance, and in which our entire church appears to feel a deep interest. Impressed with the duty of sustaining domestic missionary efforts, synod has adopted several different plans, but they have not been followed with the measure of success which was desired and expected. Without entering into any examination of their defects, the committee respectfully present to synod the following suggestions, as calculated to accomplish the object in view. They recommend

1. That the direction of domestic missions be entrusted to the board of missions, already established by synod, which is hereby authorized and directed to receive such contributions as may be made for this purpose. Care being taken that the sums received for foreign and domestic missions are kept distinct, and disbursed only according to the direction of the donors.

2. That the presbyterial treasurers give to the board an account of their receipts and expenditures, for domestic missions, in order that it may be incorporated with the general report, and thus a view may be obtained of whatever is done for this object by every part of the church.

3. That domestic missionaries keep an account of any money which they may receive in acknowledgment of their public or official services, and render a statement thereof to the board, with liberty to draw for any deficit which may exist, when less than the sum allowed by synod.

4. That domestic missionaries, in addition to their reports to the presbyteries with which they may be from time to time connected, furnish regular reports to the board, from which such statements as are of general interest may be selected for publication.

5. That domestic missionaries labour, as heretofore, under the direction of the presbyteries to which they may belong, and according to the arrangements made by the committee of supplies, at each meeting of synod. Such modifications and subsequent arrangements as may be rendered necessary, being made by the board with the advice and concurrence of presbyteries.

6. That the board be directed to collect as accurate information as possible, in regard to the domestic missionary field, throughout the whole church, and lay the same before our people, with an earnest appeal to them to contribute, as God has prospered them for its benefit, and with such suggestions as experience and observation may suggest, as calculated to promote the interest of this cause.

7. That any present deficit in the sum, allowed by synod to licentiates for their services, be paid from the funds of the presbyteries where they have been labouring, as far as possible, and the remainder from the funds at the disposal of the board.

8. That the board be directed to meet at least one day before the meeting of synod, to give special attention to the business intrusted to their care, and prepare a report of their transactions.

9. That the board be directed to select St. Louis and Cincinnati, as missionary stations.

In submitting these suggestions, your committee are aware that the success of any plan, depends mainly on the judgment and energy with which it is prosecuted, and should synod adopt the arrangements herewith presented, they trust, that they may be so carried into operation, as that our whole church will cordially and zealously unite in this great work.

Report of Board of Missions to General Synod.

When our last report was presented, Mr. Campbell, our senior missionary, had left the scene of his labours in India, and, during the sessions of Synod, information was received that he had arrived in England. He remained in Great Britain and Ireland until near the end of September, being actively engaged in visiting the Reformed Presbyterian churches in both islands, and laying before them, particularly, the condition of India. He was every where received with great kindness, and we have reason to believe that much benefit has resulted from his efforts. By our brethren of the Eastern Reformed Presbyterian Synod, he was especially made welcome, as will be seen by a reference to their minutes.

Having arrived in this country on the 26th of October last, Mr. Campbell shortly after had an opportunity of meeting with the executive committee, and expressing his views and wishes. It appeared that he was earnestly desirous to return to India, and that he expected that the health of Mrs. Campbell, on account of which he had returned to the United States, would render it proper for him to do so. With his convictions of propriety and duty on this subject, the committee felt bound to acquiesce, although it had been expected, when our last report was presented, that he would probably remain in this country. It was under this impression that the Board entertained the application made by the two brethren whose offer to go to India was laid before the last Synod, although it is probable that they would not, in any case, have wished to assume the responsibility of refusing their offer. As the proposition, however, was before the church, it was considered best to make the effort to send out and sustain both of them. For this purpose Mr. Campbell was appointed to act as the agent of the board while in this country, presenting the subject to the churches as far as he could visit them, and collecting as much as they might be willing to contribute. The committee felt that they could make no engagements with the candidates themselves, nor come to any decision in regard to ultimate action until it should be ascertained whether or not the churches were able and willing to send out and sustain these brethren.

Mr. Campbell having at length returned from his tour, and made his report, it was considered that the time for a decision, whether or not it was proper to send them out, had arrived. It was thought proper first to ascertain what were the views of the brethren themselves, who as yet had received no definite answer to their application. Mr. Hill, impressed with the belief that the church would not be willing to sustain more than one additional missionary, resolved to remain at home for the present. Mr. Woodside was ready to go out immediately with Mr. Campbell. Arrangements were made with as much rapidity as possible for the embarkation of the brethren with their families. At the request of the Executive Committee, the Philadelphia Presbytery, under whose care he was at the time, ordained Mr. Woodside to the office of the ministry, and shortly after, both the missionary brethren received their instructions from the committee, and were publicly designated and commissioned to the great work of evangelizing the heathen. Their embarkation took place at Boston on the 2d of August last, in circumstances of a most impressive and affecting character. They are now, in all probability, on the great ocean, far on their journey towards their desired haven. Our prayer is, that He who ruleth in the raging of the seas, and when the winds thereof roar, stilleth them, may have them in his holy keeping, may preserve them from all danger and evil, may make them useful on their voyage, and may in due time permit them to labour long and successfully among the heathen.

It is proper for us, in this connexion, to express our high approbation of the services of our beloved missionary, Mr. Campbell. While with us he was indefatigable in his labours, and his untiring, zealous, judicious efforts produced great good not only to the holy cause to which he was devoted, but to the interests of religion in general. While in this country he travelled in the service of the board, nearly 5000 miles, preached and lectured on missions more than 70 times, and obtained subscriptions amounting to near $5000. Although his services on the foreign field were, for a time, withdrawn, we have reason to believe the result will be additional benefit, in a direct manner, to the heathen. His own increased vigour, his wife's restored health, the valuable coadjutor by whom he is accompanied, all lead us to hope that the future history of the mission will show that the temporary withdrawal of Mr. Campbell has been for great good.

In order to increase the usefulness of the mission, as much of the funds under the control of the board, as could be properly appropriated to this object, was expended in the purchase of apparatus, books, &c. In the situation where they are placed, where institutions of learning have no existence, and books are so difficult to be procured, it is very useful, if not indispensable, that they be provided with such means of information and instruction.

During Mr. Campbell's absence, Mr. Caldwell has taken charge of the station at Saharanpur, having returned to that place from Merath. We are glad to be able to state that the mission appears to be in a very prosperous condition. Mr. Caldwell labours with great assiduity and zeal, and the divine blessing appears to rest upon his efforts. Left alone, as regards the companionship of any from a Christian land, he has borne, himself, the burden and heat of the day. May the seed which he has sown or which he yet may scatter in that now barren wilderness, produce an abundant harvest, and may he himself receive at last a crown of glory from the great and exalted King of Zion. Mr. Caldwell's last annual report is here subjoined, as presenting the most satisfactory information of the present state of the mission.

With the earnest prayer that the action of Synod in regard to this important work may be directed by the great Head of the church, and may be followed by His blessing, we submit our report. By order of the Board,

T. W. J. WYLIE, Cor. Sec'y.

Eleventh Annual Report of Missionary operations at Saharanpur, for the year ending 31st Oct., 1847.

Missionaries—Rev. J. Caldwell, Mrs. Caldwell. Catechists—J. Coleman, John Gabriel, Theodore Wylie.

Since my arrival here last autumn, I have been, in some degree, diligent in endeavouring to make known the Saviour to the heathen, but now have to exclaim, to whom amongst this people, during the past year, has the arm of the Lord been revealed?

The detailed account of my labours is as follows:—

Bazar Preaching.—My bazar labours have been the same as those of last year. While I have had much less satisfaction in this department than at Merath, still something I trust has been effected. In some instances, at least, a manifest degree of attention was paid to the truths of the gospel. With my assistants in this department I have reason to be satisfied, especially with John Coleman, who, although considerably enfeebled by age, still evinces a praiseworthy zeal and earnestness in his Master's service.

Melas.—The fair at Hardwar I attended as usual, where, though the labours of the other brethren and myself consisted less in regular preaching than in former years, yet some thousands heard from our lips the glad tidings of salvation through Jesus the Saviour. The annual meeting this year will prevent my attendance at the very important fair at Ghurmookteswar, where so much may be accomplished, especially in preaching the gospel.

English and Urdu Preaching.—From the time of my return from the annual meeting in December, till the Hardwar fair, I conducted two services in Urdu each week, one on the Sabbath forenoon, and the other on Wednesday afternoon. The afternoon of each Sabbath, until the period just mentioned, was devoted to English service; and on Wednesday evenings a prayer meeting was held in English. After the Hardwar fair, the afternoon of the first Sabbath of each month, only, was occupied with English, by which arrangement I was enabled to preach three times a week in Hindustani. The English service on Sabbath was generally attended by a majority of the residents at this station, but the Wednesday evening meetings, except with regard to a few, seemed to have no attractions for them. The exercises in Urdu were attended generally by but few besides the native brethren here. At the Urdu service, on Sabbath, it has been my practice to lecture consecutively on Matthew's gospel. At the Wednesday evening service, in this language, I have, for the most part, preached on miscellaneous subjects.

Bible Class.—In addition to the other services in Urdu, I commenced, a few months ago, a Bible class in that language, which I have held once a week for the benefit of the native brethren, and which has been found, thus far, highly interesting. The plan adopted has been to take the Union Questions as a guide and translate each lesson into Urdu, as required.

Itinerations.—No other itinerating has been performed by me the last year than what was accomplished while travelling from Merath, at the time of removing from that station, going to the Ghurmookteswar fair and returning, and going to the annual meeting, and on the way back. These journeys, however, afforded abundant opportunities for proclaiming the gospel, which were in almost every instance embraced for that purpose, and thus some who had previously heard of a Saviour were once more urged to receive him, and many more heard, for the first time, the glad news of salvation.

English School.—The English school has, on the whole, been more flourishing than it seems to have been in some former years. By one year's report of this station it appears that the number of lads in attendance, besides those of the orphan school, was but nine. The past year the names on the roll have been upwards of forty, and there has been a general attendance daily, of about thirty. A large majority of the scholars, however, are but little advanced, merely commencing an English education. Indeed the exercises of the first ass are quite primary, being reading and translating English, English Grammar, and the first rules of Arithmetic. John Coleman, and three of the young men of the former orphan institution have acted as teachers, and I have, myself, generally spent some two hours, daily, in that capacity. Longer time could have been devoted daily to this duty, had the state of the school required it, and other important duties permitted.

Orphan Institution.—In April last, an opportunity was afforded for carrying to effect the resolution of the mission at its last meeting, respecting the reorganizing of the Boys' Orphan School at Saharanpur. Six orphan boys of different ages, from six to twelve years, were sent to our mission by the British Resident at Lahore. These lads are the children of camp followers that accompanied the British army in the disastrous Caubul campaign, and who perished either by the rigorous climate of Afghanistan, or by its savage inhabitants. The mission, at its last meeting, having determined to reorganize this institution on the manual labour system, no time was lost, after the arrival of the lads, in carrying out this resolution also. It was considered most advisable that the experiment should be made with the business of making household furniture. The most skilful native workman, therefore, in this line that could be found at Saharanpur, and one who has had a number of years' experience in this kind of work, was engaged to superintend their training. Four, only, of the six were large enough to be set to work. Suitable tools were provided for them, which they have already learned to use with some expertness. Some number of an excellent quality has been procured, and which will be fit for working up by the time the lads are prepared to commence making articles of furniture. The time allotted them for labour each day is about two hours in the morning, and about the same time in the evening. Their progress thus far has been quite satisfactory. In the mean time their education has by no means been neglected. They have spent about three hours, daily, under the tuition of one of the young men of the former Orphan Institution. And in this particular, too, the progress of most of them is encouraging. They are taught Urdu in the Persian character, which, although the language of their parents is almost a foreign tongue to them, they having learned Persian, only, in Afghanistan, which they still use among themselves with great fluency. Some of them are already able to read short sentences in Urdu with facility. It is quite probable that their progress in education will be but little, if in any degree impeded by their manual labour.

Inquirers.—The pundit, mentioned in my last report, came with me to Saharanpur, where he continued, as in Merath, to study the scriptures, and read to me daily for about two-thirds of the year. Some three or four months ago he took leave for a short time to visit some relations a few days' journey from Saharanpur. His stay being much longer than I expected, I had given up all hope of his returning. A few days ago, however, I received a letter from him, in which he informs me that sickness has been the cause of his detention, and that he is anxious to return, which I hope he will do. A respectable zamindar, in the neighbourhood of Saharanpur, has, for more than a year past, manifested considerable interest in the gospel. His attention was first turned to the study of Christianity by an event which he supposed was an answer to his prayers to the Christian's Lord. His prayer was to Jesus for an heir to his estate. A son was born, and was called "Isá bakhsh," the gift of Jesus; and ever since he has considered himself, in some respect, a follower of Jesus. The catechists have gone a few times to his village to make known to him the doctrines of Christianity, and have, in each instance, met with a most cordial reception, and have obtained, not only from him, but almost all his village, a favourable audience for the things which belong to their salvation. It was my intention to visit him in his village as soon as the weather would admit of my travelling, but circumstances have hitherto prevented me. I trust that immediately after my return from the annual meeting, I will be able to spend a day or two there in expounding the scripture.

Daily Employments.—Besides the labours already mentioned, I have spent a portion of each day in the study and translation of the native languages. Two of the youths of the former Orphan Institution have daily read to me, for correction, translations of short portions of M'Dowell's "Bible Class Manual." John Gabriel, one of the catechists, has occasionally read to me, for the same purpose, an essay in Urdu, on some subject in Theology. Besides our regular family worship in English, in the morning, and in Urdu, in the evening, we have daily had an exercise with the orphan boys for religious instruction. This consists in reading a portion of scripture on which they are required to answer a few simple questions, and then offering a short prayer on their behalf.

Conclusion.—In taking a retrospect of the past year, while I feel that I ought to mourn over my unfaithfulness, as usual, yet there is cause of gratitude to God that even a little has been accomplished at this station for the establishing of the Redeemer's kingdom.

(Document G.)—REV. MR. CLARKE'S REPORT.

Geographical Situation.—The district in which Mr. Clarke has been labouring is the Isthmus of Cumberland, the neck of land which unites New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and separates the Bay of Fundy from the Gulf of St. Lawrence. It is comprised in the counties of Cumberland and Westmoreland, and is about sixty or seventy miles in length, and the same in breadth.

Former Condition.—When first visited by Mr. Clarke in 1828, there was not a single family in connexion with the Reformed Presbyterian church. Baptists, Methodists, Episcopalians, masked Romanists, and a sprinkling of Universalists were found with a large number who made no pretensions to any religious creed. There were few, if any, Presbyterians, and certainly no organization. Under these circumstances the Banner of the Covenant was unfurled, and the system of gospel truth embraced by the Reformed Presbyterian Church proclaimed.

Results.—The visible fruits of twenty years' incessant and indescribably severe labour, in the face of much opposition from without and not a little trouble from within, under manifold privations, a terribly severe climate, and numerous circumstantial inconveniences, may be seen by the following account of the various stations now occupied, and their present condition.

1. Amherst.—There has been erected in this place a very commodious house of worship, and the attendance is large, regular, and respectable. At present there is but one ruling elder, Mr. Robert Cooke—Mr. J. Armitage and Mr. J. Buchanan having been removed by death. A Bible class is held by the pastor, once every week.

2. Napan.—This place is about six miles from Amherst, and, like it, an old settlement advanced in improvement and population. The attendance here is large, although the number of church members in communion with us is but few as yet. The community consist chiefly of Wesleyans, but our ministry is respectably sustained.

3. Goose River.—This is a new settlement, to which there is at present much emigration. It is twenty miles from Amherst, on the Gulf of St. Lawrence. We have here a house of worship, and a prayer-meeting, and flourishing Sabbath-school and week day school. Nearly forty families are in connexion with us at this station, where also we have an elder, Mr. A. Ferguson, a very worthy and zealous man.

4. Chimoguee, (pronounced Shim-o-gee.)—This station is on the Gulf of St. Lawrence, thirty-eight miles from Amherst. We have here a good house of worship, and three prayer-meetings. About forty-five families attend our services. We have three elders, Messrs. Peacock, Scott, and Anderson, all good men of most excellent character.

5. Sackville, and 6. Jolicure.—The former of these places is ten, and the latter, twelve miles from Amherst, and they are seven miles distant from each other. They are old and wealthy settlements. We have a church built in the latter, and in the former use a public hall. There are a few members, but no session. Preaching is maintained, in the one place in the forenoon, and in the other place in the afternoon of the same day.

7. River Hebert.—This station is eighteen miles from Amherst. It is a promising neighbourhood, and is able to build a church.

With all these stations there are connected other preaching places, where the ordinances are dispensed occasionally. Hitherto they have all been self-sustaining missions, having been kept up without cost to any society as such. Under the Divine blessing the work has been done by individual exertion.

They are now committed to the care of the General Synod of the Reformed Presbyterian church, having been received by the Northern Presbytery, to which they are nearest. With great promptness and liberality that presbytery has sent a most excellent young man, (Rev. H. Gordon,) who, it is trusted, will be adequately sustained.

Document H.—CONFERENCE OF PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES ON CHRISTIAN UNION.

MISSION ROOMS, NEW YORK, Oct. 2d, 1848, 11 o'clock, A. M.

In pursuance of the invitation of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, by their Committee, the Conference on Christian Union met at the time and place above mentioned.

On motion, Rev. Dr. Knox was called to the chair. At his request, Rev. Dr. Stark opened the meeting by prayer.

On motion, Rev. Dr. McLeod was appointed Secretary.

Dr. McLeod explained that he and the other brethren of the Reformed Presbyterian Church who were present had not appeared by virtue of any formal appointment of the Synod to which they belonged, that body having not yet met or acted upon the invitation addressed to their Stated Clerk. They were acting at the request of other brethren of their Church approving of the object of the Conference, and on their own responsibility.

It being still desired by the members present, Dr. McLeod proceeded to act as Secretary.

On ascertaining the members of Conference, there were present as follows:

Of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States—Rev. Drs. Phillips, Potts, Snodgrass, Krebs, and Mr. Oliphant.

Of the General Synod of the Reformed Protestant Dutch Church—Rev. Dr. Knox.

Of the Associate Synod of North America—Rev. Dr. Stark.

Of the General Synod of the Reformed Presbyterian Church in North America—Rev. Dr. McLeod, Rev. Alexander Clarke, Rev. D. J. Patterson.

Of the Associate Reformed Synod of New York—Rev. A. H. Wright.

Rev. Dr. Snodgrass, Secretary of the Committee of the General Assembly, stated the object of the meeting, which is to inquire "Whether some plan of intercourse and combined effort may not be adopted which may specifically include those denominations who hold the same faith and the same ecclesiastical form of government and discipline, substantially and truly, that may greatly contribute to more intimate and complete unity in sentiment, affection and practice."

After some general conversation, the Secretary was requested to notify the delegates of the Reformed Protestant Dutch Church, understood to be in the city, of the time and place of the next meeting, whereupon, on motion, the Conference adjourned, to meet to-morrow at 12 o'clock, M., in this place.

Rev. Dr. Phillips concluded by prayer.

SAME PLACE, Oct. 3d, 12 o'clock, M.

The Conference met, and, on motion of Rev. Dr. Knox, Rev. Dr. M'Jimsey was called to the chair, and opened the meeting by prayer.

The minutes of the last meeting were read and approved.

Rev. Dr. M'Jimsey, Rev. J. B. Dales and Rev. Henry Connelly, of the Associate Reformed Synod of New York, appeared, and took their seats.

Of those present yesterday, there were absent, Rev. Dr. Potts, Rev. D. J. Patterson.

Rev. Dr. Snodgrass read the proceedings of the General Assembly on the subject of union and intercourse among the Bodies invited. He also read a communication, signed "Wm. T. Findley," of a Committee of the General Associate Reformed Synod of the West. It approved of the objects of the Conference, and announced the appointment by the Synod of delegates to it.

Dr. S. read, further, a communication signed "Wm. McWhorter," Due West Corner, S. C. It referred to the same subject, and expressed the favourable feelings with which it is regarded by the Associate Reformed Synod of the South.

Dr. Snodgrass also stated, that if any bodies designed to be embraced in the invitation of the Assembly, had not as yet received an invitation, the defect might be supplied prior to the next meeting.

Rev. Mr. Dales stated that the probable reason why none of the delegates from the Associate Reformed Synod of the West were present, was their detention by the meeting of their own Synod, or the opening of the Seminary of their Church.

The following resolutions were proposed by Rev. Drs. Knox and Krebs, and after a general interchange of opinion on them, and on the whole subject, by the members, were unanimously adopted.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to make all necessary arrangements for a future meeting of the delegates appointed, or to be appointed, by the several branches of the Presbyterian Church named in the Resolutions of the General Assembly of May, 1847; and also to prepare suggestions and subjects for the consideration of such meeting, with the view of facilitating its business, and directing its deliberations to the best results.

Resolved, That the foregoing committee be directed to communicate the above resolution to the various bodies named, and also to send an invitation to such bodies as have not yet acted upon the invitation of the General Assembly, including the Associate Synod of North America, and the Synod of Reformed Presbyterians not yet invited.

Resolved, That this committee consist of the original committee of the General Assembly, together with a member for each of the bodies represented.

Proceeded to the appointment of the additional members of the committee by vote. The following were chosen:—

Of the Associate Reformed Synod of New York—Rev. Dr. M'Jimsey.

Of the General Synod of the Reformed Protestant Dutch Church—Rev. Dr. Knox.

Of the Associate Synod of North America—Rev. Dr. Stark.

Of the General Synod of the Reformed Presbyterian Church in North America—Rev. Dr. M'Leod.

Of the Synod of the German Reformed Church—Rev. Dr. Berg.

Of the Associate Reformed General Synod of the West—Rev. Dr. J. T. Pressley.

Of the Associate Reformed Synod of the South—Rev. Dr. E. Pressly.

Of the Associate Synod of North America (not yet invited)—Rev. Dr. Rodgers.

Of the Synod of Reformed Presbyterians (not yet invited)—Rev. Mr. Stevenson.

Resolved, That the Conference adjourn, to meet on the second Tuesday of April next, at 11 o'clock, A. M., in this place.

Resolved, That the Secretary be requested to publish the proceedings of this meeting in the religious papers.

Concluded with prayer by Rev. Dr. Knox.

Attest,

JOHN N. M'LEOD, Secretary.

New York, Oct. 5th, 1848.

Other religious papers of the bodies represented are requested to publish the above.

Practical Essays.

REDEEMING THE TIME.

"Do not squander time," said an eminent philosopher and statesman, "for time is the stuff life is made of." Acting on this maxim himself, he rose from an humble situation in life, to learning, wealth, and honour; and had he applied the principle to the subject of religion, he would also have gained the endless and invaluable blessings which it secures.

"Redeem the time," said the apostle Paul, under the influence of the Spirit of inspiration. Obeying himself the injunction which he delivered to others, we find him "instant in season and out of season," in the service of his Divine Master, endeavouring to be more abundant in his labours, because he had once persecuted that faith which now he preached. Under its influence we find him stamping the impress of his own mind on thousands in his own and succeeding ages, instrumentally saving many souls from death, and winning for himself a crown of unfading glory.

The proper improvement of time is a subject worthy of frequent and most serious attention. Nothing is more valuable, and yet nothing is in general less regarded; there are indeed some who sincerely and earnestly wish to improve the time, and glorify God, and do good to men while they remain on earth, who yet accomplish little, because they do not use their means aright—such need counsel. There are others who look on time as a kind of enemy, and seek to kill it, to use their own expression. Appropriate language! It is indeed murder—a species of suicide—the period will certainly come, when like England's maiden queen, they would give all that they possessed for one moment of that precious time which they have wantonly squandered. Happy will they be if, aroused to a sense of its value, while some of it yet remains, they endeavour to redeem it.

The expression which the apostle employs is peculiar and striking. He seems to speak of time as something lost, which however was so valuable that it would be proper to procure it again. Past time, it is true, never can return, but yet its experience may afford much valuable instruction, and incite us to greater diligence in the improvement of that which may yet be granted us. In this way the future may be made more useful, and we may in a certain sense recover the past.

I. Time is exceedingly valuable.

This will appear from several considerations.

1. From the opportunities which it affords. During it all our work is to be done, and our eternal happiness to be secured. "There is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave." Death puts an end to all earthly labours, and any work unfinished then, must remain so for ever. There is no intermediate state in which neglect and criminality in this world may be repaired or expiated. There is no repentance in the grave, no forgiveness in hell. No ordinances, no preaching, no praying, no praising, no Sabbaths, no sanctuaries, no friendly admonitions, no strivings of the SPIRIT; none of these can be enjoyed in the other world by those who have disregarded them in this. All such opportunities misimproved are irrevocably lost.

2. The shortness of time also proves its value. The less there may be of any good thing the more valuable is it considered. In this point of view, how much should time be prized. "What is our life? It is even a vapour that appeareth for a little time and then vanisheth away." "When a few years are come we shall go the way whence we shall not return." The average duration of human life is scarcely thirty years. From this must be deducted at least one-third as spent in sleep, eating, &c., and in most cases, something more is lost by sickness—how small is the remainder—and, therefore, how valuable.

3. Its uncertainty also renders it valuable: short as it is, we know not how short it is; we know not whether it may be a year, or a month, or a day, or an hour, which may form the whole of the future part of our lives. Suppose, to use an illustration of the celebrated essayist, John Foster, that a prisoner is supplied with water from a cistern, the amount contained in which he knows not, but he is sure he can obtain no more when it is exhausted, how careful would he be of every drop, because he knows not how much remains. So is it in human life. How many sudden deaths do we notice—how unexpectedly to ourselves as well as to others may we be called away. "At such a time as we think not, the Son of man cometh." We need to be watching, to be always ready—we may have so little time remaining that we cannot dare to squander any of it.

4. It cannot be recovered, if once lost, except in the secondary sense already mentioned. "There is hope of a tree, if it be cut down, that it will sprout again—but man dieth and wasteth away, yea, man giveth up the ghost, and where is he?" A man would not like to lose what was very valuable, even if he had the hope at some future time of recovering it—how much less should we be willing to lose that which we can never regain. It is like dropping the precious jewel into the unfathomable abysses of the ocean. If to-day is lost, to-morrow will not restore it. Our regret or repentance will not bring it back; our improvement of the future will not obliterate our loss of the past.

5. It is a thing for which we must give an account. "We must all appear at the judgment seat of CHRIST." For every moment we are accountable. How have we improved our Sabbaths, our common time, our hours of business, or of leisure? The servant who knows that his master will ask him at nightfall, how he has been employed during the day, will feel that his time is precious, and should act accordingly.

II. Much of it is lost.

All that time is lost which is spent in a sinful manner, and as God requires all our time to be devoted to himself, all of it which is not employed directly or indirectly in his service, is spent sinfully. We thus may lose our time,

1. By idleness. How many pass hours and days in listless apathy—mind and body unemployed—a dreaming existence—like the life of an infant or an idiot. Let such ask at the close of the day how they have been engaged, what they have thought or done, and there is nothing for the memory to recall; their time has been almost a blank. Certainly such persons have lost their time.

2. By dissipation much time is lost. Some relaxation is necessary both for mind and body—if the bow is always tightly strung, it will break. This will not be lost time, since it recruits our strength and prepares us to spend more advantageously what follows. But dissipation, whether physical or mental, unfits, not re-fits. How much is the body often thus impaired. Excess of eating, or drinking, or sleeping, all weaken the system, and prevent proper improvement of time. Midnight revels, gay company, not to mention indulgences, the very names of which should not be uttered, all are destructive. How much dissipation of time is caused also by the works of fiction, or even what might be called utter nonsense, with which the press is now-a-days so prolific. The theatre, the circus, and shows of various kinds, which so much fascinate the young and thoughtless, and ere they are aware, carry them away from sober thought and regular habits, plunging them in degradation and destruction. None can think time is profitably spent while thus employed. It is killed, indeed.

3. By crime. Principles of evil are deeply rooted in the human constitution, and oftentimes external objects call them out to a fearful development. How much time is worse than lost in thoughts of envy, malice, pride, covetousness, or other similar baneful affections. How much in the formation or execution of the schemes which these, if unchecked, are sure to suggest. The Psalmist tells us that “the wicked man deviseth mischief upon his bed,” and the prophet Micah denounces a wo on such characters. How much time and toil does the sinner take in his course of crime. All lost, indeed, and by the punishment which oftentimes human laws exact, and by the sure vengeance of divine retribution he is made to suffer for such conduct.

4. By worldly pursuits. It is proper for every one to have some particular employment, and to be diligent in his business. “If any man will not work, neither let him eat.” But it is not proper to let the world and its pursuits engross the whole, or even the greater part of our thoughts and labours. To be making haste to be rich, to be rising early and retiring late, and eating the bread of sorrow, in order to increase our gain, is time mis-spent. The love of the world, and the love of God are incompatible with each other, and all who are endeavouring to serve God and mammon are engaged in a vain effort, and will find at the last that they have lost their time and betrayed their hopes.

III. How may time be improved?

The consideration of its value, and the great part of it which has been lost, should cause us to give earnest heed to this point. And we mention,

1. Consecrate it all to Christ: it belongs to him of right, for he has given it to us. Thus will it be spent most pleasantly, and only thus safely and successfully. First of all, if we wish to redeem the time, we must devote it to the service of our blessed Saviour, to be spent directly or indirectly in promoting his glory. But more particularly, we should,

2. Distribute it properly. The duties of religion, public and private, personal and social, require our attention, and should have a portion of time sacredly devoted to them. The ordinary affairs of life must not be neglected; but in whatever calling a man may be, he must conscientiously give it the time which it justly demands. Benevolence, too, claims its portion of time from those who are to love their neighbour as themselves. While attending to our own souls, or our own bodies, we must not forget the souls or the bodies of others; we should set apart a portion of time to instruct the ignorant, to comfort the afflicted, to warn the thoughtless, to supply the bodily wants of the destitute. We should ascertain what each of these objects calls for from us, and arrange our time accordingly.

But in order that we may not waste our time, we should

3. Be careful of moments. Because we have but a little time, we sometimes think we need not be careful of it; but the gathered fragments make baskets full. If we take the sum of squandered moments, we will find that it will amount to hours, and days, and months, and even years. Besides, the habit of disregarding the little, will tend to make us neglect the much. In the Mint, in Philadelphia, there is a wooden grating on the floor of the room, in which gold is prepared for coinage; the design of which is to prevent any of the precious metal being lost by adhering to the feet. It has been found that the minute particles which are thus saved, amount to thousands of dollars. We must not lose one golden minute.

4. Do one thing at a time. This was the rule on which the celebrated De Wette acted, and which he assigned as the reason for his having accomplished so much. When the mind is distracted by the attempt to attend to many things at once, nothing will be done right, and all the time will most probably be lost.

5. Acquire command of your thoughts. How much time is lost by wandering thoughts, by dreamy reveries, when we wake from which, we can scarcely say we have been even conscious of existence. Newton ascribed his eminent attainments to patient thought, and every one who desires to become an instrument of good, or to spend his time profitably, must obtain a control over his thoughts:—a power to direct them to any subject he desires to confine them to, and to guide them as he pleases in its consideration. We should endeavour to make our mental powers as obedient to the will as the members of our body are.

6. Endeavour to get some good out of every object. If properly viewed, every thing will afford it. We may be compelled sometimes to attend to what may not be pleasant in itself, but it is possible to get honey even from a lion's carcass, and the more unlikely the source from which we have obtained the benefit, the more satisfaction should we feel that we have procured it.

7. Frequently review the past. This will teach us better to understand our errors, and prevent a repetition of them; it will strengthen our intellectual powers, it will lead, if rightly attended to, to more conscientious improvement of our time.

8. Fervently pray for divine direction and assistance, for it is only when God himself teaches us to number our days, that we can apply our hearts to wisdom.

These hints may serve to suggest to us the proper way of redeeming our time. No doubt the closing year has witnessed much which has been mis-spent and lost; let us endeavour that the end of the next year, if we are all spared to reach it, may show that we have been "redeeming the time."

THE OPENING OF THE PRISON.

For the following interesting tract, by the well known Mr. Hamilton, of the National Scotch church in London, we are indebted to a transatlantic friend. It will be found well worthy of perusal.—Ed.

THERE are more pleasing topics than prisons, bolts, and bars; but if it be unpleasant to hear of such things, it is worse to be the prisoner. I am going to speak of a prison-house more fearful than any tyrant ever constructed for the victims of his hate—the prison-house of sin. It is one of which we all know something, but which none know so well as they who have escaped from it. Those who are still in it little dream how thick are its walls, how watchful are its keepers, and how wretched are its inmates. The man who knows this is the man who, like Peter conducted by the angel, has been led through one ward after another, and seen the strong men armed stationed on its lofty battlements, and trembled to view its gates of ponderous brass, even as they flew open before him—these are the sights which the men sleeping in the inner dungeon have not seen, and therefore they know not the full horrors of their prison-house. We mean to speak of these things, and ask every man's attention, because we are sure that some would not be so contentedly Satan's prisoners, if they knew where they are, and for what purpose the strong one keeps them bound. And if there be those who have escaped from Satan's stronghold, it will be good for them to look back. They will join trembling with their mirth, when they think of the fearful bond of iniquity which once held them fast—when the fetters were not laid upon their limbs, but the iron entered into their soul—when Satan held them captives at his will. And yet it is good to remember the years of that cruel bondage; for, while it humbles the man, it magnifies his Mighty Deliverer. He is not ashamed to remember the excess of riot to which he ran, and his soul is humbled within him to think of the dreary years when he lived without God in the world. But while his confusion covers him, he cannot but exult in God his Saviour. Had it not been for Him, he had been Satan's prisoner to the present hour.

The natural state of every man is compared to a prison; and we mean to say something—First, About the prison. Second, About the prisoners.

First—Now, that prison in which Satan has shut up all the sons of Adam is a very doleful place. Its walls are exceedingly strong: no man was ever able to scale them. Their foundations are deeply laid: no man was ever able to undermine them. They are walls of brass, high as heaven. Their foundations are deep as hell. No man was ever able to surmount, or burst through, or creep from under the corruption of his own nature. That corruption is the prison in which Satan has shut you up. But if the prison be exceeding strong, its situation is as doleful as itself. I must tell you where it lies. I once saw a prison built upon an ocean rock. It was in the dusk of a dreary evening that I passed it; but there was light enough to discover high overhead the narrow ledges, where only the sea-bird had her home, and those walls of black basalt, on which nothing but the bitter sea-weed grew, and which started sheer upward from the deep, to such a height that the masts of a gallant ship looked little things beneath them. And on that rock stood the ruins of a famous keep, in which many a brave man had languished to his dying day, without the possibility of escape, and with none to hear his cry. Now, that rock, with its steep precipice all round, and the deep gulf weltering at its base, and the storm-cloud blackening above, is just an image of the place where, for this present life, Satan keeps his prisoners. There is a great gulf betwixt it and the land where Christ's free subjects walk at liberty—a gulf which no man can, of himself, pass over. And, like a gloomy cloud, the wrath of God lowers over it continually. Not a ray of sunshine ever looks through on that melancholy abode. Christless sinner! the Lord God never gave a complacent look at you since the hour you were born. He is angry with you every moment. And though, by some unheard-of effort, you were breaking through the prison-walls of that corruption, which now hem you in on every side, you would only be like the man who had escaped from his cell on the summit of the Bass—you are a prisoner still. Could you, by some miraculous exertion, make yourself holy, and break asunder the bond of iniquity that holds you, you would still find yourself in a deplorable case. You would only have broken out of the dungeon of sin, and would find yourself the prisoner of misery and despair. You would see the murky thunder-cloud of Divine indignation for past insults to the holy law still hovering overhead, and the vials full of the wrath of God, which your past sins had charged to the very brim, ready to burst a fiery deluge over you. And, though you might now view wistfully those ransomed ones which you saw far off, walking in the sunshine of Jehovah's love, alas for you! a great gulf yawns betwixt you and them. That gulf is the sea of wrath—it is God's displeasure, because of your past offences—a gulf which all your efforts cannot cross, and which all your good works cannot bridge over, and which all your vows and prayers cannot dry—a gulf which none but the angel of the Covenant can traverse, and the sinners transported in His arms. Such is the prison. Its walls are called Corruption, and its gates Sin, and the dismal gulf that separates between it and the land of Hope is called the Wrath of God. And, before saying another word concerning it, I would ask, Is this a prison that you can break? Are you able to knock down those adamantine walls of natural corruption that on either hand environ you? Can you make yourself holy of heart? Can you hew down that mountain-steep of actual sin—those rocky heights of depravity on which you at present stand? Can you annihilate your past sins? Above all, can you pass over that shoreless sea of wrath which is at this moment rolling its deep, dark waters on every side of you? Can you induce the Holy and Sin-hating One to look delightedly on your vileness and infirmity? Can you persuade Him to pass by, as a thing of no moment, the insults you have heaped upon His majesty, and the shocking freedoms you have taken with his law? Men are fast bound in the fetters of natural corruption and actual depravity, and are shut up under the wrath of God. This is the prison, and the keeper of that prison is Satan. When you became a debtor to God's law, you were cast into this prison till you should pay the uttermost farthing. When will that be? When mankind rebelled against God, they were handed over to the strong one armed, and he shut them up in the chains of darkness. As born into the world, the Devil is man's keeper; for, "like the Jewish children born in Babylon, the whole of our generation were captives at their birth." Satan's prison-house was our birth-place. We were born with a debt to God's law upon our heads, and we were born with rebellion against Him in our hearts; and all that we have done since then but aggravates the case, and makes our condemnation greater. Till grace sets us free, we are all Satan's bondmen.

Second—But, from this distant and outside view, let us draw a little nearer, and look not only at the prison, but at its inmates. These are not all of the same description, nor contained in one apartment, nor fettered with one chain. But, just as in the State prison of which we spoke there were various cells, from the noisome dungeon up to the spacious chambers for prisoners of exalted rank, so the Devil does not keep his captives all in the same fearful den. Some are forced down into the miry pit of divers lusts and passions, while some are locked up in the airy vaults of decency and outside morality, each in the place where he is most likely to remain peaceably, but all within the walls of brass and bars of iron. He loves to keep his goods in peace, and rather than let them go, he will move them from one cell to another, where they are more likely to remain contentedly. Thus, when a man has begun to cry out in the miry clay, he will transfer him to the pit in which is no water. When a man is begun to be weary of wallowing in disgusting vice, Satan will persuade him to try something less abominable. "If you are sick of scandalous sins, try something less revolting. If you are too wretched to remain any longer in open intemperance, or gross impurity and wantonness, be content to tell an occasional lie—be content to pilfer some little article now and then. No harm, though you should take your freedom on the Sabbath—though you should say all manner of evil of your neighbour falsely—though you should force your way forward to the Lord's Table with a token in one hand and a lie in the other." So as he gets a man to crucify the Lord of glory, Satan little cares what be the sin; and so as he keeps him in his stronghold, he little cares in what quarter he takes up his abode. Satan's great fear is lest the man should cry to the Lord out of the horrible pit or miry clay, and so be delivered out of his hands altogether. Rather than allow this, that murderer of souls will promote the sinner to the painted chamber of moral virtue, and when he has placed him in that house, so spacious and garnished, he says, "Abide here, and you will do well. Be sober, and discreet, and industrious, and there is no fear of you." And then the father of lies goes on to say—"I do not wonder that you were uneasy yonder. It was no fit place for a man to live in. You were in danger of your life in yon foul atmosphere, and I do not wonder that a man of your fine feelings was miserable among such vile companions. But here you will find things according to your taste. You have turned a new leaf—you have set up for a well living man—you pay your debts—you are kind to your neighbours—you are civil and obliging; and what more would you have? Why should you be righteous overmuch?" But if, after all, the sinner becomes uneasy, even in the whited chamber of morality, the Devil has one expedient more. "Well, if you will be gone, begone"—and he opens the door, and pretends to give the man his freedom, and lets him out into a fair garden. That garden is called "the Form of Godliness." It is taken as near as may be from the pattern of the garden of God, though all about it is counterfeit and unreal. The walls in it are copied from the "path of new obedience," with this difference, that they end in hell. There is an avenue in it called Self-righteousness, which is a very skillful copy from the "Highway of Holiness," though the noxious reptiles that crawl over it show it is not the way of gospel holiness, "for the unclean shall not pass over it."—Isaiah xxxv. 8. And this garden of formal godliness is planted over with what the Devil calls "fruits of righteousness"—trees that at a distance seem pleasant to the eye, but which are only artificial things, with painted fruit and paper leaves, and stuck in without a root—dead works, that do not grow from a root of living faith. And the garden where these dead works grow is quick set all round with a close and high fence called Hypocrisy. It is into this enclosure, called "the Form of Godliness," that Satan allows those prisoners to go at large who are not content with the liberty they had in the cell of moral virtue. And, oh! it is a dangerous thing to be allowed to wander there, for it has been noticed that fewer of the Devil's captives have been delivered from thence than even from the deep dungeon of divers lusts. Brethren, let me be plain with you. Satan's great object is to prevent men from going at once to Christ—for that moment they are lost to him. Now, there are some men wise enough to know that sobriety, and civility, and industry, and honesty, cannot save them. They still feel a want—and what should they do? Why, accept at once, and in the first place, the righteousness of Christ, and once they put on that righteousness, all other things would follow. "Oh, no," says Satan; "what right have you to that righteousness? Make out some claim to it before you assume it. Live a holy life—repent, pray, read your Bible: and then, if you be not able to dispense with Christ's righteousness altogether, you will be more likely to get it by living a religious life." "Take my righteousness," says Christ. "Use the means to get it," says Satan, thereby hinting that the good works of the sinner must be paid as a price to the Saviour. And, under one specious pretext or other, he prevails on a vast multitude to take up with the form of godliness in place of the Saviour. They go through a round of duty—they frequent ordinances—they pay an outward regard to the Sabbath—they go great lengths—the length, some of them, of maintaining family worship—the length, others, of discoursing on Divine things, and all that—not because they are made one spirit with Christ, but because they are trying to do without Him, or trying to deserve Him. Sad, sad is the case of the self-deceiver!

You have read of the dungeon into which Jeremiah was cast. It was a loathsome place. When lowered into it, he found no water in it, and he sunk down in the mire. That is the dreary dungeon into which Satan has cast many, very many, of his prisoners. They are involved in horrible iniquities. They riot in the day time. They live in excess of wine—in open profanity and ill-hidden profligacy. Were their hearts unveiled, it would be frightful to see the evil thoughts, "the murders, fornications, thefts, false witness, blasphemies," that revel there. Satan keeps them in the most noisome cell of all his dreary prison-house. The worms of corruption crawl out and in and all over their putrid souls. What a revolting spectacle they present to the God who abhors iniquity! And they are not more offensive to the eyes of His holiness than wretched in themselves. Tell me, you men who are living in any of these abominations—indulging any heart-sin—or enjoying the stolen waters of any secret life-sin—tell me if you are not wretched from time to time? You who have told a deliberate lie and stubbornly adhered to it; does conscience never check you so very hard that you would give thousands of silver that you had never told it? You who have come dishonestly or doubtfully by some of your possessions, has such a fit of remorse never shaken you, that, like Achan, when the searchers were upturning the earthen floor of his tent, you would give your house full of gold that you had never touched ill-gotten gain? You who have burst into a fit of passion, and stormed and raged till no wild beast of the forest could look more ferocious, and, perhaps, poured out blasphemies which a fiend of darkness would have hesitated to utter, did cooler moments bring no misery when you thought how you had wounded feelings which you could never heal, though the victim of your fury might try to hide the full extent of the mischief, and how you had scattered firebrands which will all be gathered again to heat the flames of Tophet for you? And you who have sat late at the wine, did the morning bring no wretchedness?—was the vexation of dearest friends, and the sensibly-lessened regard of more distant friends, no source of vexation; and did you never feel dissatisfied with yourself, and, therefore, with all around you? Every man in the gall of bitterness knows what I mean. There are intervals when he discovers a little the horrors of the miry pit—when he finds himself in a worse dungeon than that in which Jeremiah sank. He is plunged in the mire, and his own clothes abhor him. He shudders to feel the clammy reptiles of the pit sliding and crawling over him. He knows that God can have no pleasure in him, for he has no pleasure in himself. Ask liars, and swearers, and thieves, and Sabbath-breakers—ask the votaries of intemperance or impurity—if this be not true.

But, leaving the pit where these wretches wallow, let us go to a neighbouring cell. It is called the Dungeon of Despair. I quite remember the sensations of horror with which I surveyed the prison-keep from which George Wishart, and others of our Protestant fathers, were led forth to die. It was a dungeon scooped out of the living rock. Its mouth was just wide enough to admit a man; but once he was forced down into it, he found himself in a deep pit, wide enough to lie down in, but gradually closing in towards the summit. When you think that its walls were the solid rock—that it was very deep—that it gradually narrowed towards the opening at its top, and that that opening was closed over with a massy grating of iron—you can understand what a hopeless prisoner was he who languished in it, even though it had not been in Cardinal Beaton's castle, and though no guard of blood-thirsty men had watched above its entrance. The Dungeon of Despair is like to it. In this dungeon Satan often shuts great sinners, especially when it is drawing near their execution day; for it is very common for those who have lived in sin to die in despair. Satan tells them—"You have sinned past mercy. Pardon is not for the like of you. There is a peculiarity about your case, so that the great atonement can never reach it. Repentance you shall never get, though you seek it earnestly with tears." And, so saying, Satan lowers the heavy grating, and turns the massy key; and as the ponderous bolt spring-locks into its socket, the man who used to grovel in the open pit of sin, finds himself the prisoner of despair. What can he do? He cannot climb the pit, for its sides shelve inwards. He cannot force that awful lock which holds him in. No voice reaches him except the thunder of the surf which beats outside of his midnight prison, and which he sometimes half fears, half wishes, would burst in. There is none to whom he can call, for the fiends that guard him are callous to his cry. There must he wail, and pine, and look for judgment fearfully; nay—for sentence of death is passed already—must wait for fiery indignation. Ah! ye careless people that live at ease and are wanton, do you never think of the prison of despair? Many are immured in it on this side of time. They despair of God's mercy before they die, and, before they alight in the lake that burneth, they have a foretaste of hell in their desolate and despairing souls. You are not in that prison yet, but its shadow of death may engulf you this self-same night.

There is one airy apartment in Satan's prison, which is perhaps the most populous of all: I mean the Tower of Carnal Security. The prison-house of sin has many mansions. It does not all consist of dungeons. There are garnished rooms, furnished with much that is pleasant to the eye, and soft to the touch, and delicious to the taste, and melodious to the ear—and high above the rest is the capacious chamber called Carnal Security. It is the State-prison. It is reserved for the peerage and blood-royal of Satan's realm—for those who by their privileges are exalted to heaven, that they may be cast down to hell. None of the heathen are in it. They occupy a lower room. It is reserved for gospel-hearers, who are at the same time gospel-despisers. At the present day it is chiefly frequented—Satan's captives love it. Those who occupy it have great contempt for the prisoners in the miry pit, and great pity for the felons in the dungeon of despair. The windows of this upper room give such a goodly prospect, that its inmates forget that they are captives. From its battlements they can descry so much of the better land, that they can talk of it as familiarly as the men who have walked through the length and the breadth of it. They speak of reaching heaven as a matter of course, and resent nothing more than any insinuation that they have to get their liberty before they can get there. They so love the silken couches and soft carpeting with which Satan has furnished their abode—they are so pleased with its delicious odours, and lulling music, and indolent repose—that they would fain shut their eyes, and fancy that the top-story of the devil's stronghold was the state-cabin of the vessel bound for Immanuel's land.

Secondly—The opening of the prison. Some fancy that a soul's salvation is easy work—that it was no difficult task to Him who wrought out salvation for it; and it would not have been difficult to our Immanuel, had there been no bars of justice on our prison-house, and had it not been encompassed on every side by the ocean of the wrath of God. Jesus is divine, and it would have been a small thing with Him to carry by storm Beelzebub's stronghold, and shiver the sword of Apollyon, and break open all his fast places, and set all his captives free. Had our sin been our misfortune, and not our crime—like Lot, when carried captive by Chedorlaomer—had we been led captive by the Devil against our will, it would have been easy work for the Captain of the Lord's host to bring us back. But we sinned wilfully at first, and we sin wilfully still. It is not by accident, but from real wickedness of heart, that you have sinned. It is the Devil's language to speak of sin as an accident, as something that could not be helped. In the language of Satan it is said, such a man or such a woman had the misfortune to do this or that; in that of the Bible, "he had the wickedness to do it." In the Bible, I find no sin spoken of as a mishap—it is always spoken of as a misdeed. And it was because our sin was our own deed—because we wilfully contracted a debt to God, and have all our life been offering wilful insults to His majesty, that the work of man's salvation became so arduous. Before the Lord Jesus could lay His arm on the strong one that kept us, He was under a necessity of discharging all our debt, and atoning for all our guilt, and undergoing the wrath of God as we should have undergone it. Yes, blessed Jesus! this was all before thee when thou exclaimedst, "Deliver from going down to the pit: I have found a ransom." Ere ever He could make the proclamation before us, He had all this to do. On the outer door of our prison-house were not only the bolts and bars which Satan had put on, but there was the adamant lock of eternal justice also. Jehovah himself had put it on; and in the day that Adam sinned, Jehovah shut the sinner in, and Justice locked the door, and flung the key into the ocean of the wrath of God. It sunk in the mighty waters, and before Immanuel could open the brazen gates, He was seen to plunge headlong into that tide of wrath, and then, emerging from its abyss, He went right up to the gates of the Devil's stronghold; and as the wards of that inviolable lock recognised the long-lost key, the bolt of Justice flew back. That achievement cost Immanuel his life; for, in fathoming the sea of wrath, God's waves and billows rolled their surges over him, and their bitter waters came in upon His soul, and it fainted within Him. But such an achievement did He deem the recovery of these keys of justice, that He now wears them at His girdle as a trophy of that day. And the name in which He now glories is—"I am he that liveth and was dead, and behold I am alive for evermore. Amen. And have the keys of hell and of death."

The lock of everlasting justice could not be broken nor forced back; but thus, at last, being opened by Him who had the key, it was easy work for Immanuel to burst asunder Satan's bolts and bars; and having now, in virtue of purchase and of conquest, mastered the Devil's fastness, and hung out His own blood-red banner from its topmost battlements, our victorious Immanuel passes from dungeon to dungeon proclaiming liberty to its pining captives. Do you wish to go free? Then, behold, He has set before you an open door. He opened it, and none shall ever shut it. It stands open now. He does not proclaim that He will open it on some coming day; but, prisoners of hope, He proclaims that he has opened the prison already to them that are bound. But who will believe His report? Why, dear friends, you would have expected that, as soon as the great outer door of Beelzebub's castle was flung open, there would have been a rush headlong of all its inmates; that each captive, in breathless eagerness, would have hasted away from that dwelling of doomed souls. Ah, no! an occasional straggler leaves it; but its gloomy walls are still peopled with willing bondsmen, and refuse to let them go. The secret of the thing is this:—Though the bar of justice be withdrawn, and the Devil be disarmed, and the outer gate of his stronghold be thrown open, there is still more to be done; for each sinner is immured in a cell, with its own appropriate bar, and bound with his own several chain. That cell must be thrown open, and that chain must be broken, before he can go free—before he pass through the open portals of the great outer gateway, and walk abroad in the glorious liberty of the sons of God. There is more for the mighty Deliverer yet to do, and our complete Saviour does all, for of what avail is it to proclaim to fettered men that the door is open—to proclaim the opening of the prison to those who still are bound? The Lord Jesus is not content with passing along the various courts and gateways of the Devil's fortress, and proclaiming liberty; He does not merely take His station on some lofty pinnacle, and publish, in the hearing of all the inmates, "This is the Lord's acceptable year; the prison is open, and the bond may go free;" but He comes to the door of every cell where a trammelled captive lies, and at that door he knocks, and asks—"Wilt thou be made free?" Sinner, at thy door He knocks; answer, "Lord Jesus, I will," and thou art free. But when He knocks at the dungeon door, the sinner is sleeping, and will not be awakened. But should a patient Saviour still tarry and take no refusal—should He knock so loud that the dream of stupidity is disturbed—what is the first thing that the startled dreamer does? Outside he hears a voice telling him—"Thou art a doomed man"—and speaking of wrath, and broken laws, and eternal death; and, at the same time, asking—"Wilt thou admit me, and have thy freedom, or exclude me and die?" Words like these alarm him. They raise fearful images before his mind, and though Christ from without assures him that He has rent the fastenings from off his dungeon door, if he would only arise and come away, he is so terrified by those agitating words—"wrath, judgment, and eternal death"—that his first impulse is to spring forward, and, instead of opening the door to let his Deliverer in, he puts his shoulder against it to keep danger out. He fears lest one whose words are so ominous come on an evil errand. He is afraid lest what He says be true—lest the outer fastenings be forced away and the awful stranger enter. But should the Saviour graciously persevere, in order to prevail with the sinner—for in the gospel economy there is no compulsory salvation—none are dragged to heaven against their will—Christ's people are all made willing; in order to make the sinner willing to admit the Saviour, Christ will let a ray of light into his dark dungeon; and then, when the miserable slave of Satan sees where he is—when he looks to the walls of his cell, and sees them hung round with instruments of cruelty, and the enginery of death—when he looks to the floor of his dungeon, and sees the bones scattered of those whom the murderer of souls has slain before him, and sees the glaring eyes and hideous shapes of the doleful creatures that lurk and hiss in its recesses—and then, when he looks at himself, and sees how filthy are his prison-garments, so tattered, and so squalid, that the King of Holiness, the Lord of hosts, must abhor him, and sees how the bonds of guilt do gall him to the quick, and the once-loved shackles of iniquity do hold him firm and fast—then the man takes another thought. He abhors his abode, and abhors himself; and if he feared the disturber of his peace before, he now is more afraid of the wrath to come, and trembles for the wrath begun. It is then that the sinner takes other thoughts of his Deliverer, who is still standing without. "Why should I tremble to let Him in? It is death to remain. And what if He be all that he says? What if He have opened the prison doors, and do delight in giving liberty to the captives?" And, so thinking, the anxious sinner withdraws his shoulder from the door, and turns him round. A hand fairer than the sons of men is put in at the hole of the door. It drops sweet-smelling myrrh. This revives the troubled prisoner, for no enemy would do this. With a heart palpitating betwixt anxiety and hope, the door opens. All is well. It is Jesus. The chains fall from off him. A drop of the atoning blood has dissolved the adamantine fetters of guilt—the power of the Holy Ghost entering into him has burst the bonds of iniquity. His prison-garments are taken from him, and the royal robe of Christ's righteousness is put upon him, and, conducted forth from the inner prison through the outer wards, into the sunburst of a marvellous liberty, "he declares the name of the Lord in Zion, and his praise in the streets of Jerusalem."

AN ANCIENT FABLE, BY AN ESTEEMED ARCHDEACON, RECENTLY DECEASED.

"Once upon a time, in the midst of a parched and dreary land, there gushed from the top of a mountain a fine clear spring of water, which carried gladness and fertility wherever it flowed: the wilderness was converted into a garden near its banks, and verdure and cultivation were the sure companions of its progress. After some time, a similar stream began to flow from the summit of a neighbouring hill: it became the parent of many branching rivulets, which cheered the face of nature on every side, and carried happiness and abundance into the remotest lands. The good old stream was a little touched with 'jealousy;' and, conscious of the inestimable benefits which itself had conferred, expostulated with its unambitious neighbour in the following terms:—'Do you not know that you are intruding into a country which I have pre-occupied, and that you and your rivulets have a direct and baneful operation to interfere with, impede, and curtail, the inestimable benefits of grass and green fields, which I have so happily promoted?' 'Why, how can this be? Are not my streams as pure and salubrious as your own; and does not the desert smile, likewise, wherever I go?' 'Your streams do, indeed, profess to be pure, though I have something, if I choose, to say upon that point;—but I insist upon it that I am the good old stream, and that you are an interloper; and I should not err much if I called you a thief.'—'A thief! Did I ever steal any thing from you?' 'Yes, you have: it can need no proof, that, if your mouth were closed, some of the water, which now courses along your channels, would, by filtration through the mountain, be found in mine.' 'It is certainly very possible, that some fifteen or twenty drops might have reached you by this subterraneous filtration; but, see what a noble body of water I possess! And I employ the whole for the benefit of these parched and thirsty lands.' 'What business, I ask you, have you to flow at all? I existed for ages before any one thought of you: and I am by no means convinced, notwithstanding your imposing and devouring claims, that you confer any benefit whatever; your very complexion is 'offensive;' and if 'I should go still deeper, I think it would not be difficult to point out some evils and important deficiencies, and more possibilities of evil, extant in, and resulting from, and probabilities of great improvement lost and precluded by,' such a shabby current as you are. Yet, little as I admire you, I had rather that you would become a feeder to me, than move in this unauthorized manner through the world alone.' 'My good friend, it is quite impossible: some of my rivulets might possibly be turned, so as to fall into your channel; but there are copious branches, which, from the nature of the country, roll on in other directions; . . . neither, as I believe, would you be willing to receive them. While, therefore, we carry cheerfulness and delight on every side, let us be content to pursue our own channels in quietness and peace.'"—Rev. Dr. Dealtry.

LAVATER'S RESOLUTIONS.

I will never, either in the morning or evening, proceed to any business, until I have first retired, at least for a few moments, to a private place, and implored God for his assistance and blessing.

I will neither do nor undertake any thing which I would abstain from doing if Jesus Christ were standing visibly before me, nor any thing of which I think it is possible that I shall repent in the uncertain hour of my certain death.

I will, with the divine aid, accustom myself to do every thing, without exception, in the name of Jesus Christ, and as his disciple; to sigh to God continually for the Holy Ghost: and to preserve myself in a constant disposition for prayer.

Every day shall be distinguished by at least one particular wish of love.

Wherever I go, I will first pray to God that I may commit no sin there, but be the cause of some good.

I will never lie down to sleep without prayer, nor, when I am in health, sleep longer than, at most, eight hours.

I will, every evening, examine my conduct through the day by these rules, and faithfully note down in my journal how often I offend against them.

O God! thou seest what I have here written. May I be able to read these my resolutions every morning with sincerity, and every evening with joy, and the clear approbation of my conscience.

CHOLERA IN TURKEY—IMPORTANT FACTS IN ITS TREATMENT.

By the latest intelligence this plague had reached Hamburgh, on the shores of the North Sea; and it may by this time have passed, in its westerly march, into Britain.* And ere long there is reason to believe that it will cross the wider waters of the Atlantic, and pass onwards in its desolating course through this continent. The newspapers of the day contain many directions, both for its prevention and cure. A circular on the subject, by the IRISH CENTRAL BOARD OF HEALTH, which will be found in the Toronto Globe, of the 21st October, is particularly worthy of notice.

We give below a letter from one of the American Missionaries in Constantinople to the Editors of the New York Observer, which contains very valuable information respecting this scourge. Our readers, we think, will do well to preserve the letter and the circular above referred to, and act on their suggestions in the event of the cholera reaching Canada.

* This was written before the news arrived of the cholera being actually in Britain.

Of this desolating disease we may truly say, we know not whence it cometh and whither it goeth—and on this very account we may the rather see the finger of God in it.

In Habakkuk's sublime description of Jehovah's marching out of Egypt before his people, the prophet says, "Before him went the pestilence; and burning plague went forth at his feet." (We follow the rendering of the margin.) Now, may we not in these days see war, famine, and pestilence, so many messengers of vengeance, executing their commission before the Lord's coming by the all-subduing power of his Spirit to set up his kingdom in our world! Yes, heaven and earth, the sea and its fulness, the field and all that is therein, and the trees of the wood, are called on to rejoice before the Lord, for he cometh—yet it is expressly declared, "A fire goeth before him, and burneth up his enemies round about."

Constantinople, August 27, 1848.

Messrs. Editors:—The cholera is still making dreadful ravages in various parts of Turkey, as well as in some portions of Europe. Mysterious disease! that stretches its gigantic arms from the Red to the White Sea, and at the same moment of time, kills, as in a moment, its hundreds and thousands in Cairo, in Constantinople, and in Petersburg! And thus it moves onward, and onward, and onward, toward the west, awakening the most gloomy forebodings in nations and countries yet unreached, while it leaves desolation and sorrow behind! Quarantines, and milito-sanitary cordons, are instituted in vain. They have again and again been proved to be most perfectly useless in staying the march of this dreadful pestilence. No quarantines nor disinfecting agents can be of any avail, unless you can adopt means so general and powerful as to change the character of the whole atmosphere around us. There can scarcely be a doubt that the Asiatic cholera, as it is called, depends upon a specific cause, and that that cause is in the atmosphere. Recent observations seem to show that the electric or magnetic fluid has something to do with it. This is a point upon which some light may be thrown in America, should the disease invade that country, as now seems most probable; for the electric telegraphs in operation there are more numerous than in any other country in the world: and if, as has been asserted in Europe, the cholera atmosphere affects these instruments, the fact must surely be observed in America.

The cholera has now existed in the city of Constantinople for nearly one entire year; though much of the time it has been of a mild type, and limited in extent. Within the last month, however, it has shown more malignancy than at any former period, and during one week nearly all that were attacked, died. The number of deaths in the city, during that week, from cholera alone, was reported at 1,100. At the same time the disease has been raging at Broosa, Nicomedia, Adabara, Magnesia, Urntaub, Aleppo, and various other places in the interior. Trebizond was dreadfully visited a year ago, and now the disease has returned with such violence as to drive almost every body from the city that had the means of fleeing. It has just begun its ravages at Smyrna, where, it is to be feared, it will be particularly severe. As I have intimated, this scourge of the human race is moving westward. It will doubtless by and by be heard of from France and England, and then it will cross the Atlantic, as before, to perform its direful mission in America.

My principal object in introducing the subject into this letter is to communicate some facts concerning its treatment, which have been learned by experience in this part of the world, and which, though they may not be new to professional men in America, may tend to corroborate what they have already observed and heard on the subject, while those of your readers who are not versed in medical science, may have their minds quieted somewhat, in knowing that there are precautions which, under God, will in most cases secure safety, even in the midst of the greatest exposures.

The Asiatic cholera, which when fairly seated is one of the most unmanageable of all diseases,—despising all human art and skill, and mocking all the assiduities of friendship in almost all cases,—begins with a mild diarrhœa, which in that stage is most readily cured. True, where the cholera is raging we are continually hearing of persons who rise well in the morning, and are in their graves before night; and it is not to be doubted that there are some cases in which the very first attack of the disease is the collapse, from which recovery is rare. But I can say with truth, that in every instance of these sudden deaths by cholera, in which I have been able to investigate the circumstances, I have found that the individual had been labouring under diarrhœa for some days previous. Generally this is so slight as not to be noticed; it is attended with no pains, and no sickness of stomach, perhaps, and gives the person no particular inconvenience. But it is this very diarrhœa which is insidiously preparing the system for the most dreadful onset of disease. Whenever the cholera is prevailing in any place, it should be a rule in every instance, to stop even the slightest diarrhœa immediately. For this we have a remedy always at hand. Opium, in some form or other, must be used immediately, and without fear. In the form of laudanum, perhaps it may be used most conveniently. At such times it should be found in every house; and the master of the family should give the strictest injunction to every inmate of his house, to give immediate notice, if attacked with diarrhœa. In mild cases, six drops of laudanum for an adult will be sufficient to check the disease. The dose should be repeated every four hours, until the diarrhœa is stopped. This is a most important direction. In severe cases of diarrhœa a larger dose must be used, and the dose may be increased indefinitely without the least injury, so long as the effect of checking the diarrhœa is not produced. I have been called to prescribe in a great multitude of cases of cholera in this incipient stage, and I have found every one of them to yield to this medicine. The prescription is one which our good brother Doctor Smith left with his brethren in Turkey, in anticipation of the cholera, when he was returning to America; and by the blessing of God, I do believe it has saved thousands of lives. Our native brethren in Nicomedia and Broosa having been instructed on the subject by Dr. Smith, have been exceedingly useful as instruments of checking this disease in a great multitude of cases. Many even of their worst enemies among the Armenians have flocked to them for this medicine, and having proved its virtues have become their best friends.

I have used with the best effects, in many severe cases, when there was much pain, and tendency to cramps, and coldness in the extremities, a mixture of equal parts of Laudanum, Tincture of Rhubarb, and Tincture of Camphor. Of this eighteen drops may be given for an adult as a dose in mild cases, to be increased according to circumstances. Of all epidemic or contagious diseases none excites more general alarm than the malignant cholera, and yet I know of none that gives such timely premonitions of its approach, and that is so perfectly under human control, (so to speak) as this is, in this early stage.

Of course, when there is a tendency to diarrhœa in cholera times, the strictest attention should be paid to diet, and fruits and crude vegetables should be carefully avoided. Wherever the cholera prevails, it has been found that most people are easily inclined to bowel complaints, and this is an indication that the diet of people generally should be regulated accordingly. A sudden change from a generous to a low diet in such circumstances has been found quite injurious. A person who is well should continue to eat very much as he has been accustomed to, except that most people eat too much, as a general rule, and except that fruits and certain vegetables, which at other times would be harmless, under the cholera atmosphere are apt to produce diarrhœa.

I will close my communication by giving some particulars of two or three cases, from many that have come under my own observation, to illustrate what I have said above. I was awakened one night about midnight by two of my own children—one 15 and the other 13 years of age. They had both been suddenly attacked with diarrhœa and vomiting, accompanied with the severest pains, amounting almost to cramps in the stomach. The cholera was prevailing around, and, of course, I had the greatest reason for apprehension that this was a sudden attack of this disease. I administered immediately full doses of the mixture mentioned above, repeating it every two hours as long as the symptoms continued urgent. I gave also the oil of peppermint, and repeatedly applied the spirit of camphor, with friction, to the region of the stomach. The next day they were both well again, excepting of course some debility from the preceding night's attack. They had both eaten freely the day before of a dish of stringed beans, and I remarked that each upward evacuation of the stomach brought with it some of these beans, in precisely the same state in which they had been eaten twelve hours before.

A European merchant of my acquaintance, residing in Galata, arose one morning, and took a sea-bath, as he was accustomed to do. He then attended to various matters of business, which required him to walk several miles back and forth in this city. He returned to his lodgings quite ill, some time in the forenoon, and before night of the same day he was a corpse, having died of a most violent attack of cholera! This case was reported as one of death almost on the very first attack, but I ascertained, on inquiry, that this individual had been suffering with diarrhœa for eight or ten days previous!

A Protestant Armenian was very violently attacked one night with what his physician called "the most awful case of cholera he had ever witnessed." He died within twenty-four hours! The facts concerning the case, however, are these. He had had a similar attack two weeks previous, and had been cured by the blessing of God on the remedies mentioned above. The day before his second attack, while he was still weak from the first, he walked many miles and became very much fatigued, and certain circumstances had very much agitated his mind. He ate a hearty meal in the evening, partly of beans and meat, which no doubt was the immediate cause of the attack; and after the diarrhœa commenced, nothing was done to check it for several hours, and when at last a physician was called, it was too late!

Fain would I hope that our beloved country may be saved from the ravages of this scourge;—but this can hardly be expected. It will probably come, and come to many, "as a thief in the night," although the warning has been long and loud. The class of people among whom it makes its greatest desolations, are those who use habitually the intoxicating cup. I don't know that even the strictest attention to the rules I have given above will avail to save the drunkard, when he is attacked. When the seeds of this disease are cast into such a man's system, it is like striking fire into a box of tinder. The whole internal coatings of his stomach, besides other vital organs, are already diseased, and he is a subject of which the cholera will make very short work. It makes one shudder to think how many drunkards will be suddenly ushered into eternity, by this dire disease!

Many who are esteemed temperate in these habits will also fall. God designs this as his scourge upon the nations; and let it be our prayer that the nations may be led thereby to repentance. Of how many sins is our own nation guilty before God! and how little is thought of them, and felt for them, and how rarely are they confessed! Let us imitate the godly Ezra and Nehemiah in confessing, not only our own sins but the sins of our people—of our whole country, and like them, let us plead with God for his pardoning mercies and that he will avert his threatened wrath from us.

I am happy to add that in some parts of Turkey, where the gospel is preached, the visitation of the cholera has been attended with the happiest spiritual results. Some who were dead in trespasses and sins have been awakened thereby; some enemies have been made friends; and the Holy Spirit is now evidently striving with the hearts of some who have heretofore shown the most stupid unconcern in regard to the things of eternity. May such fruits abound more and more, through the working of God's mighty power.

I remain, Gentlemen, very sincerely yours,
H. G. O. DWIGHT.

A LAKE OF BLOOD.—Dr. Dick estimates the number of those who have perished directly or indirectly by war, at 14,000,000,000. Elihu Burrit, the learned Blacksmith, has taken the estimates of Dr. Dick, and estimating the average quantity of blood in a common sized person, states that the blood in the veins of those fourteen thousand millions would fill a circular lake of more than seventeen miles in circumference, and ten feet deep, in which all the navies of the world might float.

THE EFFECTS OF INFIDELITY AND CHRISTIANITY UPON NATIONS CONTRASTED.

The only instance in which the avowed rejecters of revelation have possessed the supreme power and government of a country, and have attempted to dispose of human happiness according to their own doctrines and wishes, is that of France during the greater part of the revolution, which, it is now well known, was effected by the abettors of infidelity. The great majority of the nation had become infidels. The name and profession of Christianity was renounced by the legislature. Death was declared by an act of the republican government to be an eternal sleep. Public worship was abolished. The churches were converted into "Temples of Reason," in which atheistical and licentious homilies were substituted for the proscribed service; and an absurd and ludicrous imitation of the pagan mythology was exhibited under the title of the "Religion of Reason." In the principal church of every town a tutelary goddess was installed with a ceremony equally pedantic, frivolous, and profane; and the females selected to personify this new divinity were mostly prostitutes, who received the adorations of the attendant municipal officers, and of the multitudes whom fear, or force, or motives of gain, had collected together on the occasion. Contempt for religion or decency became the test of attachment to the government; and the gross infraction of any moral or social duty was deemed a proof of civism, and a victory over prejudice. All distinctions of right and wrong were confounded. The grossest debauchery triumphed. Then proscription followed upon proscription; tragedy followed after tragedy in almost breathless succession on the theatre of France; almost the whole nation was converted into a horde of assassins. Democracy and atheism, hand in hand, desolated the country, and converted it into one vast field of rapine and of blood. The moral and social ties were unloosed, or rather, torn asunder. For a man to accuse his own father was declared to be an act of civism worthy of a true republican; and to neglect it was pronounced a crime that should be punished with death. Accordingly, women denounced their husbands, and mothers their sons, as bad citizens and traitors. While many women, not of the dregs of the common people, nor of infamous reputation, but respectable in character and appearance, seized with savage ferocity, between their teeth, the mangled limbs of their murdered countrymen. France during this period was a theatre of crime, which, after all preceding perpetrations, have excited in the mind of every spectator amazement and horror. The miseries suffered by that single nation have changed all the histories of the preceding sufferings of mankind into idle tales, and have been enhanced and multiplied without a precedent, without a number, and without a name. The kingdom appeared to be changed into one great prison, the inhabitants converted into felons, and the common doom of man commuted for the violence of the sword and bayonet, the "sucking-boat," and the guillotine. To contemplative men it seemed, for a season, as if the knell of the whole nation was tolled, and the world summoned to its execution and its funeral. Within the short time of ten years, not less than three millions of human beings are supposed to have perished in that single country by the influence of atheism. Were the world to adopt and be governed by the doctrines of revolutionary France, what crimes would not man perpetrate? What agonies would they not suffer? Yet republican France is held up in the present day as an example worthy to be followed in this country! All will allow that the experiment which France made to govern her nation by the principles of infidelity signally failed; and if we are to judge from that specimen, misery and ruin must attend it wherever it rules.

We have but few instances of Christians who carry out the principles of the gospel in ruling a kingdom. Many of those who profess to be Christian rulers are infidels in practice. Besides, Christianity, as delivered by Christ and his apostles, is scarcely adopted by any state. It is often found mixed with offices, forms, and ceremonies, to give it pomp and circumstance in the eyes of an unthinking multitude, but which have no warrant in the New Testament. Allowing for these defects, it is capable of demonstration, that pure Christianity, when incorporated with a government, sheds invaluable blessings on the community.

Let us take an instance or two. The islands of the southern sea were notorious for sanguinary wars, murders, infanticide, robbery, polygamy, ignorance, and crime. Every foul vice seemed to be nurtured and reigning there. Christianity entered those beautiful spots of our earth by means of a few devoted Christians, who left their homes to dwell among the people, and teach them the gospel of Christ. Amidst great persecution, ridicule, privations, and discouragements, they laboured for twenty years, with scarcely any perceptible effects from their instructions; but faith in Christianity as a remedy, and in Christ as their friend, sustained them. At length God appeared for their help; the king of Otaheite, followed by many of the people, embraced Christianity, and the influence spread through the community, till the whole population renounced their false, ugly, and senseless deities. Some of them they destroyed, others they enclosed in a case shaped like a coffin, with this inscription, "Dead gods," and sent the package to England, that British Christians might see the foolish gods which Tahiti formerly worshipped. Then knowledge spread—civilization progressed—commerce flourished—clothing was adopted by the natives—houses were built and factories established—murders ceased—schools arose—domestic comfort increased—God was worshipped, and Christianity triumphed! These were bloodless conquests. No tears of orphans and sighs of widows accompanied her progress: the only regrets heard were, that she had not entered before, and saved many of their children whom they had ignorantly murdered.

The testimonies to this renovation of a people are not confined to the reports of the missionaries, but come from various sources. Captain Fitzroy, of her Majesty's navy, thus speaks:—

"A few months only have elapsed since I returned to my native land, from regions which are every day becoming more and more interesting, and where the influence of Christianity is hourly, we may say, changing the very spirit of the inhabitants. In the islands of the South seas which I visited, beginning, in the first place, with the Society Islands, as lying nearer, all those who were with me were astonished, as I was, to find such orderly, civil, cheerful, and happy societies as we there found. I, for one, and many of those who were with me, had been taught to believe, that a morose, sullen, gloomy disposition had taken the place of the former amusements which there prevailed.—But I can bear the most solemn testimony that such is not the case. Never in my life have I seen a happier or more cheerful people than in the islands of Otaheite. While there, I had an opportunity of asking those who had lately visited the neighbouring islands, to many of which our countrymen have not yet penetrated, where only native missionaries have been sent, what was the state of those islands? They invariably told me, that similar results have been produced. Into almost every island of the South seas ships may now go, and their crews land, without fear of being immediately massacred by the natives. But this is invariably the case where the missionaries have succeeded in establishing themselves. Yet I am sorry to say many seamen, who have come home from those islands, have been guilty of the basest ingratitude, in depreciating the labours of those very missionaries to whom, probably, they owed their lives. Many persons have said, that the natives only conformed outwardly to the doctrines of the missionaries among them, and only because the eyes of the missionaries were upon them, but that when they were no longer under their observation they acted in a very different manner. I have been with the natives at the tops of the mountains, when no eye was upon them, except that of a stranger, whom they might never see again, and the conduct of the natives of Otaheite, was just as correct; they were as sincere in their evening and morning prayers, and the manner in which they spoke of the exertions of the missionaries among the neighbouring islands, as in the low country near the sea, where the missionaries resided."

If we turn our eyes to Africa, her degraded and oppressed sons exhibit the same results of the gospel wherever it has reached them. Mr. Campbell informs us, that some of them who inhabited a spot, called Hoote Kraal, were the most wretched beings he ever beheld: they were without clothing, except a few, who had remnants of tattered sheep-skins thrown around them: their persons were filthy in the extreme, exhibiting no symptoms of having been washed from their birth; and ignorance and misery characterized the little community. They, however, entreated him to send them a missionary, which he was enabled to do, Mr. Pacalt being at that time employed at the Cape.

By the prayers and labours of this servant of Christ, things soon began to assume a different appearance. In five years from the period of Mr. Pacalt's arrival among them, Mr. Campbell again journeyed to visit this spot. As he approached it, one and another remarked, "You will see a wonderful change for the better at Hooté Kraal;" "and so I did," observes the intrepid Christian traveller; "for there were houses built in the European style, with gardens attached to them, in which were growing peaches, apricots, and other English fruits, with various kinds of vegetables; a wall surrounded the little town several feet high; a church reared its head above the rest of the buildings, and a school was attached to it, in which native children were teaching their companions to read, after the plan of the British and Foreign school lessons; the people were decently clad; comfort and order were observed; and a people who were once little above the brutes, now exhibited intelligence, industry, benevolence, and piety." Captain Fitzroy states respecting Christian missionaries in Africa,—“If the opinions of such a man as Sir J. Herschell—living in the calmest retirement, tied to no party, unconnected with any set of men, if the opinions of a man of his ability and his character, are worth any thing, I have it in writing from him, to the effect, that the missionaries are doing the greatest good to their fellow-creatures, and deserve the full support of his Majesty's government.” And if Christianity were to ascend the throne, and rule all heathen lands, the changes would be equally obvious and beneficial.

CHRISTIAN LOVE A MISSIONARY SPIRIT.

In the beautiful description which is given, by the Apostle Paul, of Charity or Love, it is said, that "she seeketh not her own." Under the influence of this expansive and lovely principle, the true believer is led to seek the happiness of his fellow-beings, as well as his own, and to do good to all men as he has opportunity. He who has the Spirit of Christ, and imitates the example of Christ, cannot live unto himself, but feels constrained to do all in his power to promote the happiness of all mankind.

The comforts and enjoyments of the present life, however great they may be, sink into insignificance when contrasted with the retributions of eternity. Carried onward, as we all are, towards that unchanging state, no one who seriously reflects on the subject can fail to feel its great importance and awful solemnity. Knowing too, that the whole world lieth in wickedness, and that "the wrath of God is revealed against all unrighteousness of men," we cannot doubt that those who possess not the light of the gospel, as well as those who will not live according to its precepts when they enjoy it, must perish eternally. Hence the condition of the millions of our fellow-men who know not CHRIST, and obey not his gospel, must be to all rightly regulated minds, a matter of the deepest solicitude. Such it was to holy men of old, even under the comparatively obscure light of the dispensations during which they lived. Abraham, Jacob, the sweet singer of Israel, the "rapt Isaiah," all anticipated with joy the time when the Messiah's name should be made known throughout all the world, and the whole earth be full of his glory. To us, living in an era of greater light and higher privileges, it has been given to promote, and in some measure to enjoy, the blessings for which they could only pray. How much, then, should we feel our obligation to confer the knowledge of salvation upon all mankind, as far as they may be accessible to our influence.

It is a reason for great thankfulness and strong encouragement that we find cause to believe that such a spirit exists, and that in no feeble degree, in our own church. Evidence of this is afforded not only from the fact that a community so small has furnished so large a proportion of its ministers to labour personally for the salvation of the heathen, but also from the liberality with which these missionaries have been sustained. The success, too, of the exertions made since the last meeting of Synod to send out a re-enforcement to the mission, shows that the state of feeling among us is sound and correct on this subject, and that we will not only speak, but act and give. While, however, we may gratefully record this as an evidence of the divine goodness, we are far from supposing that we have as yet done all we should, because we know we have not yet done all we could. Our Saviour requires sacrifices, and how few have yet rendered more than superfluities. We must yet do far more before we can be authorized to feel that our duty is fulfilled.—Ed.

MISSIONARY ZEAL ILLUSTRATED IN THE MORAVIANS.

When the adorable Redeemer sojourned in our world in the flesh, his usual requirement to those who employed a willingness to become his disciples was, "Come and follow me." This intimated his will that they should in many cases forsake homes and kindred and employments, and that not merely to attend his instructions as he travelled from place to place, but to become preachers of the kingdom which he was setting up in the world.

'Christ makes the same demand on all to whom he is known; his language still is, "Whosoever he be of you that forsaketh not all that he hath, he cannot be my disciple." We have no doubt that the proper bearing of this requirement on many a disciple would be to impel him to give himself to the service of Christ in lands where he is yet unknown. Many have been led to consecrate themselves to that service on their conversion. Every genuine revival of religion has issued more or less immediately in producing some ministers or missionaries.

The Moravian brethren furnish abundant illustrations of this. Their own existence as a Christian community, was the result of a revival of religion among a few exiles from the persecuted churches in Bohemia. They numbered only 600 souls, when in an early period of last century, they began to send forth missionaries; and in the short space of eight or nine years, they had sent missionaries to Greenland, St. Thomas, St. Croix, Surinam, Berbice, different parts of North America, Lapland, Tartary, Guinea, the Cape of Good Hope, and Ceylon.

What great things for God would not all our churches accomplish if our office-bearers and members were animated with the same spirit! And who may not see that the millennial age would be already begun if all Protestants cherished and put forth the same zeal for the Redeemer's kingdom? We give the following particulars of the United Brethren at the present time:—

"The United Brethren, or Moravians, in Great Britain, have only about 2,000 communicants; one in every twenty-five of their active and talented members being sent out as missionaries. They have 42 missionaries in the three Danish West India Islands, having under their instruction 9,570 negroes; in Jamaica they have 35 missionaries, instructing 13,782 negroes; in Antigua, 27 missionaries, and under their care 10,022 negroes; in St. Kitts, 10 missionaries, and 2,911 negroes; in Tobago, 6 missionaries, and 1,243 negroes; among the Greenlanders, 24 missionaries, instructing 1,878 persons; in Labrador, 30 missionaries, among 1,167 Esquimaux; North America, 10 missionaries among the Delaware and Cherokee Indians; in Surinam, South America, 41 missionaries labouring among 11,442 negroes; in South Africa, 47 missionaries labouring among the Hottentots and Tambookies and Fingoes. They are about to establish missions also in the Caffre country, South Africa, among the Indians on the Mosquito shore, and to New Holland. Total number of missionaries, 722; converts, 64,560."

CHANGES IN THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.—In the year 1778 these Islands were discovered by Capt. Cook, in one of his voyages around the world, and were inhabited by a most revolting and degraded people. In 1790, Captain Metcalf touched at them with the first American vessel that had ever visited them. One of his boats was stolen by two natives, and the man that was guarding it killed. In 1809, two native youths, Hopoo and Obookiah, accompanied an American Captain to New York, and went thence to New Haven, whence they shortly afterwards were introduced to the school for heathen pupils, at Cornwall, Ct. Their history and condition interested many Christian minds, and in the year 1819, the American Board of Foreign Missions, resolved upon the Sandwich Islands as a mission station, and in October of that year, two missionaries, two school teachers, one farmer, one physician, and one printer, sailed with their wives for that field. On their arrival, they found that idolatry had been put down by national law, and the way, therefore, was opened up for the gospel effort. The opportunity was eagerly and encouragingly improved. In 1822, the first marriage was celebrated in the forms of Christianity—one of the parties being the Hopoo who had studied at Cornwall. In 1823, the first burial took place as it occurs in Christian lands—the person being a child in one of the missionary families.

In 1839, the whole Bible was printed in the Sandwich Island tongue—an alphabet having been prepared—and fifteen years and many hands been employed on the work. In 1840, a national Constitution or Bill of Rights, and a code of laws were adopted, and since that time, the governments of the United States and Great Britain, have acknowledged the independence of these islands. In 1842, a house of worship was erected at Honolulu, 144 feet by 78, with basement, gallery, steeple, and clock, at a cost of $20,000. This sum was generally raised in money or work, by the people at large. In the year 1846, there were on these islands, 21 missionary stations, 81 missionary labourers, 7 boarding-schools, with 293 scholars and upwards of 33,000 persons had been baptized and received into the communion of the church from the beginning. Of these, nearly twenty-six thousand, are in good standing at this time. Schools are almost universally established, and even singing schools and associations for improvement, are very general. Newspapers are regularly published and widely read—and every thing indicates an early, and high state of civilization. At such sights who can refrain the cry, "Behold what God hath wrought!" And who would grudge the prayer, the contributions, and the efforts by which, under God, these wonderful works have been accomplished?

MISSIONARY SPIRIT AMONG THE HEATHEN CONVERTS.—In writing from southern Africa, Rev. Mr. Grant says:—"Some of our church members who were heathen a year and a half ago, and whose income is but five shillings a month, cast into the monthly collection box, two shillings and six-pence—half their monthly income. And never have I heard prayers from clergymen or laymen which interested and delighted me more, than those of some of these heathen converts." From the Maulmain mission in India, there is an account of the formation, lately, of a missionary society in a Karen church, at Dong Yahn. The church numbers about sixty members, and nearly every member came forward voluntarily and set down a monthly subscription. Money is scarce in these benighted lands—such an act, therefore, must be expressive of their interest in this great work. O that Christians every where had a similar spirit!

CONVERSIONS TO PROTESTANTISM.—Romish journals are frequently asserting that the papacy is increasing from the ranks of the protestant faith. While, however, there is no proof of this, there is delightful evidence of a fact of very great interest to the Christian heart. It is this: many are abjuring the popish system in all its delusions, and embracing "the truth as it is in Jesus." Of the one hundred and fifty missionaries under the care of the Foreign Evangelical Society in France, one half have been Roman Catholics; and such, also, were one hundred and ten of the one hundred and twenty colporteurs who are now devotedly sowing the seed of life in that long spiritually desert soil. Within the past five years, there is good reason to believe that not less than one thousand Roman Catholics have been led to the true faith, through the labours of the American Protestant Society. Verily, God seems to be saying, "Come out of her, my people."

AMERICAN MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.

Our readers, we presume, are generally acquainted with the character of this society, which makes it one of its fundamental principles to have no connexion with slave-holders, and to give no sanction, direct or indirect, to their enormous sin. We are glad to find by the last annual report, that it is receiving a liberal support, and that its operations are becoming more widely extended. It has now missions among the heathen in Western Africa, in Jamaica, in the territory of Minnesota, in the Sandwich Islands, in Canada, and in Siam, and in addition, a number of domestic stations. The receipts for eleven months were $17,095; payments $17,263.

Ecclesiastical Intelligence.

EASTERN REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN SYNOD, IRELAND.

We received, not long since, the published minutes of the last meeting of this sister church, in whose welfare we feel so deep an interest. The noble position it has assumed, the severe trials to which it has been exposed, and the zeal and energy which it displays, all render us earnestly desirous that it may be adequately sustained. We have had intimations that a delegation from it may be expected in this country next spring, and we hope it will meet with a most cordial reception.

The following items of information are selected as the most important. The meeting was held in Belfast, convening July 18th, and terminating July 20th. The number of ministerial members is the same as at the preceding meeting, Dr. Paul having been removed by death, and Rev. Matthew Smith having been ordained and installed pastor of the congregation in Newtonards.

The Derry Presbytery presented the following report, which will give a view of the state of the church within their bounds:

The DERRY PRESBYTERY report that since last meeting of Synod they have held six regular meetings, and one pro re nata: that they have visited all the congregations under their inspection, and have much pleasure in stating to Synod that in all their congregations they have found the greatest harmony and good feeling to prevail both among the people themselves and between the people and those who are over them in the Lord. The Presbytery have recommended that in all their congregations there should be stated times appointed for the meetings of Session; that these meetings should be frequent, and that in them there should be a special prominence given to devotional exercises as tending to cherish and promote the spirit of religion in the souls of the office-bearers of the church, to obtain from a prayer-hearing God a greater revival of religion in our church, and to extend in the world the cause that is in our hands. We have also recommended to the office-bearers in our several congregations still more devoted attention to the young of the flock. There is a Sabbath school in each of our congregations, and we have been endeavouring to promote the spirit of inquiry by forming libraries for the use of the people. We believe that great good has resulted from the visit of the Rev. John Nevin, as agent for the schemes of our church. We can easily recognise the hand of God in the measures recently adopted for maintaining the administration of gospel ordinances, and preserving the organization of our congregations at a time when by lawful calamities the candlestick might have been removed out of its place. Considering the awful pressure of the times upon our congregation, we cannot but report that our people have manifested the most laudable zeal and self-denial in maintaining the schemes of the church, and we are warranted in entertaining the hope that if in the providence of God the calamities under which our country has been groaning are alleviated, the evidences of this zeal and self-denial will be still more marked and striking.

The ordinances of grace are regularly administered in all our congregations, and the days of thanksgiving and humiliation appointed by Synod have been observed. Presbytery further report that Mr. Robert Henry is still looking forward to the gospel ministry, and is prosecuting, as he has time, preparatory studies. He has accepted a tuition in a gentleman's family in England, and his engagement there will not terminate for some time.

Mr. George Stewart has attended a second session in the University of Glasgow, and has prosecuted the usual course of study with diligence and promising success. His certificates of attendance and proficiency from the Professors, under whom he has studied, are very satisfactory, and from Dr. Bates he received a most gratifying testimony both as to moral character and attention to religious duties.

The Rev. William Henry, D. D., is Moderator, and the Rev. Samuel B. Stevenson, Clerk, for the current year.

The BELFAST PRESBYTERY report that Mr. Matthew Smyth having been under their care as a Theological Student, and having given satisfactory proofs of his proficiency in the various branches of education usually required by this Synod, was licensed to preach the everlasting gospel on the 19th of August, 1847; and received appointments as a licentiate. At a meeting of Presbytery, November 23d, a memorial was presented to the court from Newtonards congregation, requesting that they might enjoy the services of Mr. Smyth for four Sabbaths in succession, and also that they might obtain a visit of an ordained minister to examine their fitness for having a call moderated. The prayer of memorialists was granted by Presbytery; and Dr. Alexander was appointed to visit the congregation; the Presbytery met on the 21st of December, and found the report from that congregation very favourable, they have cleared off their debt, and engage to pay into the SUSTENTATION FUND £50 per annum. They have also provided a dwelling-house for the Minister, and four acres of town parks, both being at a very moderate rent. Dr. Paul was then appointed to visit that congregation and to preach there on the 1st Sabbath of January, 1848, and on the Monday following to moderate a call and report progress to the Presbytery, which was appointed to meet in Belfast on Tuesday, the day immediately succeeding the moderation. This appointment was fulfilled by Dr. Paul, and it was the last ministerial service that he performed. He was affected with paralysis on the evening of Wednesday, the 5th of January, and died on the morning of the 16th of March. It is with feelings of deep sorrow that we record the removal by death of the Rev. Dr. Paul, whose services as a co-presbyter were highly appreciated by us. The amiableness of his disposition, the sincerity of his friendship, his judicious counsels, and his consistent, fearless, and zealous advocacy of truth, endeared him to our affections and rendered him an eminently useful member of our Presbytery.

By his death, his brethren in the ministry, his congregation, and the church, have sustained an irreparable loss. In the domestic circle the excellence of his character was strikingly displayed, and with his bereaved family we sincerely sympathize. He is gone; his labours are ended: but his praise is in the churches. While we would desire to bow submissively to the will of the church's Lord in the bereavement which we have experienced, we would feel it to be matter of gratitude that the life of this distinguished servant of the Redeemer was prolonged to a good old age for extensive usefulness in the defence and advocacy of truth, and especially of the great cause of civil and religious liberty. And we record with unmingled satisfaction, the well attested peacefulness and holy triumph of the closing scene of his life. On his death-bed, he instructed, encouraged, and comforted the Christian friends who visited him; while the graces of patience, faith, brotherly-love, and hope of the glory of God shone forth in his whole deportment. This faithful servant of Christ is dead, but the church's exalted Head lives, and with Him is the residue of the Spirit. May we be enabled to attend to His admonition, "Be ye also ready."

Presbytery may here state that the now vacant congregation of Loughmorne recently made application requesting that steps would be taken with a view to the moderation of a call among them. This application was made so lately that Presbytery have not taken any action relative to it, but they intend to make arrangements for that purpose without delay.

The Presbytery having found that the call from Newtonards congregation was unanimous for Mr. Smyth, and that the proceedings at the moderation were agreeable to Presbyterial order, set apart Mr. Smyth to the office of the ministry and pastoral charge of that congregation on the 28th of March. The Ministers officiating on the occasion, were Rev. Jacob Alexander, Drs. Houston and Alexander, and Rev. J. Nevin.

The Lord's supper has been dispensed at least once in each of our congregations, and in some of them twice. The days of thanksgiving and fasting appointed by Synod, have been observed.

Having more vacancies than licentiates, we sometimes had difficulty in distributing the supplies; but we endeavoured to give each a fair share of what we had. Mr. Close has laboured in Liverpool during the greater part of the time since last meeting of Synod. After his return to Ireland, Mr. Marcus was sent out to occupy the same field. The labours of both the young gentlemen have been very acceptable to the people there. It seems as if the Lord is about to send a time of reviving to the remnant in that place, and to water from heaven the seed sown that had previously few symptoms of growth. The labourers are still too few, and the church still needs to "pray the Lord of the harvest to send forth labourers into the harvest."

It is with regret that we record the removal from the country by emigration, of Mr. John G. M'Vicker. The extent of his learning, the amiableness of his disposition, and the uprightness and piety of his character render him a treasure to what part soever of the church with which he is connected he may attach himself. But let us not suppose that the church's Head is unable to furnish instruments for his work. We may yet thank God and take courage. We recommend to Synod for general examination, Mr. Hugh Austin,—a young man who has finished a course of classical and collegiate education; and whose talents, acquirements, and assiduity in study give ground to hope that he may be a useful labourer in the vineyard of the Lord.

There are other young men in connexion with our church, prosecuting the usual course of study for the ministry. Some of them have made great proficiency in learning. Others of them possess talents, which if cultivated in an humble and prayerful manner, may turn to good account; but some of these have their time so occupied with attention to schools and other avocations, that they have not yet brought the powers of their minds fully to the great work of preparing for the ministry. But we hope that at least some of these will yet become burning and shining lights in the church of the living God.

Dr. Houston is Moderator, and Dr. Alexander, Clerk, of Presbytery.

ORDINATION OF MR. D. M'ALEESE.

The Northern Presbytery of the Reformed Presbyterian church ordained to the ministry, Mr. David M. M' Aleese, and designated him a missionary to Canada, on the 22d October, 1848. The Rev. Dr. M'Leod presided, proposed the questions and offered the ordaining prayer—sermon by the Rev. Alexander Clarke, of Amherst, Nova Scotia, from Isaiah vi. 8; "Here am I, send me"—charge by Rev. D. J. Patterson, of Brooklyn—concluding prayer by Rev. J. Agnew Crawford, of Milton, Pa.; benediction by Rev. R. A. Hill, of Ryegate, Vt.

All the exercises were of the most solemn and impressive character, and were listened to, by a very crowded house, with the utmost attention for more than two hours and a half. Mr. Clarke's sermon was one of great ability. His design was to depict the character of a qualified missionary, and he spoke from the experience of more than twenty years. The impression produced, was evidently most salutary, and, no doubt, it was heightened by the circumstance of the services being held in the church of our former brethren, in Waverly Place. It had been kindly offered for the exercises of the evening by the authorities of the congregation, and was accepted in the same spirit of Christian courtesy in which it was tendered. May this prove the commencement of an era of good feeling among all concerned. J.

Notices of New Publications.

The Psalms of David in Metre—allowed by the General Assembly of the Kirk of Scotland, and appointed to be sung in congregations and families. New York, Robert Carter; for sale in Philadelphia by W. S. Martein, Seventh and George street.

This is a very accurate and elegant reprint of the version of the Psalms, used in the Reformed Presbyterian, and other churches, and we have great pleasure in recommending it to our readers as the best edition, so far as we know, which has yet been lished in this country. The paper is white and substantial, the type large and distinct, the binding neat and durable,—the whole getting up of the work being such as to make it well adapted to general use. What is best of all, it appears to be free from the typographical errors, by which other editions have been so much disfigured. We hope it will have an extensive circulation.

Revivals of the Eighteenth Century, particularly at Cambuslang, with three sermons by Rev. George Whitefield, taken in short-hand. Compiled from original manuscripts and contemporary publications, by Rev. Dr. McFarlan, D. D., Renfrew. Issued by the Free Church of Scotland. For sale by the Presb. Board of Publication. Price 44 cts. In a former number we called the attention of our readers to this book, but it merits more extended notice than we could then give it. The subject to which it refers, is of much interest, and such an account was very desirable. The work commences with a sketch of the times, and a brief narration of the revivals in England, Wales, America, which occurred at the same period. We find next, a short biography of Mr. McCulloch, who was minister of Cambuslang during the revivals, with a consideration of the means which preceded these remarkable effusions of the HOLY SPIRIT. A more detailed account of the work at Cambuslang, and its extension to other parts of Scotland, is then given. Whitefield's sermons close the volume. While there is doubtless much not to be approved of in connexion with these remarkable awakenings, we think it would be a dishonour to God the HOLY GHOST to deny that His influence was manifested in them. As illustrating his workings, and showing the character of some of the most zealous, pious, and intelligent preachers of the gospel who have ever lived, the book merits perusal, and will afford much instruction.

Sickness Improved. American Sunday School Union—18mo., pp. 153. This handsomely printed little volume consists of meditations during sickness and convalescence. They all breathe the spirit of holy love, and tend to make the burden of affliction lighter. The book would be a good companion for the sick.

Protestantism in France, from the earliest ages, to the end of the reign of Charles IX. American Sunday School Union, pp. 192, 18mo.

The history of true religion in France, has been almost throughout a history of bloodshed and cruel oppression, yet as showing the constancy of the martyrs of the truth, and the indestructibility of gospel seed, and the power of the Divine Spirit to support the faithful in its severest trials, it cannot be read without emotion and interest. The history mentioned above is a very candid and graphic account of the struggles made in France from the commencement of the propagation of the gospel in that country, and after the massacre of St. Bartholomew's day. We regret that it closes there, but we hope a continuation may be published, bringing the history down to our own times.

Catechetischer Beistand. Presbyterian Board of Publication.

This is a collection of Catechisms in German. It comprises a brief Catechism for the young, the Shorter Catechism, and a Catechism on Scripture history. We are glad to find such works prepared for circulation among the Germans, who constitute a large and interesting part of our population. We have not sufficient knowledge of the language in which they are written to warrant us to express our opinion of the manner in which the translation is made, but the character of the Board which issues them, is sufficient to lead us to recommend them.

Why I go to the Ball? By the late Rev. J. McDonald, Calcutta, with an introduction by Rev. W. M. Eagles, D. D. Government of the Thoughts—Government of the Tongue, by Rev. A. F. Burder, D. D. Presbyterian Board of Publication. These tracts treat of important subjects, presented in an interesting and able manner. The introduction to the one first mentioned, is a brief, but excellent discussion on sleeping, which we would wish to be widely disseminated.

The Sunday School Teacher's Pocket Almanac, for 1849. 100 copies for 75 cents.

This is a miniature Almanac, issued by the Union, which besides the usual calendars with passages of Scripture, contains a brief sketch of the history of Sabbath schools and hints for their management, and a list of some of the more important recent publications of the Union. Every teacher would do well to carry one with him.

National Preacher, original, Monthly. New York: J. M. Sherwood.

We have received the numbers of this excellent publication for October and November; the former contains sermons by Dr. Ferris of N. Y., on the words "Thy kingdom come," and by Rev. Dr. Richards of Dartmouth College, on "The difficulties of ministers." The discourses in the latter are by Rev. A. D. Smith, on the importance of a scriptural ministry, and Rev. R. Trumbull on thoughts of God. They are all well worth reading and preserving. We feel sure the usefulness of ministers could be much increased by taking this publication.

Editorial.

REV. MR. CLARKE.

Our readers have already been informed by various documents published in several of our preceding numbers, that this respected brother is now in ecclesiastical connection with our branch of the church. The situation in which he is placed, is one of much importance, and we rejoice that it is occupied by one so well qualified to fill it with propriety. At the close of the minutes published in our last number, there was an account of Mr. Clarke's field of labour, to which we would call the attention of our readers. We are glad to be able to add, that Mr. C. met with a very cordial reception from churches in New York and Philadelphia, and that liberal expressions of regard were received in both these places. We hope that some of our young men, in addition to the excellent brother who has already devoted himself to that field, may be sent to Mr. C. for assistance. The station is important, and the prospect very promising.

WINTER.

The dying year has now almost reached its end, and winter has arrived with its frosts and snows. Although generally considered as a time of gloom, there are ways by which it may be made to pass away pleasantly and very profitably. Its long evenings, and necessary withdrawal from out of door employments and amusements afford time for reading and useful conversation; it is favourable for study. The situation of most, if not all of our readers, while they sit around the cheerful fire, sheltered from the blasts of winter in their comfortable abodes, presents a strong contrast with the scene without, and should warm the heart with grateful love to God. And when we reflect how many there are, some probably in our own immediate neighbourhood, who are cold, and hungry, and comfortless, while we have not only enough, but also to spare, our sympathies must be excited, and we will be led to seek them out, to speak to them words of encouragement, and to give them what we can well spare to help them. We are glad that many congregations have societies for the relief of the distressed, and we hope they will be well sustained. But let each person also do something individually, and though the sacrifice may be greater, the pleasures enjoyed will be proportionably increased; if it is delightful to hear of the happiness which is caused by our donations, much more to witness it; it is good to be acting by the instrumentality of others, it is better to be ourselves the donors of our own bounty. Thus will we be more closely imitating him "who works about doing good," and tasting in return some of the highest, purest pleasures which can be enjoyed on earth.

THE CHOLERA.

The accounts received from Europe, and which are, no doubt, accessible to our readers generally, show us that this myterious scourge of God is approaching us, and lead us to expect that it will be in our midst early in the coming year. As yet, medical investigation has not been able to discover its nature, although we do not suppose it is to be considered as a miraculous thing, but is probably under the direction of fixed laws. There are means which may tend to ward it off or arrest its progress, or even remove it, and these should be used conscientiously—to neglect them would be a kind of suicide. But multitudes will doubtless fall victims to this destroyer, and its voice to each of us is, "Prepare to meet thy God." Can we think of its nearness without alarm, if we have no hope for eternity? We trust reflection on this subject will lead the thoughtless to solemn consideration, and make the real believer more circumspect in all his conduct.

THANKSGIVING.

During the last month, a large number of the States of our great confederacy set apart a day for thanksgiving to ALMIGHTY GOD. It is most gratifying to find such a custom becoming established, and each year, it seems to us, the day is observed with more propriety; it is a pleasing evidence of the Christianity of our beloved country.

CLOSE OF THE VOLUME.

In closing another volume, we have only space to thank those who have heretofore given their encouragement, and to say that we have reason to believe the next volume will be more worthy of patronage. We hope they will aid in increasing its circulation.

THE most careless observer must have noticed that the times in which we live are remarkable for agitation; society no longer retains the quietude which for many years previous it had enjoyed, but in every part of the world is more or less convulsed. These “shakings” may be considered the precursor of better days, when “things that cannot be shaken shall remain.”

In the mean time, there is especial need of the moral influence which the pure gospel alone can exert. Becoming dissatisfied with existing institutions, men seek for “a more excellent way,” and in their search are liable not only to lose their labour, but also to incur great positive injury. It should be the desire and the effort of the Christian philanthropist to direct the minds of those whom he can affect, to the true source of all prosperity, whether physical, intellectual, or moral, the “righteousness,” or accordance with divine laws, “which alone can exalt a nation.”

In the limited sphere in which we are called upon to act, it will be our aim to do this. We believe that the particular branch of the church with which we are connected, not only holds, in common with other evangelical bodies, those essential truths, the acceptance of which is necessary to salvation, but also such peculiar principles as will meet the necessities and cravings of the age in which we live, and when correctly applied produce great benefit. The want of these appears to us to be becoming more and more obvious, and if presented properly, we feel confident they would meet with general acceptance. In the Church there is needed purity of doctrine, strictness of discipline, simplicity of worship, holiness of conduct, and activity in the Master's service. In the State there should be the application of scriptural principles to all political relations. In the family there is required the maintenance of that parental government, which will restrain the natural propensities to evil, encourage all good inclinations, and develop whatever endowments may be possessed, thus preparing the individual for discharging with propriety his duties as a citizen, or as a member of the church. In regard to these three divinely appointed organizations, our church has assumed ground, as we think, higher and more distinct than any other denomination. She recognises their superior importance, and aims to bring a good influence to bear upon them, that thus society may be improved in all its aspects and relations.

While we consider the Church, the State, and the Family the three great institutions by which the wants of our social nature are to be supplied, and will therefore keep them prominently in view, we are aware that the disordered condition of the world has rendered it necessary and proper in many cases to seek to effect good results by other distinct organizations. So far as these are consistent with truth and virtue, and conducted in a proper manner, we are disposed to sustain them, always, however, looking and labouring for the period when the organizations we have mentioned will embrace all others. In the mean time, we rejoice at any good they may do, and will be glad to record their progress.

We have not, heretofore, given much attention to events occurring in the political world, both because we considered such subjects more appropriate for a newspaper than for a magazine, and because we supposed our readers were in general well informed on such subjects by other means. Hereafter we will, probably, advert to such occurrences, not so much as items of information as in their connexions and bearings in regard to the progress of society towards the elevation which it will attain in the millennial period, and as development of the prophecies of Holy Writ.

In following out the plan thus exhibited, may we not hope for the aid of all the members of our own church, as well as of Christian friends of other denominations? We regret that our ministers use the pen so little, and we earnestly ask their contributions to our pages. There are also many of our ruling elders and private members who are well qualified in this manner to do good. We solicit their assistance. Our pages are open to all suitable communications, and it is a cause of much regret that so few make use of them.

The present condition of that branch of the Church to which we belong, appears not only to call for increased activity on the part of all her ministers and members, but also to give great encouragement to the efforts which may be made. During the last year her boundaries have been extended, and the number of ministers and congregations much increased at home, while evidences of the most pleasing character have been afforded of the deep, pervading, controlling interest she feels in regard to the heathen. God appears to be calling upon her to "Arise and shine," and she should obey his mandate. It is in order to excite her to duty and direct and encourage her in its performance, that this periodical has been sustained. Who is there that loves Zion who will not give his aid in such a work?

The past warns us not to be too sanguine in regard to the future, and we therefore will only say that "we will go on in the strength of the LORD GOD." May he vouchsafe his blessing, since without it "we can do nothing."

THE MEDIATORIAL CHARACTER OF OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST.

Three particular things may be considered as constituting the Mediatorial character of our Redeemer; these are, a divine consecration to the work, suitable qualifications for its performance, and a special commission to assume it. Each of these presents interesting subjects of consideration.

1. His consecration. It was customary in ancient times to anoint persons who were to sustain some official character; thus, Moses anointed Aaron, Samuel anointed David, and Elijah anointed Elisha. In allusion to this custom, Jesus Christ is said to have been anointed, because he sustained similar offices. Thus the scriptures tell us that he was "anointed with the oil of gladness," Ps. xlv. 7, and in Ps. ii., where it is said, "I have set my king on my holy hill of Zion;" the word set should be rendered anointed, as is the case in our metrical version. The anointing which Jesus had was an anointing with the Holy Ghost, hence in John iii. 34, we read, "God giveth not the Spirit by measure unto him," and again in Is. xlii. 1, "I have put my Spirit upon him." His possessing this Spirit is manifested by the perfect holiness of his character, by the miracles which he performed, and by his resurrection from the dead. All these were produced by the influence of that Divine Being.

All the people of God possess the Spirit of God—which is the Spirit of Jesus Christ—but they possess it in a greater or less degree, according to the attainments they have made in the divine life. But of Jesus Christ it is said that he was anointed "above his fellows," and that he has not the Spirit "by measure," intimating that he possesses it in an unlimited degree. Having a divine person, this was possible: with man, a creature, it would be impossible.

2. Suitable qualifications. It is said of our Redeemer, that "In Him were hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge," and that "It pleased the Father that in Him should all fulness dwell." These expressions indicate the possession of all perfections of Deity, exhibited indeed in such a manner as would correspond to the nature with which they were connected. Hence it is said, that "In Christ dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead bodily." Colos. ii. 9.* The whole history of Jesus evinced the possession of such endowments—at twelve years of age we find him in the Jewish temple discoursing with the Rabbies; we find him able to baffle all the artful questions with which his adversaries endeavoured to ensnare him, and communicating instruction to them in such a way as not to excite their prejudices or arouse their hostility. Behold his meekness and wisdom at the judgment-seat of Pilate, and hear the sentence extorted even from that unprincipled ruler, "I find no fault in him." In his whole life he manifested the possession of something not merely unusual, but wholly superhuman.

We have already observed that the display of this superior wisdom, the exhibition of this fulness, would correspond to the nature with which it was connected. In some instances there would be a greater and in some a less display of it. Hence he is sometimes said not to know certain things, and again it is said he knows all things; and sometimes we read he could not do certain miracles, and at other times that he could do all things. In these instances, different natures are referred to, and thus the apparent contradiction is removed.

3. Although thus set apart, and thus qualified, Jesus did not assume this office without a special and divine appointment. The apostle Paul tells us, "Christ glorified not himself to be made a high priest, but him that said to him, Thou art my son." He was set up by the Father from everlasting. He was by the Divine Being in eternity, anointed to be King upon Zion. There was indeed, in the nature of the case, a propriety in his being called to this office by God the Father. In the capacity of Mediator he was to be his honorary servant, and to be subject to his authority. In the covenant of grace, also, the Father is represented as having found and having procured the ransom; and unless there had been express covenant stipulation, there could have been no obligation on the part of the Supreme Being to accept of the sacrifice of Jesus. Had his sufferings been uncalled for by the Father, then they would not have been satisfactory nor acceptable.

We do not know at what particular time he was formally commissioned as Mediator. From all eternity he was set apart for the discharge of its duties; and, perhaps, when tidings came to heaven that man had fallen, the Father formally invested the Son with his Mediatorial office. The great poet represents the Father as thus addressing the Son on that occasion:

"———To thee I have transferred
All judgment whether in heaven, earth, or hell.
Ever it may be seen that I intend
Mercy colleague with justice, sending Thee,
Man's friend, his Mediator, his designed,
Both ransom and redeemer voluntary,
And destined, man himself, to judge man fallen.
So spake the Father: and unfolding bright,
Toward the right hand his glory, on the Son Blazed forth unclouded Deity."—PARADISE LOST, Book x.

It has often been said that when in Eden he pronounced the sentence, "The seed of the woman shall bruise the head of the serpent," the government of the universe passed from Jehovah the Father, to Jehovah the Son. Perhaps at that moment he assumed the Mediatorial government, although his previous mission and his pronouncing the sentence were more properly official acts, and imply a previous investiture with the Mediatorial character.

In the 68th Psalm, the sacred writer gives us an account of his ascension into heaven, when "he led captivity captive," and attended by an angelic retinue, he presented himself before his Father's throne. Then was he, no doubt, formally recognised as the Redeemer and Saviour of his people, seated on a throne of glory and power, at the right hand of the Father, occupying a position of dignity and sovereignty, and that not for a season, but permanently. But he will again appear in this world, when he comes to judgment. Then the myriads of human beings who sleep in the dust, and those who are in the depths of the ocean, and those who remain alive at his appearance, will be assembled at his bar, and receive an equitable sentence. When this has been pronounced, he will ascend with his redeemed people to his Father's presence, and present as perfect, (for so the word rendered deliver up, in 1 Cor. xv. 3, should be rendered,) his Mediatorial work, while he will still continue subject to the Father. Then again the "royal diadem" will be brought forth, and Jesus crowned "the LORD OF ALL."

NOAH'S PROPHECY.

"And Noah began to be a husbandman, and he planted a vineyard: and he drank of the wine and was drunken; and he was uncovered within his tent. And Ham, the father of Canaan, saw the nakedness of his father, and told his two brethren without. And Shem and Japheth took a garment, and laid it upon both their shoulders, and went backward, and covered the nakedness of their father; and their faces were backward, and they saw not their father's nakedness. And Noah awoke from his wine, and knew what his younger son had done unto him. And he said, Cursed be Canaan; a servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren. And he said, Blessed be the Lord God of Shem; and Canaan shall be his servant. God shall enlarge Japheth, and he shall dwell in the tents of Shem; and Canaan shall be his servant."—Genesis ix. 20—27.

It is probable that this prophecy was delivered a considerable period after the departure of Noah and his family from the ark. "Noah," it is said, "began to be a husbandman and planted a vineyard." His first care would be for the necessities of life, afterwards he would provide for its luxuries, and hence it was not till the ground was brought into such a state of cultivation as no longer to afford a scanty and precarious, but an ample and certain support, that he would turn his attention to the culture of the vine. "He planted a vineyard;"—it was a regular and probably laborious operation; he did not merely collect the grapes of a few scattered plants, but he arranged them in regular order, and brought them into such perfection as to yield the beverage which he seems to have desired.

There is another reason for supposing that the event happened in a late period of Noah's life. The fourth son of Ham, Noah's youngest son, is one of the principal subjects of it, and we are sure that all the sons of Ham must have been born after the flood, as there were but eight persons in the ark, Noah and his wife, and his sons and their wives.

"He drank of the wine and was drunken." We can hardly be led to believe, that in such a condition, he would be filled with the prophetic inspiration, which the Holy Spirit was wont to bring on the "holy men of old." His was not the situation which could receive, as it should be received, the heavenly communication. But it is also strange, that one who had lived so long in the antediluvian world, and must have known the qualities and effects of the juice of the grape, and whose grateful sensibilities and religious feelings would restrain him, should fall into so foul a crime as drunkenness. But the character of such a man should not be yielded to aspersions of this description. It must be rescued, if it be possible, and when we examine the original and compare it with other versions, it will be found that no fault was committed by the holy patriarch. He was not drunk. The word translated drunk, means "to be satisfied with drink, to be cheered or elated," thus it is applied to the brethren of Joseph when banqueting with him, and certainly they would not be guilty of any excess in the presence of him, whom they regarded only as the viceroy of the Egyptian monarch. It is also applied, typically, to the Redeemer, where he says, "I have drunk my wine with my milk," and stigma of such a kind could never be attached to him. We find it also in Haggai, where the prophet says of the rebellious Israelites, "Ye drank, but ye are not satisfied with drink." The word, μεθυσθη, by which the Seventy render the Hebrew, is derived from a word signifying unmixed wine, or, we suppose, wine which was not strengthened by the addition of spices, and the derivative will partake of the character of its original, and refer to the effect produced, which would be, in general, but exhilaration and not inebriety.

Noah's religious feelings were, we believe, not blunted, but quickened by the fruit which he moderately enjoyed. He was, doubtless, grateful for it, and, perhaps, impelled by his religious feelings, he hastened to the הל, or sacred tent, in which he received the prophetic annunciation of the destinies of his descendants. "He went into his tent," it is said, but what tent was it? It was, perhaps, a tabernacle where, from the very fall, had dwelt the visible manifestation of God's power. That there was such a tabernacle, appears to be proved by the following passages, cited by Parkhurst. In Exod. xxxiii. 7—9, immediately after Moses descended from the mount, when he saw in what idolatrous practices the Israelites had been engaged, before one board, or curtain, or pin of the subsequent tabernacle had been constructed, it is said, "He took the tabernacle and pitched it without the camp, afar off from the camp." Aaron, also, as we are informed in Exod. xvi. 33, laid up a pot of manna before the testimony, immediately after the heavenly shower commenced.

But Mr. Kirby, in the introduction to his Bridgwater Treatises, in the thirty-eighth, presents the fact, that Jehovah had, from the fall, some local habitation where his worshippers were to assemble to praise and sacrifice to him. It is said in Gen. iii. 24, "The LORD God placed at the east of the garden of Eden Cherubims, and a flaming sword which turned every way, to keep the way of the tree of life." The word rendered placed, is שכן, and means, properly, to cause to dwell in a tent, and seems, therefore, to refer to Cherubims which were placed in a tabernacle situated on the eastward of Paradise, where Adam and his virtuous descendants might learn to worship the true God. It appears conclusively that they did so. Thus we read that Abel and Cain brought a sacrifice to the LORD, denoting that it was presented in some particular locality. We also are informed, that when Cain had received his righteous sentence, he exclaimed, "Behold, thou hast driven me out this day, and from thy face shall I be hid," and it is added, "he went out from the presence of the Lord." This tabernacle and ark, we may suppose, continued in the family of Seth, and was brought by Abraham from Ur of the Chaldees, descended into Egypt, remained with the Israelites during their sojourn in that land, and accompanied them in the desert until it gave place to the new erection of Moses. The place therefore in which the prophecy was delivered, was the sacred tabernacle, whither Noah had retired for religious worship.

We would proceed now to examine the subjects of the prophecy, and these are, as mentioned in our version, Canaan, Shem and Japheth. It is said in the narrative, that Noah having fallen asleep in the tabernacle, rolled himself and was uncovered; while in this condition, his son Ham perceived him, and acted towards him in an unbecoming manner. Returning from the tent, he tells his other brethren the condition of his father; but they, with far different feelings, take a garment, and entering the tent backwards, cover their father's nakedness. Noah awakes from sleep, he is made acquainted with the improper conduct of his son, and the spirit of inspiration coming upon him, he utters the prophecy.

Now, it seems very strange that Canaan, who is not mentioned at all as an actor in this event, should be the object of the malediction, and his father Ham should be entirely omitted, though he alone is recorded as the guilty individual. To explain this, as the passage now stands, we may suppose either that Canaan had taken some part in the transgression, though it is not particularly mentioned here, or, that though the curse was originally pronounced on Ham, it was fulfilled, not on him, personally, but on his descendants, and of those descendants the Canaanites were those principally with whom the Israelites were connected, and for whose instruction and encouragement, principally, this prophecy was recorded. But if we may be allowed to examine the original text, it will appear, that an emendation might be made in it, such as to render Ham, and not Canaan, the subject. In the Arabic version, instead of Canaan it is Ham, the father of Canaan, and one copy of the Septuagint renders it in the same manner. The parallelism too of the poetic members of the prophecy is incomplete, unless we suppose this to be supplied. On the whole, therefore, it seems most likely that the curse was pronounced on Ham, and therefore Ham, Shem, and Japheth were the objects of the prophecy.

Let us proceed now to the details of the prophecy, and first of Ham, it is said,

Cursed be [Ham the father of] Canaan,
A servant of servants unto his brethren.

As was suggested above, the prophecy was not of a strictly personal character, but found its fulfilment in the descendants of the persons specified, and we must therefore examine the history of the Hammitish family in order to discover its truth.

The sons of Ham, as enumerated in the succeeding chapter, were Cush and Mizraim, and Phut and Canaan; who all settled in Africa, or countries contiguous to it. Cush was the ancestor of the Ethiopians, Mizraim of the Egyptians, Phut of the Lybians, and Canaan of the inhabitants of Palestine, the Tyrians and Sidonians, and the numerous colonies which they sent forth. Now the question is, have these nations, on the whole, been inferior to the descendants of the other sons of Noah? And it must be granted, at this late age of the world, when the cycle of history is nearly complete, that they have been. There have, it is true, been powerful nations of the race of Ham, but though they did for awhile rule over some of the rest of the descendants of Noah, yet it was but for a short time, and now, we believe, in every country, Ham has been a servant of servants unto his brethren. But we need not enter into minute details.

Shem is not specified in the prophecy. Of him it is said,

Blessed be JEHOVAH, God of Shem,
And Canaan shall be his servant.

As far as relates to Canaan or Ham, this prophecy needs little remark. It is well known that the Israelites, the descendants of Shem, extirpated the Canaanites, and it may also be noticed that the Elamites, or Persians, of his lineage, were the nation which overturned the Assyrian and Babylonish monarchies, which were founded by descendants of Ham.

There is, however, another clause in Shem's benediction, which is worthy of minute attention. "Blessed be JEHOVAH, God of Shem." The true God was to be worshipped and known by the Shemitish race, while he was forgotten by Japheth and Ham. This was indeed fulfilled. "Of him also, as concerning the flesh, Christ came, who is God over all, blessed for ever."

Japheth was the third subject of the prophecy.

"God shall enlarge Japheth,
And he shall dwell in the tents of Shem,
And Canaan shall be his servant."

"God shall persuade Japheth," as it should be rendered. Though ignorant of the true God, yet He was to be revealed in due time, and he would feel the persuading and constraining influence of his gospel. Religious blessings were to be bestowed upon him, but not these only, for temporal superiority was also promised, and that too not only over Ham, but over his other brother Shem. "He shall dwell in the tents of Shem;"—the expression, "the tents of Shem," refers to the pastoral nomadic habits of the Shemitish races. "Canaan shall be his servant:" if Shem's, as we have already shown, then much more Japheth's also.

The descendants of Shem are the nations in Southern and Eastern Asia, and the Islands of the sea. The descendants of Japheth, the Northern Asiatics, Europeans, Americans, and it is needless to mention facts to show that the latter have indeed dwelt in the tents of the former.

This prophecy may be regarded as a very strong evidence of the divine origin of the Scriptures. When it was delivered, mere human foresight could not have anticipated the events which it predicts; and when recorded by Moses, the descendants of Ham were in the zenith of their power, and seemed most unlikely ever to lose their supremacy; and for many subsequent ages, various tribes of them were superior to the descendants either of Shem or Japheth. But contrary to all existing appearances, and to any natural expectations, it is declared that the state of things shall be entirely changed, and Shem shall rule over Ham, and Japheth over both. Reflection on this subject will lead us to believe that the Scriptures came from Him who "knows the end from the beginning."

BEGINNING OF THE YEAR.

Let us begin the year with solemn reflection—and say, with Job, "When a few years are come, I shall go the way whence I shall not return." Let me not only believe this, but think of it, and feel the importance of the sentiment. Yes, in a little time I shall be no more seen. How—where—shall I be disposed of? The seasons will return as before: but the places that now know me will know me no more for ever. Will this be a curse or a blessing? If I die in my sins, I shall return no more to my possessions and enjoyments, to the calls of mercy, to the throne of grace, to the house of prayer! If I die in the Lord, I shall, O blessed impossibility! return no more to these thorns and briers, to this vain and wicked world, to this aching head, to this throbbing heart, to these temptations and troubles, and sorrows and sins.

Let us begin the year with self-inspection—and say, with the chief butler, “I do remember my faults this day.” We are prone to think of the failings of our fellow-creatures, and often imagine because we are free from their faults, that we are faultless. But we may have other faults, we may have worse, and while a mote is in our brother’s eye, a beam may be in our own. Let us be open to conviction. Let us deal faithfully with our own hearts. Let us not compare ourselves with others, and especially the more vile of our fellow-creatures, but with our advantages, with our knowledge, with our professions, with the law of God.

Let us begin the year with a determination to abandon whatever appears sinful—and say, with Elihu, “If I have done iniquity, I will do no more.” Should the evil course, or the evil passion, solicit, let it plead in vain while the Saviour-Judge says, “If thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out, and cast it from thee: for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell. And if thy right hand offend thee, cut it off, and cast it from thee: for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell.”

Begin the year with pious and personal dedication, and say, with David, “Lord, I am thine, save me.” Through him, who is the way, yield yourselves unto God. It is your reasonable service. He has infinite claims to you. You will never be truly your own till you are his.

Begin the year with relative religion; and if the worship of God has never been established in your family, now commence it—and say, with Joshua, “As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord.” A family without prayer is like a house without a roof. It is uncovered and exposed: and we know who has threatened to pour out his fury upon the families that call not upon his name.

Begin the year with fresh concern to be useful—and ask, with Saul of Tarsus, “Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?” Let me look at my condition, my resources, my opportunities. How can I glorify God, and promote the welfare of my fellow creatures? Is there not a Bible to spread? Are there not missionaries to support? Are there none perishing for lack of knowledge that I can myself instruct? Have I no irreligious neighbours to reclaim? Are there no poor to relieve? No widows and fatherless to visit?

Begin the year with more conduct in the arrangement of your affairs, and resemble Ezra and his brethren, who “did according to the custom, as the duty of every day required.” God has said, “Let every thing be done decently and in order.” Much of your comfort will arise from regularity in your meals, in your devotions, in your callings; and your piety will be aided by it. Have a place to receive every thing, an end to simplify it, a rule to arrange it. Leave nothing for the morrow that ought to be discharged to-day. Sufficient for each period will be its own claims; and your mind ought to be always at liberty to attend to fresh engagements.

Finally. Time, this short, this uncertain, this all-important time, upon every instant of which eternity depends, will not allow of our trifling away any of its moments. Resolve therefore to redeem it. Gather up its fragments, that nothing be lost. Especially rescue it from needless sleep; and if you have hitherto accustomed yourself to the shameful indulgence of lying late in bed, begin the new year with the habit of early rising; by which you will promote your health and improvement of every kind, and live much longer than others in the same number of days—and say, with David, “My voice shalt thou hear in the morning, O Lord: in the morning will I direct my prayer unto thee, and will look up.”

And if this be your determination, the season will be the date of your happiness. God himself says, “From this day will I bless you.”—JAY.

CARELESS WORDS.

To the unlawful use of the tongue—to careless words—may be justly attributed the great majority of petty strifes, bickerings, jealousies, and other crimes even to the worst, such as revenge, rapine, murder and bloody war, which disgrace and destroy thousands of the once noble race of man.

Where is the individual who cannot speak from his own sad experience of the power of a word—a single thoughtless expression—in imbittering all his pleasureable feelings, and causing him to weep in sadness and alone? Who cannot, in looking at his past life, recollect instances when a remark from another, upon a real or supposed defect in character or person has caused the keenest pain, and, as it were, a crushing of the spirit? Though long years have passed since the withering remark was uttered, yet it is still remembered, and the time, place, and circumstances, as distinctly as if it had been yesterday. Who has not seen difficulties commence by a word hastily and angrily spoken, which have grown to mountain-size, and have separated chief friends? That which was uttered by one, renowned for wisdom, thousands of years ago, that "Death and life are in the power of the tongue," is still full of truth, and many are living to-day who can with sorrow attest its verity.

Doubtless many who are in the habit of using the tongue carelessly, thus causing bitter feelings which the heart of the wounded can only know, are in the habit of so doing from want of reflection, not really designing to grieve the feelings of others. However this may be, all ought to be careful how they let loose this "unruly member." It is much easier, even when excited by passion, to curb the tongue, than it is, many times, to make good the evil done by giving loose to that member which "no man can tame."

Well would it be if all would strive—instead of barely keeping the tongue from evil—to make use of it in doing good, in uttering words of kindness and sympathy, in encouraging noble purposes in the minds of the young, in condemning profanity, impurity, and all sin, and in doing good, as opportunity is given. Words are the great means of elevating mankind:—persuasions and right motives placed before individuals, exert an almost omnipotent influence in making men better. Words uttered in their influence, do not end with him who speaks them—do not affect the interests of time only, but reach far into the future. One of the best living writers for the young has said, in this connexion, "Remember that every word you utter, wings its way to the throne of God, and is to affect the condition of your soul for ever."

Beware, beware of careless words,
They have a fearful power,
And jar upon the spirit's chords,
Through many a weary hour.

Though not designed to give us pain,
Though but at random spoken;
Remembrance brings them back again—
The past's most bitter token.

They haunt us through the toilsome day,
And through the lonely night,
And rise to cloud the spirit's ray,
When all beside is bright.

Though from the mind, and with the breath,
Which gave them, they have flown,
Yet wormwood, gall, and even death,
May dwell in every tone.

And burning tears can well attest,
A sentence lightly framed
May linger, cankering in the breast,
At which it first was aimed.

O, could my prayer indeed be heard—
Might I the past live o'er,
I'd guard against a careless word,
E'en though I spoke no more.

Worcester Gazette.

BOUGHT WITH A PRICE.—The time will come, says the venerable Dr. Alexander, and I cannot but hope that it is near at hand, when all the difficulty about funds for the spread of the Gospel will be done away; when Christians will learn a lesson, which hitherto they have been very slow to learn, that the richest enjoyment of wealth is to give its increase to the treasury of the Lord; and that the sweetest of incentives to labour is the hope of gaining something that may aid in furthering the cause of God. The excuses for our want of liberality are utterly futile; they are worse, they are often impious. If we are Christians, let us act like Christians, and not dishonour that sacred name by a base, selfish, avaricious spirit, which keeps back from the Lord what is due. If we are Christians indeed, we owe not only our wealth, but ourselves to the Redeemer, who has bought us with a price. Was he willing to purchase our salvation by pouring out his blood, and shall we be unwilling to give liberally of what he has given us? The very heathen will rise up in judgment against narrow-hearted Christians; for they spend ten times as much on their idols as these do in supporting and propagating a religion which is truly divine, and which is the only hope of salvation. O that men would remember that they are but stewards, and that God will require a strict account of the manner in which they dispense what has been committed to them!—Episc. Rec.

HOW THE WORLD DOES IT.—We subjoin two paragraphs from the daily papers, to show how liberal the world is in purchasing its pleasures. Will Christians take the hint in evincing their interest in much higher pursuits?

"Havana.—The opera seems to engross much attention at Havana, and they are positively bewitched by Marini, the singer; so much so, that the sum of eight thousand dollars was raised to pay the forfeit which he would incur, were he not to return to London next April, so anxious are they to keep him among them. Marini, however, declines receiving it, and states that he must keep his word with the English managers, but that he will return in the fall.—New York Herald."

"It is said that Jenny Lind and her partners, Messrs. Lumley and Knowles, netted ten thousand pounds, (fifty thousand dollars!) in a fortnight, in poor distressed Ireland!"—Presb.

DOING GOOD.—How often do we sigh for opportunities of doing good, while we neglect the openings of Providence in little things, which would frequently lead to the accomplishment of most important usefulness. Dr. Johnson used to say, "He who waits to do a great deal of good at once, will never do any." Good is done by degrees. However small in proportion the benefit which follows individual attempts to do good, a great deal may thus be accomplished by perseverance, even in the midst of discouragements and disappointments.

DIES IRÆ.

The following is a free translation of the celebrated Latin chant of THOMAS DE CELENO, a monk of the twelfth century. His poem was in Latin rhyme, a style of composition peculiar to his times.

THAT day of wrath,—tremendous day!
(So David and the Sibyl* say,)
With whirlwind fires the world shall burn!
O then! what trembling will there be,
When CHRIST descends in majesty,
Upon the resurrection morn!

With wondrous pow'r the trump shall sound!
Death and the Dead it shall astound,
And rend the tombs of every land!
The whole creation shall arise,
To meet th' ALMIGHTY in the skies,
And at his dread tribunal stand!

The mountains cleave; volcanoes wreath
Strange fires, disgorg'd from earth beneath,
That in conflicting flames are flung:
Affrighted Ocean heaves amain!
Creation travaileth in pain!
Heaven is with ruin overhung!

Lo! in mid heavens that great white throne!
Nature convulsive heaves a groan!
The Nations look in dread amaze!
Guilt shall behold, with anguish dire,
His eyes like fiercely flaming fire!
And shrink from the oppressive blaze!

'Tis Heaven's great King! tremendous pow'r!
Where can'st thou fly at this dread hour?
Where seek relief from thy distress?
For lo! THE CRUCIFIED is come
To fix thy everlasting doom,
And judge the world in righteousness!

Earthquakes and thunderings prevail;
While trembling sinners weep and wail,
To see the Book of Doom display'd!
O dread Remembrancer of 'I thought,
Whence every sin to light is brought,
To make the guilty soul afraid!

Williamsburg, L. I.

Wretch that I am! what can I say,
Or do, but humbly prostrate pray,
And through my tears look up to thee?
In thee my refuge I have sought:
At that great day destroy me not!
In boundless mercy pity me!

O kind Redeemer! hear my prayer;
Save me, that day, from black despair,
Thou who hadst pity on the thief:
Thou, who didst Mary's sins forgive,
Be merciful and let me live,
Though I of sinners am the chief.

Thou, who satt'st wearied on the well;
Who toil'dst to save lost souls from hell;
Let not such travail be in vain!
Thou, who for me hast borne the cross,
And hung thereon, (a bleeding curse,)
O save me from eternal pain!

A suppliant at thy holy throne,
My guilt and worthlessness I own,
And only plead that Jesus bled:
Receive me, O thou Crucified,
Because for sinners thou hast died,
Eternal Judge of Quick and Dead!

Me absolution thou hast given!
Faith to my soul hath open'd heaven,
And Mercy whispereth of grace!
Eternal King! at that great day,
When earth and heaven shall pass away,
Among thy sheep give me a place!

When wrapp'd in flame this rolling world
Is in one fiery ruin hurl'd,
And there is no more earth and sea;
When to thy kingdom Thou shalt come,
And guilty souls receive their doom,
O then! my God! remember me!

Miscellaneous.

The following report was presented to the First Reformed Presbyterian church in this city, several months ago, but not published hitherto for want of room. It is now laid before our readers that they may know what progress is made in the enterprise to which their attention has heretofore been several times directed. It will be seen that the prospect is cheering, and that it encourages to continued and still greater efforts on the part of the congregation more immediately concerned, and to the adoption by others of a similar system of operations. We are glad to be able to say, that notwithstanding some circumstances have prevented as much attention being given of late as formerly, there are still "signs of promise," and we have no doubt that a flourishing church could be immediately organized. It is only the want of some person statedly to dispense the ordinances which has prevented it.

REPORT OF SCRIPTURE READER OF THE FIRST REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, PHILADELPHIA.

To the Session of the First Reformed Presbyterian church, Philadelphia.

In meekness instructing those that oppose themselves; if God peradventure will give them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth, and that they may recover themselves out of the snares of the devil, who are taken captive by him at his will.—The Apostle Paul.

Many incidents of an interesting character have transpired since our last report was presented. And when we cause the events of the last three months to pass in view, and consider what we have been, and what we are, we feel constrained to raise our Ebenezer, and inscribe as our motto, "Hitherto hath the Lord helped."

The king of terrors has not been idle; we have seen some of the more aged of our number borne to the narrow house appointed for all living, nor have the young and those of tender age been spared,—both the caring and uncaring for the soul's redemption have, by that hand of death, been laid prostrate in the bosom of their common mother, earth.

Moreover, in the providence of God, we have also seen beloved ones depart from this land, that they might labour for Christ in those dark places of the earth, hitherto characterized as the "habitations of horrid cruelties."

And as some circumstances connected with their departure, and the great work to which they have devoted themselves, have deeply interested some of those among whom we labour, it will be necessary to interweave in this report some incidents relative to that event, as an example whereby you may judge of the spirit that the Moyamensing people have evinced in missionary efforts.

It was the custom of our junior missionary to attend, as often as opportunity permitted, the prayer meeting in this place, for the purpose of directing the poor, careless immigrant, who had made his escape from the famine in his father-land, to that source whence he might buy spiritual aliment for the nourishment of his soul, without money and without price. By this means he became known to many in this district, some of whom, as soon as they heard that he was about to depart on his long journey, far hence to the heathen, formed a committee for the purpose of preparing a suitable testimonial expressive of the deep interest they felt in the success of this important mission.

Accordingly a subscription paper was got ready and sent around to those most interested in the matter, and the result was, that on Tuesday evening, July 25th, a farewell missionary meeting was held in the Union School-room Hall, in Christian street; at which, after an address had been made by a member of the Sabbath School Association, on behalf of the meeting—Mr. Kane, in the name of the donors, presented Mr. Woodside the following works: Dr. Robinson's Biblical Researches in Palestine, &c., in three volumes, Rollin's Ancient History, in four volumes, Library of English Literature, in two volumes, and Milner's Church History, in two volumes, &c.

In each volume the following inscription was inserted, "Presented to Rev. John Simms Woodside, by the members, friends, and Sabbath school children of the Moyamensing Reformed Presbyterian Mission Church, on the eve of his departure from this land as a missionary to NORTH INDIA, as an expression of their interest in the cause of missions, and especially as a token of respect for himself, as the advocate of their beloved Zion in a heathen land." Also the following texts were added as a motto, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature."—The Saviour. "Be strong and of a good courage; fear not, nor be afraid of them, for the Lord thy God, He it is that doth go with thee, He will not fail thee nor forsake thee."—Moses.

Mr. Woodside, in a most impressive manner, delivered his farewell address; in the course of which, we learn since, he made impressions on the minds of some of his audience that will remain fresh for many years to come, and we doubt not that this address will yet tell well for the interests of both home and foreign missionary enterprise among those who heard it.

Many in this district, at the present time, are watching our proceedings with some degree of interest, and very probably would soon fall in with us, but the want of a suitable place for public worship militates considerably against an increase of numbers, for there are some local circumstances connected with the present place that prevent some from attending; the securing another of course would remove this obstacle.

This section of the city is missionary ground in a peculiar degree, and why will not the church, even our own, come out and take permanent possession of the place? If she does not, some other will, and surely it is not consistent with the character and duty of the church of Christ to be content with a feeble effort, especially when she knows that the various systems of iniquity will encompass sea and land to make one proselyte. If the church at home continues to act in a feeble manner, when will the careless, even in this Christian land be brought in? When will the wandering hundreds of her own baptized, but neglected youths in this city alone be placed within her pale?

The great Head of Zion has said to his servants, "Go out quickly, and compel them to come in;" but how will they go unless they are sent? And does it not devolve upon the church to send these servants forth, and in order to do this efficiently, must she not bring out her resources in an energetic home missionary effort?

Most undoubtedly the Reformed Presbyterian church is at the present time called upon to make this effort, in order that she may fulfil the trust committed to her keeping by her spiritual Head, and in order to support her character and standing among the other Evangelical churches in the field.

It is a poor excuse to say she is not able; we would ask in reply to this thread-bare objection, is she willing? If Christ is her King and Head, what can she not do? For does not "the wealth of Ormus and of Ind," yea, and the cattle upon a thousand hills, belong to Him?

Will the Christian look at the fashionable world spending great sums at the shrines of vanity and amusement, and not be rebuked by a liberality worthy a better cause? If those professing to be followers of Christ were as willing to make great sacrifices for the spread of the gospel as the wicked are to subvert it, what resources would not the church possess!

Who ever heard of the Roman Catholics having to abandon a station for want of means to support it!

Lately there has been an increase to the number of immigrants settling in the vicinity of our field of labour, and we have felt sorry sometimes to see the vacated dwellings of some of our more pious acquaintances filled with those migrating swarms, far more enslaved and degraded by ignorance and superstition than by the oppressive misrule from which they have escaped.

Many of these fear not God, neither honour his holy Sabbath, but most wickedly profane it, and if God prevent not, are ready for the commission of those enormities that Satan or a blinded superstition may dictate.

Though lately you may have heard but little concerning our operations, yet we have acquainted our pastor of all proceedings, and we have not been alone, for he has cheered by visiting us. The young men of the Sabbath school have been with us, and have been labouring with a zeal worthy maturer years; and we hope, too, that the presence of the great Master of assemblies has been with us. His protection must have saved us from the malice of evil men, for while we hear of some who have been cruelly beaten on the Sabbath evening, in the same neighbourhood, yet we have been permitted to pass through unscathed.

There seems to be an awakening among the people who meet on Sabbath evening to call upon the name of the Lord, which we believe is an earnest of what He will do if we faint not. For though many have removed, still our meetings suffer no diminution, either in number or interest. Could you have been present the other Sabbath evening when one of our pastors was with us—had you then sat in that crowded room, and gazed upon the many earnest faces which seemed to hang upon the lips of the speaker, we believe you would have experienced that it was a hallowed hour, a season of refreshment from the Lord, you would have been ready to say, "It is good for us to be here." And we feel assured, if you were acquainted with the manner in which the Sabbath evening is spent in these remote districts, that many more would give their hearty and constant encouragement. We continue to hold the other meetings as when we last reported, every inch of ground gained we endeavour to hold.

Never, at any time since we commenced our labours, have we known so many languishing on beds of sickness as during the last six weeks. We have been careful to visit many of these persons frequently, knowing by experience that generally when the body is laid prostrate by disease, the heart is more easily impressed with the knowledge of divine truth; then too, the mind is more liable to receive with child-like simplicity, counsel and instruction in the requirements of our holy religion. In all our visits to the chamber of sickness, it has been a main object, circumstances permitting, in conversation to direct the mind of the afflicted one to sin as the cause of sickness, to the necessity of a Redeemer to save from the punishment due to us for sin, and the necessity of a sanctified belief in the Lord Jesus Christ, as being able and willing to save all that come unto Him; also the necessity of true repentance, so that we may come unto the Saviour and find acceptance, and the duty of frequent and fervent prayer, &c.

Recently having called upon two of our Sabbath school pupils, who had been some time absent, we found both of their parents very sick. Being struck with the uncomfortable appearance of the place, together with their helpless condition, we inquired in the most delicate manner we could, if nothing could be done for their comfort. The mother replied, you can do much for our comfort. We assured her we were willing to do any thing we could, and desired her to say what she wanted to be done. She said, "We only want you to come often and see us and pray with us while we are sick; that is all." We need hardly state that we were careful to comply with this request, and we found real pleasure in this house of affliction. Both parents are recovering and the boys have returned to school.

We have returned from visiting a family that recently has been plunged in deep distress in consequence of the father having received a paralytic stroke. In a conversation with him, we endeavoured to direct his mind to the fact, that health is the gift of our Heavenly Father, and if he should please to recall it, we in the spirit of Christian resignation, should say, "The Lord hath given, and the Lord hath taken away, blessed be the name of the Lord." But what was our surprise when we found that he denied that God exercised any control over mankind; he even doubted the reality of a God altogether; in short, we found him to be a confirmed infidel, but not violent in the propagation of his corrupt sentiments, as he permitted his children to attend the Sabbath school, and sometimes, previous to his illness, he took charge of the younger children that his wife might attend the preaching in the Hall.

His mind has been corrupted by reading infidel books, and lately by an infidel newspaper published in Boston: he has shown us some numbers of this publication.

We have adverted to these two instances, out of many, as showing in some degree the extremes of that class to which our labours are directed.

Our Sabbath school suffered some diminution in consequence of the warm weather; but we expect it will soon be more flourishing than it ever yet has been, as we now have a tolerable library, and the teachers are faithful and devoted to the work. Praying that God may put it into your hearts to encourage this work, we remain yours,

WM. S. DARRAGH.

CALVIN'S PERSONAL APPEARANCE.—A letter preserved in the Archæological collections of Grenus, gives us a graphic picture of Calvin's personal appearance: "He resembles an old hermit of the Thebaid, emaciated by vigils and fasting, his cheeks colourless as those of a corpse, but his brilliant eye glows with an unearthly fire. His figure slightly bowed, the bones seem bursting through his skin, but his step is steady, and his tread firm."

THE PRESENT STATE OF PALESTINE.

Palestine is a country for which Providence has done every thing; we should say, rather the "Holy Land," that is, Palestine and Syria. We behold her now in the days of her desolation. She is groaning under the yoke of a hard master; and we can form no idea, by what we now see, of what she once was, and of what, we have the strongest assurances, she will again become. Unquestionably, she has no need of foreign aid; she possesses all the germs of greatness within herself, and requires only the genial influence of the Son of Peace to resuscitate her: the once rich plains of Jordan will then look green again, the pastures of Mamre will teem with lowing herds and bleating flocks, and the happy days of Abraham and Isaac will return to bless the industry of man. The shell which produced the Tyrian dye may still be found. Hermon and Tabor are still moistened with the balmy dew of heaven, the plains of Esdraelon and the heights of Carmel are still bedecked with roses; at Shechem, the swarthy Bedouin drinks of the same spring with Jacob, and his great progenitor Abraham, and feeds his flocks, like him, on the flowery banks of Jordan and Tiberias. Then, if we turn to the east and north, the Haouran and Bekaa are still rich in corn. The seven-eared wheat of Egypt, too, is sometimes seen. Lebanon is laden, as heretofore, with luscious fruits and herbs, cedars and stately pines. Mount Cassius is clothed with lofty sycamores and oaks, and other forest trees, from the summit to the waters of the Mediterranean, which sparkle at her base. The finest silk is annually exported from Suedia; and the shelving shores of the Orontes produce gums, cotton, indigo, and sugar, oil, rice, and other grain; there is excellent pasturage for cattle; and the neighbouring districts abound in stone, coal, and iron. In fact, there are the same germs of prosperity and wealth now, as at any former period: the climate is healthy, the diseases few, the seasons are well marked, and there are no fogs; the scenery is the finest that can be conceived; communication with Europe is easy; and the people are talented, hospitable, and brave, and for the most part well disposed: but the country is distracted by political and religious intrigues, which compromise the happiness of the Rayahs, and curtail the resources of the Government.—Dr. Yates' Lecture at the Syro-Egyptian Society of London.

ANECDOTE.—A correspondent of the Wesleyan, a local preacher, relates the following incident, which occurred in England near forty years ago:—

At a local preachers' meeting, where the Rev. Henry Moore presided, a proposal was made to abandon preaching at the village, or rather hamlet of ——. The reasons alleged were, 1. The congregation was very small, generally less than twenty persons. 2. The fare furnished to the preachers was coarse and scanty. 3. The journey embraced full twenty-four miles' walking. The old gentleman was extremely loath to relinquish the place; several persons, however, urged its abandonment; and one local preacher, about forty years of age, was rather obstreperous in his opposition, and hinted to Mr. Moore, "You gentlemen preachers, always stopping at home in large towns, know nothing about it." The venerable chairman became roused, twitching his waistcoat repeatedly, which he was wont to do when excited replied, "Don't I know any thing about it? I don't know any thing about it! I wish you to understand, you boy, I do know something about it. Not long after I entered upon my work, I sometimes knew what hunger was, having travelled all day, preached three or four times, and had no food, except a carrot or turnip by the road-side. Once I borrowed J. B.'s coat, while my own was being patched at the elbows: my board wages were then about half a crown per week. I wrote to Mr. Wesley, detailing my situation, and requesting his help. What was Mr. Wesley's answer?"

"DEAR HENRY,—Unto you it is given in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe in him, but also to suffer for his sake. Take the cup with thankfulness. I am, dear Henry, your affectionate brother, J. WESLEY."

I scarcely need say that we "boys" were hushed into silence: we held to our work as before; and now, in that hamlet, there is a commodious chapel and a flourishing society.

TRUE RELIGION.—'Unless I make religion my great and engrossing concern, shall be a stranger to all solid peace and satisfying enjoyment. I have at times caught a glimpse of the comfort it yields to the spirit—when I merge my will into God's will—when I resolve to have no will of my own separate from God. I feel quite assured that this entire renunciation of self, and entire devotion to God's service, would give a simplicity and grandeur to my existence—would throw an unclouded sunshine over all my ways—would raise me above the cares and provocations of life—would enhance even my sensible gratifications, and superadd those qualifications of a higher order which constitute the main and essential blessedness of heaven. O my God, may it be thus with me. Call me out of nature's darkness into thine own marvellous light.—Give me to aspire after the graces, and hold forth to my acquaintances, and above all to my children, the example of all righteousness. Conform me to the gospel economy under which I sit—that as Christ died for sin, I may die to it—that as he rose again, I may rise to newness of life, and feel it my meat and drink to do thy will.'—Dr. Chalmers.

MINISTERS' SALARIES.—At the meeting of the synod of the Reformed Presbyterian church in Scotland, in May last, an able committee concluded a report upon the subject of raising the stipend or salaries of ministers in weak congregations, by saying.—

“A minister is under, at least, equal obligation with others to provide things honest in the sight of all men—to owe no man any thing, and to provide for his own, especially for those in his own house; and when so straitened in temporalities as to find it almost impossible to do so, it cannot fail to have a depressing influence upon his moral feelings, and to impede his usefulness in a great variety of ways. A measure of comfort in outward circumstances, is essential, in all ordinary cases, to the enjoyment of that buoyancy and elasticity of mind which constitute an important element in the efficient discharge of the functions of the ministerial office. It cannot be doubted, in fact, that other things being equal, a minister whose mind is at ease on this head, will be more efficient in his own proper sphere of labour, and will be able to do more for the general furtherance of the gospel than the brother who is doomed to contend, from day to day, with poverty, which, instead of rousing the nobler energies, like the apostle's perilous, but exciting conflict with the wild beasts at Ephesus, tends to harass and irritate and bedwarf the mind.”

These truths are not confined to Scottish latitudes. They are of universal application. And the congregation, where, through poverty or an undue love of money among the people, an insufficient salary is paid to the minister, and even that irregularly and at long intervals, and sometimes with an apparently grudging spirit, must sooner or later suffer in spiritual leanness, what they compel him and his to endure in temporal. They require sermons to be preached, and visits to be made, and a good appearance in clothing and other matters, to be kept up by him, and these things laboriously demand all his time. He cannot engage in business or lucrative employments. Neither can he neglect the ministry to become a merchant, or mechanic, or farmer, or to mingle in the pursuits of the medical or legal professions. Yet, what shall he do? He has a body to feed, children around him, perhaps, to educate, and some provision to make for the future, and if he attends to any worldly calling, he must neglect his ministerial duties; or, if he attends to the ministry as he ought, and an insufficient salary is given, he will be tormented not only before the time, but all of it. Ought these things so to be? What is more reasonable than “that they who preach the gospel should live of the gospel?” And is it not as reasonable that whatever is done shall be done promptly, steadily, fully, according to the promise in every call to a particular charge, and with the smile and the prayer accompanying it, that will make it, indeed, a blessing?

IMPROVEMENT ON THE STEAM ENGINE.—The Paris correspondent of the Living Age says, that a Frenchman, Boutigny, asserts, from numerous experiments, the existence, before unknown, of a "fourth" physical state of bodies, different from the solid, liquid and gaseous, and to which he attaches the epithet "spherodical." He attempts to explain, by means of the spherodical state which water assumes in over-heated boilers, "those fulminating explosions of which the occult unknown cause frustrates all the precautions taken to prevent those formidable phenomena."

He conceived that water in a spherodical state, could be employed at once, as a precious auxiliary on board steam vessels, and that, by its agency in this way, the power of machines might be doubled momentarily, and this without any change in the present form of the engines. He thinks he has invented a new and precious "moteur," and he averts all danger of explosion.

A skilful engineer has constructed for him, on the principle of his discovery, an engine of one horse power, of which the size of the boiler is not larger than may be easily put in the pocket; two other engines, one of two horse power and another of four, are being built in Paris; a third, of four hundred horse power, is about to be constructed in England. The quantity of coal used in a given time for a given purpose, will be less than in the old engines; the new will occupy less space in vessels—leaving more for passengers and merchandise; and they may be adapted perfectly to vehicles running on ordinary roads. Boutigny adds, that the experiments with the engines, so far, are entirely satisfactory and conclusive.

A NEW ARTICLE OF FOOD.—Flandin, a chemist of the first order, has found a means of depriving the flour and fecula of the horse-chestnut, of its bitter, so as to render them excellent food; it comes nearest to wheat in the quantity and quality of the nutritive principle. The method is simple and cheap. The pulp of the chestnut is reduced to flour, or the fecula is extracted; then carbonate of soda is added in the proportion of 1 or 1 1-2 to the 100. Thus a hundred and twenty or one hundred and eighty pounds of flour, with the addition of two pounds of carbonate of soda, becomes, after being washed with cold water, perfectly good aliment. The carbonate costs only a few cents the pound. The flour is rich in fecula. Mr. Flandin observes, that a horse-chestnut tree planted at the door of a peasant, represents for him the value of a field of potatoes.

It would be superfluous to dwell on the economical value of such a discovery. The horse-chestnut is a most abundant product, easy to gather, impervious for insects, and capable of being preserved a long time. The crops of many years may be accumulated in a very dry furrow, and form a precious and exuberant supply in years of bad harvest such as the last.

ANTIDOTE TO POISON.—A correspondent of the London Literary Gazette, alluding to the numerous cases of death from accidental poisoning, and particularly the melancholy fate of the late royal academician, Mr. Owen, adds:—

"I may venture to affirm there is scarce even a cottage in this country, that does not contain an invaluable, certain, and immediate remedy for such events—nothing more than a dessert-spoonful of made mustard, mixed in a tumbler glass of warm water, and drank immediately. It acts as an instantaneous emetic, is always ready, and may be used with safety in any case where one is required. By making this simple antidote known, you may be the means of saving many a fellow-creature from an untimely end."

MEMORY.—The great point in cultivating the memory is to gain command of the attention. A habit of continued, unrelaxing attention, especially if acquired in early years, is the foundation of a good memory. A habit of attentive thought is better than all the artificial memory ever contrived. To the formation of such a habit, sufficient efforts have not often been directed. Therefore it is that we hear many persons complaining of the want of memory. They cannot remember the lectures, sermons and addresses which they hear, nor the books which they read. All seem to run through their minds, like water through a sieve. They are entertained, and even edified, they would say, but ask them to state what it was that entertained them they cannot tell. Close attention, or rather persevering effort to give close attention will help even such a memory. The too common practice is to attempt to fill the storehouse of the memory before a foundation is laid, or a habit of attentive thought is formed.

IDOL KANNAPPEN.

Our young readers may see by this engraving (for the use of which we are indebted to the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions) a representation of one of the idols which are worshipped in India. The inhabitants of that land "know not God, nor obey his gospel." Our Missionaries have gone to preach to these people, and to distribute the Scriptures and Tracts among them. It will take only about ten cents to get a Testament for some one of these poor perishing heathen. Who will give that much for this purpose? Little reader, will not you?

LITTLE NANNETTE.*

LITTLE NANNETTE was only three years old when she loved to think of God, and to hear of Jesus Christ. As she walked by her mother's side she used to say, "God made those flowers and trees;" and when she looked up to the stars in the sky, and to the bright moon, she used to say, "God made them." When she heard that the Lord Jesus Christ died upon the cross to save us from hell, she said to her mother, "I will love him and try to serve him." Perhaps it was this wish that made her pray; for before she was four years old she often left her play in the house or in the garden, that she might kneel down and pray. And though at first she could not say much, she soon learned to pray about every thing; and thought that God would give her, for Christ's sake, all that she asked for, if it was good for her. And so he will to every little child who prays, for Jesus has said, "If ye shall ask any thing in my name, I will do it." Nothing pleased her so much as to hear her mother tell her about God; and when they were quite alone she used to say, "Come now, mamma, we shall be so happy, and talk of God." And when others did not talk of him, she loved to think of him, and often said, when any thing made her happy or pleased her, "O how good the Lord is."

Like other pious children, she was very fond of her parents. When her father was away she counted the hours till he would come back; and if he stayed away beyond her bed-time, she sometimes left a little letter to be given to him. When her mother went from home, Nannette always said, "Good bye, mamma, God bless you and take care of you, and bring you safe home." When her mother was gone, she often prayed that God would bring her back soon, and when her mother came home, she was almost always watching for her. Once her mother was very ill, and little Nannette could not see her very often. This she was very sorry for, yet when she did come into her mother's room, and was put upon her bed, and had given her so many kisses, and wished so much to stay, still she said, "I had better go now, mamma, I am afraid of tiring you." As she was so good a child, through the grace of God, this made her happy. She loved to jump, and run, and play, and climb with her brother; and often she made her father put her in the cherry tree, where she loved to sit like a little squirrel, perched among the boughs. Yet though God made her so happy, she could feel for others. When it rained, or when it was cold, she used to grieve to think how many had not got a nice warm home as she had; and if she saw any child half naked, she would take some of her clothing to her mother, and beg that she might give them to the poor child. God loves us to feel for the poor, and to give them what we can spare, instead of wasting it on toys and trash.

Before she was four years old, she began to pray daily in the middle of the day, as well as morning and night; and from the age of three she always wished to have a psalm read, or a hymn sung to her, after she was in bed. Before she was five, she had the measles, and they left her weak and thin, so that she could not jump and play as she did before. Six months after this came the whooping-cough, and that made her much worse, but she still grew in grace. How sweet it must have been to her mother to hear her say, "You know, mamma, it is the will of God: we can't help it, and must bear it as well as we can." She did not like the medicine, but she prayed God to help her to take it like a good child, and to bless it to her, and then she took it.

She had now lost all her strength, and could not play or laugh as she once had done; her brother could not amuse her now, nor could her play-things: yet she was happy, because she loved to pray and read the Bible, and sing hymns, more than she had ever loved her play-things or her games. When she sung any hymn, she often put words of her own, besides those which were in the hymn. One day the curtain was drawn between her and her mother, so that her mother could write down what she sung without being seen. In a sweet, loud voice this dear child then sung thus her own thoughts of praise, "Serve the Lord, all ye people: praise him for the Saviour: you would have gone to hell if he had not died for you on the cross. O, Jesus—O, Jesus, come for me, bless, and take me. O, Jesus, my Lord, let me to thy bosom fly. It would be the happiest place I could be in, to praise the Lord for ever. O, my Saviour, come and take me to thy dwelling! O thou who canst save every one from sin who cleaves to thee!"

Often, too, she said to her mother, "How I long to see God! O, if I could see Jesus Christ, for I feel to love him very much, the way I love you, mamma. Do you think he will let me lay my head in his bosom, the way I sit with you?" Often she wished to die, that she might be with him. And when her father said, "Should you like to leave mamma and me to go?" she burst into tears at the thought of leaving them, but still she said, "Yes." She loved her father so much, that she could not bear him to be long away. If her mother was away from her for a few minutes, she wished her to come back; if the curtain hid her, she wished her to come round to the other side of the bed, that she might always see her; she loved to hold her mother's hands, and to kiss them; yet when they asked her whether she was willing to go to Jesus, she said, "Yes." She loved her parents and her home on earth much, but she loved the Saviour and her home in heaven more. Heaven is happier than earth. She was very fond of hymns, and said them over and over to herself whilst she was at her play or at work. Often her mother saw her, when she did not know that any one was looking at her, lift up her eyes to heaven, and sing in her own words, "O, Lord, my God, my Father." Often, too, when she was too weak to kneel, she sat in her mother's lap, and prayed for herself, for her brother, for her family, and for the heathen. She was a very little girl, and her prayers were very simple; but God loves to hear even little children pray. Some of her words which her mother wrote down were these: "O, Lord, my God, my Father, I am not good enough to call thee Father, yet thou wilt make me complete in Christ Jesus, and hast a crown for me. O my God, bless my brothers; may they have crowns: let there be a crown for my mother. O my God, thou art a long-suffering God. Make me meek and holy, like the gentle Lamb of God in heaven."

It was not long before she grew more thin and weak, and her mother told her she would soon be in heaven. It did not make her sad to think that she must die; but she said, "O, I am glad of it, there is no more pain or sorrow there." In that blessed place she now is, with Jesus Christ, and with other pious children who loved him as she did: and we must get ready to go there too. She was only five years and five months old when she died. And if you, dear children, are older than that, you ought to know the Saviour better than she did, and to love him better.—Rev. Baptist Noel.

A BOY WITH A SHORT MEMORY.—A good deacon returning from church one Sabbath afternoon, was accosted by a man:—"Sir, did you see a boy on the road driving a cart, with a bag of cotton in it?" "I think I did," said the deacon musingly, "a boy with a short memory, was'nt he?" The man looked confused, and said, "Why do you think he has a short memory, sir?" The deacon seemed to enjoy his confusion, and even determined to increase it. "I think so; and I think, moreover, that he must belong to a family that have short memories." "What in the world makes you say that?" said the man, more than ever perplexed. "Why, simply this," said the old gentleman, assuming all of a sudden a very grave and solemn manner, "because God Almighty has proclaimed from Mount Sinai, in a most solemn manner, among other things, 'Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy;' and that boy has forgotten all about it. His memory must be very short indeed—very."

GEN. GEORGE WASHINGTON, when quite young, was about to go to sea as a midshipman; every thing was arranged, the vessel lay opposite his father's house, the little boat came on shore to take him off, and his whole heart was bent on going. After his trunk had been carried down to the boat, he went to bid his mother farewell, and saw the tears bursting from her eyes. However, he said nothing to her, but he saw that his mother would be distressed if he went, and perhaps never be happy again. He just turned round to the servant and said, "Go and tell them to fetch my trunk back. I will not go away to break my mother's heart." His mother was struck with his decision, and she said to him, "George, God has promised to bless the children that honour their parents, and I believe he will bless you."

HAPPINESS.

"Happiness, thou lovely name,
Where's thy seat, oh, tell me, where?
Learning, Pleasure, Wealth, and Fame
All cry out—'It is not here.'
Not the wisdom of the wise
Can inform me where it lies;
Nor the grandeur of the great
Can the bliss I seek create.

"Object of my first desire,
Jesus, crucified for me!
All to happiness aspire,
Only to be found in Thee!

Thee to praise, and Thee to know,
Constitute our bliss below;
Thee to see, and Thee to love,
Constitute our bliss above.

"Lord, it is not life to live,
If Thy presence Thou deny;
Lord, if Thou Thy presence give,
'Tis no longer death to die;
Source and giver of repose,
Singly from Thy smile it flows;
Peace and happiness are Thine—
Mine they are, if Thou art mine."

The Family Circle.

WHERE THEY LEARN IT.

"I don't see where my children learn such things," is one of the most common phrases in a mother's vocabulary. A little incident, which we happened to be an eye-witness to, may perhaps help to solve the enigma. We smiled a little at the time, but we have thought a good deal of it since, and we trust not without profit.

"Bub," screamed out a little bright-eyed girl, somewhat under six years of age, to a youngster who was seated on the curbstone, making hasty-pudding of the mud in the gutter, "Bub, you good-for-nothing little scamp, you, come right into the house this minute, or I'll beat you till the skin comes off!"

"Why, Angelina, Angelina, dear, what do you mean? where did you learn such talk?" exclaimed her mother, in a wondering tone, as she stood on the steps, courtesying to a friend.

Angelina looked up very innocently, and answered, "Why, mother, you see we are playing, and he's my little boy, and I am scolding him, just as you did me this morning; that's all."

HUSBANDS AND WIVES.—When people understand that they must live together, they learn to soften, by mutual accommodation, the yoke which they know they cannot shake off. They become good husbands and good wives, from the necessity of remaining husbands and wives; for necessity is a powerful master in teaching the duty which it imposes. If it were once understood that upon mutual disgust married persons might be legally separated, many couples which now pass through the world with mutual comfort, with attention to their common offspring, and to the moral order of civil society, might have been at this moment living in a state of mutual unkindness, in a state of estrangement from their common offspring, and in a state of unreserved immorality. To be sure, if persons come together in marriage with the extravagant expectation that they are to be halcyon days, the husband conceiving that all is to be authority with him, the wife that all is to be accommodation to her; every body sees how that must end: but if they come together with a prospect of happiness, they must come with the reflection that not bringing perfection in themselves, they have no right to expect it on the other side; that, having respectively many infirmities of their own to be overlooked, they must overlook the infirmities of each other.—LORD STOWELL.

The Sabbath School.

"I CANNOT LEAVE MY CLASS."—So said a young lady, when urged to spend the Sabbath with some friends she was visiting, a few miles from home. "I should be happy to stay with you, but I cannot leave my Sabbath school class."

"Will not the superintendent find them a teacher just for one Sabbath, when he sees you are not there?" asked her friends as they continued to press her to prolong her visit.—"It is so long since you have been here we cannot consent to your leaving us to-night."

"O, yes, a teacher might be found readily, but I said nothing to them last Sabbath of a possibility of my being absent, and they will feel disappointed if I am not there."

"There seems now a prospect of a rainy day to-morrow. If so, your class will not be there. I think you had better stay, if that is all that requires your return," remarked an elderly lady present.

"A rain will make no difference," replied Miss R.; "my little girls are always there unless sick. Besides, I promised to explain to them to-morrow some allusion to ancient Eastern usages, which they did not understand, by reading some descriptions from the Bible Dictionary. I thank you; I should love to be with you, but I must go to-night."

"The friend ceased to urge her; but while they admired her devotedness to the Sabbath School, they could not forbear still asking, "Do you never allow yourself to be absent from home on the Sabbath?"

"Never, on ordinary occasions," she answered: "if a long journey, or any thing (sickness excepted,) demanded my absence, I endeavour to make arrangement previously, so that no interruption or disappointment need occur in my class. They are so punctual themselves, I certainly should be so too."

Happy little girls! to be blessed with the instructions of such a teacher; and happy teacher too! who may place such confidence in the punctual attendance and unabated interest of her pupils.

Another young lady, a devoted teacher in the same flourishing Sabbath School, was engaged in teaching a day school through the week, and as she could not then leave home, was invited to spend a Sabbath with the same friends, a few miles distant. "No," she replied, "I must be at home on the Sabbath. I have a class in the Sabbath school, you know, and they will not like to have me away, but I shall have a short vacation during the week soon, when I intend to visit you; till then, I must defer it."

Need we wonder that the school was interesting and flourishing, when no weather would detain its pupils, and even the claims of kindred and affection could not induce its teachers to absent themselves for a day from their Sabbath classes?

There is another Sabbath school. Its number, unlike the former, is small, very small, compared with the number of children and youth living within its borders, and sometimes it is very difficult to find teachers ready to engage in the work with their whole heart and soul. Even the duties of the superintendent are thought by some, who are well qualified for the work, to be arduous and wearisome.

Can such expect the Sabbath school will be a delight, a "nursery of the Church," a place to which the youth will rejoice to repair in all weather, and under all circumstances? Is there no fault either among the pupils? Can their teachers always say of them, "The rain will make no difference; they will be there unless prevented by sickness?" Do you, my dear readers, do all in your power to render the Sabbath School, of which you are, or should be, a member, as interesting and useful as possible!—Well Spring.

PALESTINE MISSION.

It will be gratifying to our readers to learn from the following statement that the missionaries of the Western Synods of the Associate Reformed Church have been mercifully preserved to prosecute the good work in which they are employed.—Ed.

Our missionaries at Damascus have again been heard from by their friends, by a letter dated August 29th, and that they had so far enjoyed health, and that the pestilence was abating. As many as one thousand had died in a day in the city of Damascus. More than one-tenth of the population had been swept away by this devastating scourge. The missionaries write, that literally, "a thousand had fallen at their side, and ten thousand at their right hand, but it did not come nigh them." For this their preservation we should be thankful; and our prayer should be to Him who controls and overrules all events, and is the source of all influence, not only that their lives should still be preserved, but that this calamity should be overruled so as to be the means of weaning this people from their superstition, and of turning their eyes to Him who says, "Look unto me, all ye ends of the earth, and be ye saved; for I am God, and there is none else." The disease was much more fatal among the Mahomedans, in consequence of their being engaged in the observance of their Rammadan, than with any other class of the population; so much so, that the Mahomedans acknowledged it themselves. In Aleppo the festival was suspended by authority.

The Irish Mission is entirely broken up. This renders the immediate re-enforcement of our mission an imperative duty. Will it not be laid to heart?

CHRISTIANS IN THE HOLY LAND.

Lieut. Lynch, in a letter to the Union, giving an account of his expedition, makes mention that on the coast of Moab, he was surprised by a deputation of Christians from Kerak, the Keijath of the Bible. He says:

The joy of this people at meeting us was unbounded. They caressed us, brought us water and leban (sour milk,) all they had, and some of them spent nearly the whole night hunting a wild boar, wherewith to regale us. When told that our forms of worship in America were different from theirs, they replied: "What matters it? Christ died for all! Do you not believe in Him?" When told that we did, they said: "Then what are forms before God! He looks to the heart! We are brothers!" And brothers they continued to call us to the last.

We could not trace their origin, but concluded that they are either the descendants of one of the lost tribes converted to Christianity, who in the fastnesses of the mountains, had escaped the Mohammedan alternative of "the Koran or the sword," or the crusaders under the Christian Lord of Kerak. They number about one hundred and fifty families, and live in the town—the only one now left in the once populous country of Moab. Within the walls are also the huts of one hundred Muslim families, and outside are the black tents of the fierce tribe Kera-Keyeh, numbering about seven hundred and fifty fighting men.

These poor Christians are much tyrannized over by their Muslim neighbours.

The object of all their hopes is to build a church sufficiently large to hold all their wives and children; for, with all their intolerance, the Muslims respect the house of Him whom they call "Issa, the Prophet of the Christians."

The foundation and a part of the walls of a church have been built, but the work is discontinued from the want of means—the sirocco and the locust having swept their harvests for several years. They gave me an appeal to their Christian brethren in America, which I promised to deliver.

SANDWICH ISLANDS.—The general letter of the Sandwich Islands' mission had been received, and contains a far more favourable account of things than could have been anticipated. An unusual interest in religion exists at almost all the stations. The number admitted to the church on profession during the last two years is two thousand two hundred and fifty-nine. The whole number of communicants in regular standing, is twenty-three thousand eight hundred and forty-six.

In Christian liberality the Sandwich Islanders seem to be rapidly advancing; and the contributions for benevolent purposes during the last two years are far in advance of former years.

The school for missionary children at Punahou has prospered greatly; quite a number of the children have made a public profession of religion, and others indulge a hope; some are looking forward to the gospel ministry.

The cause of temperance seems to be progressing steadily, and the nation might fitly be styled one great temperance country. In the opinion of the missionaries, Papacy is on the decline, though the number of labourers on the islands is thirty-one.

Domestic Missions.

NOVA SCOTIA.

By the following extract from a letter from Mr. Gordon our readers will learn the present condition of this interesting and very promising mission. The letter is dated Amherst, December 4th, 1848.

Since my arrival in this Province, my labours have been crowned with success. I have embraced every opportunity afforded of presenting the truth as it is in Jesus, and I find now that Reformed Presbyterian principles can be exhibited through this entire county (of Cumberland,) a distance of one hundred and sixty miles, without much opposition, had we but help. Since my arrival, there are three new stations that have asked for preaching, equally as flourishing and as able to support the gospel as the ones we already occupy; but Mr. C. or I can scarcely attend to the old ones. The plain fact is, we cannot keep up the labour of the stations in a proper way without more aid.

Oh! if some of our Theological Students could see the intense anxiety manifested by those who are far from the land of their birth for a pure gospel, I am sure a Christian sympathy would be created in their breast. Why are they dedicating themselves for that sacred office, but to further the cause of Christ? And is any man so blind as to think, if he devotes himself for this, he can live a life of ease and worldly pleasure? No: Moses chose rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to be called the son of a king's daughter; and so it is with the gospel minister: all difficulties vanish before his burning love for the cause of Christ. He looks for his reward beyond this world, to that place where sorrow and sighing shall flee away. And, I am sure, that others who have the religion of Jesus at heart, would contribute a mite of their worldly substance to sustain them. What have we that is not the Lord's; the gold and the silver are his.¶

There are now ten very promising stations which our Synod could take under her wings. Had we men here of the right stamp, and we want none other, it is one of the cheapest missions ever our church embarked in; and no mission would bring more sterling soldiers into the ranks, if cultivated.

Always being impressed with the use of good schools to train children for the church, I am now giving my attention to getting a Sabbath School Association at every station. I have commenced at two already; it meets the cordial approbation of all sects. Mr. M. of New York, has generously offered the foundation of a library for one. The children here are wonderfully anxious for instruction, and they are most shrewd and intelligent for their opportunities. I have attended a class where small children came in the bitterest weather seven miles to get about an hour's instruction, and these did not belong to us. Two small children in these classes, the one nine, the other eleven years only, attended a few months, and they could answer most of the leading questions on Genesis and Exodus.

IRISH REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

[Concluded.]

REV. DR. PAUL.

The following resolutions were adopted in regard to the late Dr. Paul. The high eulogy they express is not higher than he deserved. Our readers will doubtless remember the account of his death-bed in our July No. He was indeed "a Prince and a great man in Israel."

I. That this Synod feel called upon to record their deep sense of the bereavement they have sustained by the death of their late highly esteemed and beloved father in the ministry, Dr. Paul. The advantages to this Synod, to the church with which we are connected, and to all the sections of the church of Christ, resulting from the labours of Dr. Paul, cannot well be overrated. His efforts for promoting the glory of his Divine Redeemer, and the advancement of His cause on the earth, were numerous and arduous, and they were greatly blessed. Eminently fitted by a mind of giant power, by attainments at once varied and extensive, and by a heart full of love to God, and sympathy with perishing mortals, for being a burning and a shining light, he dedicated all his acquirements to the one great absorbing object of winning souls to the Lord Jesus Christ. He delighted in expounding the way of God fully; and while eminently fitted by his intellectual power—his moral character—and the endearing amiability of his disposition to turn sinners from the evil of their ways, and to build up believers in their most holy faith—he was especially "set for the defence of the gospel." In this department of duty, his labours have been most persevering and most successful. He was honoured of God, above most of his age, in making a successful stand against the errors that threatened to overturn the foundation or destroy the spirit of the Christian religion. His labours will long be regarded as a bulwark of evangelical Christianity, and succeeding generations will cherish his name as savoury, because of his triumphant vindication of civil and religious liberty.

II. Synod feel called upon to record their gratitude to the church's Lord for sparing to a good old age his eminently useful life, and giving to his work of faith and labour of love so much success. They feel more consoled for his loss by the evidence furnished from his exemplary life and his triumphant death, that to him "to live was Christ and to die was gain."

III. Synod take leave to recommend to all the brethren in the church the consideration of some more substantial way of testifying their regard to the memory of the late Dr. Paul, and their sympathy with his bereaved family.

In regard to the suggestion in the last of these resolutions, it was finally concluded that it would be best effected by an edition of his works, under the supervision of the Rev. Dr. Bates, of Glasgow, his son-in-law. We earnestly hope that this proposal will be acceded to by Dr. Bates.

The Sustentation Fund.

The report of the general committee having charge of this fund was approved by the Synod, and thanks were tendered to Rev. J. Nevin, Messrs. John M'Vicker and Hugh Small, for their services in regard to it. Mr. Nevin was re-appointed to act as an agent for it during the succeeding six months. It appears that Mr. N. has expressed the intention of emigrating to this country, and while we would regret the loss of his valuable services to the Church in Ireland, we can assure him of a cordial welcome, should he make this land his future home.

The next meeting of the Synod is to be held in Cullybackey, on the 3d Tuesday of July, 1849.

SCOTTISH REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

We are pleased to find that our brethren in Scotland are maintaining their former honourable position, and that they appear to be instrumental in doing much good. The following extracts from the minutes of their last meeting will give a view of their present condition:

The meeting was held in Glasgow, commencing May 1st.

Church Records. The committee on this subject have been continuing their labours with considerable success. We are glad to find an effort made to preserve the documents which relate to the early history of our church, and we hope at some time they may be made accessible to the public through the press.

The Expostulation on Slavery. The Convener of the Committee on American Slavery reports, that the Remonstrance they were appointed to draw up has been prepared; that 1000 copies have been printed for circulation in Scotland, and that nearly 100 more have been addressed to parties in the United States. Measures have been taken to secure it as wide a circulation as possible in that country, as well among those who are friendly to the rights of the slave, as among those who are implicated in the enormous evils of slaveholding.

Civil relations. It appears by the following extract that the subject of their relationship to the British government has been brought before the Synod. "A petition from some members of the congregation of Darvel, on the subject of petitioning the House of Commons, is received and read. The Commissioners, Mr. James Mair and Mr. Wilson Paterson, are heard. After reasoning, it is unanimously agreed to, that, in the estimation of this Court, the mere fact of petitioning the House of Commons does not compromise the principles of this Church, on the subject of the British government; that the Presbytery of Kilmarnock be instructed to consider whether the state of matters in the congregation of Darvel requires any step being taken by them, and act accordingly; also, that if it be necessary, the Professor and Dr. Bates be appointed to hold a personal conference with the petitioners, with the view of bringing them to act in harmony with the deliverance of Synod."

Cheap Publications. We published in our February No. the prospectus of the Cheap Publication scheme. We are happy to find that about 3000 copies are expected to be required in Scotland, and we hope that a large number will be circulated in this country. The work is not yet written, but is to be prepared as soon as possible.

Presbyterial visitation. The following draught of regulations on this subject was unanimously approved of:

1. That a deputation, consisting of at least two ministers, shall meet with the minister and elders of each congregation, and enter into a full and friendly conversation on the state of the congregation, and on the best means of promoting its prosperity.

2. That they shall also meet with the managers and deacons, and frankly confer with them on the duties of their office, giving them such counsels, and propounding such plans, in connexion with their peculiar sphere of usefulness, as may tend to advance the interests of the congregation.

3. That they shall likewise meet with the congregation, and engage with them in devotional exercises, and address them on such subjects as are calculated to produce a just sense of their Christian privileges and obligations, and to promote their spiritual and eternal interests.

4. That in order to facilitate the friendly conversation recommended above, and to lay the foundation for a report to the Presbytery, information be asked from the Session on the following subjects: 1. The number of members in the congregation. 2. The ordinary attendance on public worship. 3. The number of elders. 4. Whether the elders have districts assigned them. 5. How often the meetings of Session are held, and if the minutes are regularly kept. 6. How often the congregation receives visitation from the minister and elders. 7. Whether diets of examination are regularly held, and how they are attended. 8. How many prayer-meetings there are in the congregation, and how they are attended. 9. Whether there are Sabbath schools, or Sabbath or week-day classes for young people. 10. Whether there is a library connected with the congregation. 11. What are the most prevailing sins in the district, and in regard to which the discipline of the church needs most frequently to be exercised. 12. Whether any means are employed, besides the usual services of the Lord's day, and those already specified, for the benefit of the congregation, or of the surrounding district; and what these are. 13. Whether the publications connected with the church are generally read, and what means are used to promote their circulation.

And that information be asked from the managers and deacons on such subjects as the following: 1. What the pecuniary liabilities of the congregation are. 2. Whether they are able to meet them all. 3. What the annual pecuniary income of the congregation is. 4. What means are resorted to for securing the requisite funds—whether seat rents, or public collections, or subscriptions, or all these together. 5. What the congregation collects in behalf of missions, and how this fund is raised. 6. Whether any provision be made for the poor of the congregation. 7. Whether they, the managers and deacons, hold regular meetings, and keep regular minutes of their proceedings.

5. That in order to accomplish the visitation with the greatest possible convenience and efficiency, a letter be addressed to the minister and session, and one to the managers, at least ten days previous to the visit of the deputation, requesting them to be prepared respectively with information on the foregoing topics.

6. That the reports of the deputations be given in to the Presbytery at its meeting in April; and that the Presbytery shall, in connexion with said reports, consider the state of religion in the congregations under their charge, and the best means for its revival and advancement; and that they shall prepare a report on the whole matter, to be submitted yearly to the Synod.

7. That at the meeting with the various congregations, a collection shall be made for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the deputations, the amount of which shall, in each case, be forwarded to the Presbytery's treasurer."

We would be glad to find Presbyterian visitations introduced in our church in this country—they would tend to prevent many and great evils, and to produce much good.

Foreign Missions. Dr. Bates read the Report of the Synod's Committee on Foreign Missions. The Rev. James Mc'Lachlan prosecutes his work at Perth and Carlton, in Canada West, as usual, making occasional tours to destitute localities. The Rev. John Mc'Lachlan has been labouring with much acceptance at Toronto, as well as at Galt and Guelph. The people in Toronto and its vicinity are anxious to secure a constant supply of ordinances, could another missionary be found to occupy the stations to the westward. The Societies at Oneida, Hamilton, Ayr, Galt, and Guelph, would still be inadequately supplied, although another missionary was sent to that district. The brethren, Duncan and Inglis, have been residing at Wellington, New Zealand, since May, 1847. The difficulties attending their Mission on the Manawatu appeared to them insuperable. The Synod were of opinion that the missionaries should be encouraged to look out for some other sphere of labour, either in New Zealand or in Polynesia. It was unanimously agreed that the Report be received, and the Committee re-appointed. The mind of the brethren in Synod was expressed on a few specific points, and the whole case assigned to the direction of the Committee, while the subject was again commended to the earnest prayers of the whole church, that the exalted Messiah may give light and direction both to our missionaries and to the Committee.

Union with the original Seceders. A "Minute of the joint Committee of the original Secession and Reformed Presbyterian Synods," and a series of "Propositions," which have, for some time, been under the consideration of the Committee, having been laid before the Synod, and members having expressed the pleasure they have derived from intercourse with their Secession brethren, the Court are much gratified in learning that a friendly and fraternal spirit has pervaded the meetings that have been held, and that some progress has been made towards an agreement on those points upon which the two churches have hitherto appeared to differ. Encouraged by these auspicious circumstances, and hoping that the brotherly conferences which may yet be held, "may tend ultimately to a mutual agreement," this Synod re-appoint their Committee.

Next meeting to be held in Glasgow, 1st Monday of May, 1849.

Editorial.

A NEW YEAR.

We have now commenced a new year ; and it should be a matter of serious reflection how we may avoid repeating the errors of the past, and spend the remainder of our lives, whether much or little, in the service of our God. Shall time, as it passes over us so rapidly, witness no improvement in our characters ; or shall it only tend to confirm and strengthen sinful dispositions, making us more careless about doing evil, and less diligent in doing good ? They who know themselves best, know most, and lament most, their imperfections and errors, and are, therefore, most likely to correct them. Let us commune with our hearts,—let us candidly review our conduct,—let us acknowledge past failures, and resolve, and endeavour, depending on Divine grace alone, that the present year shall witness an improvement. Thus we will be happier in our own feelings, do more for the benefit of our fellow-men, and enjoy more of the Divine favour.

THE GOLD FEVER.

For a short time past, the public mind has been excited by the wonderful accounts received from California, announcing the discovery in that region of immense quantities of gold. Multitudes of individuals, of all classes and occupations, have been induced to hasten to this El Dorado, which seems to have realized the stories of the old voyagers. Family ties, social responsibilities, present comfort and enjoyment, all seem to be disregarded, and the adventurers, confident of obtaining in a very short time immense riches, set out on their long, dangerous and uncomfortable journey. In view of the manner in which they act, we cannot but be led to reflect on the indifference which mankind generally entertain in regard to those spiritual blessings which are so much more valuable than any, or than all, of earth's treasures. How much more certain is the prospect of obtaining and enjoying the happiness of heaven, and how much more excellent is it, than any thing which California offers ? Yet how few of those who are seeking the latter, would make efforts any thing like equal to gain the former. And when we consider that the professing Christian hears so often of the durable riches reserved for the true believer in heaven, how wonderful is it that such tidings occupy so little of his thoughts, and command so small a portion of his exertions ? How much "wiser are the children of this world in their generation than the children of light." The true disciple of the Saviour will count all things loss to win Christ ; it will be his care not to be laying up treasure upon earth, but to be becoming rich in faith towards God. The possessions of this world will have but little value in his view, because he has in heaven a better and far more enduring substance.

PRESBYTERIAL VISITATION.

By referring to the proceedings of the Reformed Presbyterian Synod in Scotland, published in our present number, our readers will find a plan for Presbyterian Visitation, to which we would call particular attention. We believe that great good may be done by adopting in our own church this old practice, which has in most of our presbyteries, if not all, become entirely neglected. The details of the plan pursued would probably need modification in some respects, but we hope that some such system may be carried into operation. The subject is worthy of the consideration of our presbyteries, and we hope will not be overlooked or disregarded at their next meetings.

NOVA SCOTIA.

It will be gratifying to the numerous friends of Mr. Clarke to learn that he reached home in safety, and found that the mission stations under his care had been well supplied during his absence, by his zealous and able coadjutor, Mr. Gordon. In another part of this No. may be found an extract of a communication from Mr. Gordon, by which the encouraging prospects of the Nova Scotia mission may be ascertained. Mr. Gordon is desirous to establish Sabbath schools throughout the field where he labours, and to supply them with libraries. Ten dollars will procure a collection of one hundred excellent volumes. Will not our readers give him assistance in this good effort?

Notices of New Publications.

Home Life. Am. S. School Union. pp. 126. 18mo.

This volume contains a collection of tales, explaining and enforcing correct principles in regard to ordinary life. The views of the young are frequently tinged with a kind of romance, which often greatly misleads them. It is of vast importance that they should acquire the habit of acting from the influence of a sound judgment, controlled and modified by that love which the gospel requires, and the grace of God in the heart produces. In regard to these points, the tendency of this work is excellent.

Why?—Revenge.—Mary Boyd. Am. S. S. Union. pp. 24, 23, 35.

These little books are well suited to the young. The first shows the folly of the principle on which some parents act of giving a reason for every thing they require of their children. The second is an illustration of the nature and sinfulness of revenge. The third is a very pleasing memoir of a lovely child, who was called away at an early age, having given satisfactory evidences of a renewed heart. We can fully recommend them all.

A Discussion of the Order of the Sons of Temperance, between Rev. W. R. De Witt, D.D., and Rev. W. Easton, Smyrna, Pa. Philadelphia. T. R. Simpson. 12mo. pp. 278.

Some time since, we called the attention of our readers to this work, but we consider it worthy of another notice. The subject to which it refers is one of much practical importance, and especially in our cities and villages, where the societies of the Sons of Temperance are so numerous. The discussion, on the part of Mr. Easton, is searching and thorough, although we think the language employed is sometimes injudicious, being calculated by its severity to repel or irritate those whom he would desire to convert to his opinions. But we are sure that those who will read his observations will find much reason to question the advantage or propriety of such organizations, while we would admit that their object may be proper, and that they have in many cases effected much good. But we hope our readers will procure the work and read it for themselves. It is for sale by Mr. W. S. Young, at thirty-seven and a-half cents bound, and thirty cents in paper covers.

Theological Discussions.

AN ESSAY ON PEACE AND WAR.

The gospel, the good news and tidings of salvation, is a proclamation of peace on earth and good will towards men. The great comprehensive blessing of God's everlasting covenant is represented by peace being on Israel. War is the opposite of peace, and the cause of it must be opposed to the gospel of Christ. It is not our intention to vindicate war as being lawful any other way but as a defence of injured rights. War is caused by an outrage upon the rights of man, and they who give the offence are never innocent. On one side, at least, war is always unlawful, often on both. It, in every case, originates in injustice and crime. Defensive war alone is justifiable. And it matters not which of the parties makes the declaration of war. The injured party alone is on the defensive. In legal technicality, the man who has injured another and is sued for it, is called the defendant, while the injured party is the true defendant seeking redress and defending himself against injury. Still war is wicked, but it is in the offending party.

But it is said that even defence itself is contrary to the mild spirit of the gospel and the precepts of Jesus Christ, that all human governments are unlawful, and are neither to be acknowledged nor resisted. In short, that non-resistance, and patient endurance of all injuries without seeking any redress, is the very spirit and doctrine of the gospel. To this we cannot subscribe for the following reasons.

1. Because it would set the gospel in opposition to the law of nations, which is the moral law, emanating from the holy nature of God, and suited to the holy nature in which man was created, and on which this law was impressed, and which Jesus Christ declared he came not to destroy, but to fulfil. In that law is contained the duty of self-preservation, including all lawful endeavours to preserve our own lives and the lives of others. In that law, also, is contained the obligation to moral honesty, including the duty of lawfully procuring and furthering the wealth and outward estate of ourselves and others. None of which duties we could perform by passive obedience and non-resistance. The doctrine contended for by these ultra-peace men, would be most agreeable to robbers and despots of every name; but it would be no honour to the gospel of Jesus Christ to represent it as a great chain forged in heaven, and let down to earth to bind all Christians to the feet of tyrants and robbers without resistance.

2. The system palmed on the gospel would destroy one of God's ordinances, namely, civil government. The apostle distinctly denominates it "the ordinance of God," Rom. xiii. 2. And is it to be supposed that the gospel, that very gospel which the apostle preached, destroyed that which he himself terms the ordinance of God? All, according to the assumption of the peace men, is to be spiritual. But it may be asked, does the apostle mean a spiritual sword when he says, Rom. xiii. 4, "For he is the minister of God to thee for good—he beareth not the sword in vain—a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil."

Man, in his collective capacity, derives from God the right of government, hence the magistrate is his ordinance. He is the minister of God. The design of this institution is the good of society. He is the minister of God for good. His province is the protection of virtue, and the suppression of evil. Rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil. In suppressing evil, the national sovereignty is divinely armed with vengeance. The minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath. Is this spiritual? Does a spiritual sword in the hand of a magistrate execute wrath and take vengeance on the evil doers? Then, indeed, it would be a sword borne in vain. Civil government is truly an ordinance of God, and the revealed will of God embraces the true philosophy of government. But if the civil magistrate beareth not the sword in vain, he must use it. For what? Only as mere advisory discipline? Yea, for much more—for punishment,—for vengeance. Punishment is not prospective, but retrospective. It is avenging. We never may punish an innocent person as an example, or for discipline, either to himself or others. Example, discipline, and formation, may be accompaniments or consequents of punishment, but the only legitimate cause of punishment is the guilt of the subject—vengeance for a crime committed.

The non-resistance society, in support of their spiritual and peaceful character, condemn all law, and the exercise of physical power, because "all attempts to change the heart of man by physical force have been abortive." So they must be, for God never appointed them as means for changing the human heart. But this objection proceeds upon the assumption of the false principle, that society, as such, and law, and government, are to be viewed as spiritual institutions, and that all means that may be lawfully used, must have for their object reformation, and a change of heart. Now this never was the direct end of punishment, however it might be a consequence flowing from it. We never hang a murderer for his own reformation or the reformation of others; but the law takes vengeance for the crime of murder. The Bible everywhere distinguishes between church and state. The weapons of the one are spiritual, while those of the other are carnal and material. The doctrine of non-resistants confounds church and state.

3. The lawfulness of defensive war grows out of the nature of civil society. A state of society is constitutional to man. He was created with the principle inherent in his nature. The declaration of the Creator concerning him was, It is not good that man should be alone. God had endowed him with active principles, which were to be employed and exercised, but which, without society, never could be employed or exercised, and God never infused a principle into the human heart to lie for ever dormant and useless. He makes nothing in vain. But society requires order and government, and among imperfect, fallen beings, such as the whole human race undoubtedly are, corrupt propensities require to be restrained, and evils to be suppressed. A competent authority to do this is necessary. This authority, in order to be competent, must be armed with physical power. The sum of the whole is this: "society is natural, and necessary to man, government is necessary to society, the application of peace is essential to both, and the application of force to the correction of erroneous conduct, necessarily implies that civil society has the power of property, liberty, life, and death, over every member. Such is the constitution of society."

To this it is objected by some of the theorists of the age, "that man has not the right of taking away his own life, and what he has not a right to do himself, he has no right to delegate to another. But as civil society, or government, has nothing but the rights delegated by individuals, and this right could not be delegated, therefore the right to take away human life exists nowhere. This effectually precludes the civil magistrate from punishing any with death, and prohibits war of every description."

The whole of this hypothesis goes on the presumption that human rights are not derived from God, that man is independent, and his own law-giver. To be independent is to be God. The idea is atheistical. More Gods than one is equal to no God, for there can be but one independent and supreme. It is granted that man has no power over his own life, but God has. He may take it away, or he may order another to take it away. Man did not make himself either a living being or a social being. God made him both, and therefore has a right to give him a law both as an individual and as a member of society. The individual has no right to take away his own life, but God has given him a right to amputate a limb for the safety of the body. So it is with society. God has given to it no right to destroy itself, but he has given it a right to cut off a mortified member to save the life of the body politic. If this is not allowed, there is an end to society. Every commonwealth would lie at the mercy of ruffians, and robbers and desperadoes would destroy society. Each state is, therefore, bound to arm the civil magistrate with the power of the sword.

This argument incontrovertibly proves the lawfulness of war. The subject of all punishment is viewed as an enemy to the community, and as such he is punished. But if one enemy to the community may be punished, so may another, that the evil may be corrected. It matters not whether the enemy be an individual, a combination, or a body politic. If, then, a nation be the enemy, and the evil to be corrected requires resistance unto blood, the injured commonwealth may apply the degree and kind of force necessary for accomplishing it. Defensive war, therefore, is lawful. "If the right of waging war be withheld from the body politic, there is an end to the independence of nations, and all society is dissolved." So long, therefore, as the divine Being intends the continuation of society in our world, so long will nations have a right to wage war in defence of their sovereignty, their rights and their privileges.

4. Defensive war is authorized by the scriptures of truth. The Old and New Testaments have one and the same object. They never contradict each other. Their author is God, who is perfect and unchangeable, and never can contradict himself. The laws and institutions of heaven are of two classes. 1. Precepts, the reason of which, is laid in changeable circumstances, and, 2. Those which are founded upon permanent relations. The first may cease, or change with the occasion, but the second are unalterable. Moral principles are eternally the same. Many of the laws given to the Israelites were temporary, local, and peculiar to that nation. They, however, had all a moral principle in them, and all were consonant to rectitude and justice. The morality of the Old Testament is, in nothing, different from the morality of the New. How wicked, then, is it to set Moses in opposition to Jesus Christ, when he himself says, Had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed me; for he wrote of me, John, v. 46. "An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth," figurative expressions, meaning righteous retribution, causing an equivalent to be rendered for the injury done, and a due punishment according to the proportion of the crime committed, never was abrogated by Jesus Christ. He, indeed, reproves the manner in which it was understood by the scribes, who maintained that private persons, by this law, might revenge themselves by taking the law into their own hands, and render evil for evil, while the execution of all law is to be referred to the power of the magistrate. Indeed the whole of Christ's precepts, Matt. v. 39—41, are not to be understood literally, or absolutely. They inculcate patience and Christian forbearance upon individuals. To understand them literally, would make them contradict other commands of the Saviour, and put an end to industry and social order. An absurdity in divine revelation is inadmissible. To admit it is deism. All that can be meant is, the urging upon individuals to be of a patient, forbearing, forgiving, and accommodating disposition, returning love for hatred, and blessing for cursing. And was this contrary to the Mosaic law? Verily no. But it urged the duty more clearly and explicitly. To this it is objected. Did not the law of Moses, as quoted by Christ himself, admit of hating enemies, whom, on the contrary, he commands us to love, Matt. v. 43? The law of Moses said no such thing, Lev. xix. 18. It is said, "Thou shalt not avenge, nor bear a grudge, but thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself." The addition was said by the scribes and pharisees, and this Christ re-proves and condemns.

[For the Banner of the Covenant.]

THE MEDIATORIAL WORK OF OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST.

The work which our blessed Saviour accomplished for his people presents to every believer a most interesting subject for contemplation. We may consider

1. What he did as Mediator. And here (1.) He willingly assumed the office; as Deity he was perfectly independent, and could not be compelled. He declares of himself, "I have power to lay down my life," &c. John x. 18. Although he well knew all that would befall him, he shrank not from the station, but "took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of man." Phil. ii. 4. (2.) "He was made under the law." This was a natural consequence of his assuming the form of a creature; as Deity he was subject to no law, acting under the influences merely of the principles of his own nature. But having taken a human nature, and a true body and a reasonable soul he became subject to the divine law. Hence he says, "To do thy wil

I take delight." Ps. xl. (3.) "He fulfilled the law." "Thus," says he, "it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness," and this was the end he always kept in view. He was "holy, harmless, and undefiled:" all that which the law demanded was by him perfectly fulfilled. (4.) "He endured the divine wrath." It had been said of him by Isaiah, that "He should make his soul an offering for sin," and from his whole history we see that this was the case. If we trace his life from the cradle to the cross, from the manger at Bethlehem to the tomb of Joseph of Arimathea, we will find that it was a life of suffering. In body he was afflicted with weariness and want—in soul, with the contradiction of sinners, the treachery of false friends, and the weakness of those who truly loved him. Satan let loose upon him his fiery temptations, and the Father withheld from him his countenance. He was indeed "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief." Truly might he say, "No sorrow is like unto my sorrow." (5.) But when his work was finished, when by his own blood he had purged away the sins of his people, he arose from the dead. This was necessary as an evidence that the justice of God, was satisfied that the entire debt had been paid, and that the curse of a broken law was removed. "He arose," says the apostle, "for our justification;" and it was necessary that he might discharge the other parts of his work, and, as God in our nature, be exalted to the right hand of the Majesty on high. (6.) Hence he ascended into heaven. Going out with his disciples to Mount Olivet, he rose up before them, attended by innumerable ministering spirits, and a cloud received him out of their sight. We cannot lift the veil, but what human imagination can conceive the glory and triumph which awaited him when he re-entered into heaven. It was such as would correspond to the greatness of the work he had discharged, and the honour and power which he had justly merited. (7.) In heaven he sitteth at the right hand of the Father, and maketh intercession for his people. Occupying a post of dignity and influence, he uses his power and honour for the welfare of his people. "He ever liveth to make intercession for them." "If any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous." (8.) But he will come again to this same world: it will be for judgment. "All judgment has been committed unto him, because he is the Son of man." "He shall come in the clouds of heaven, and every eye shall see him—they also which pierced him." O what a time will that be!—"that day for which all other days were made!"

2. What he has procured for his people. The results of his Mediatorial work may be next referred to. (1.) "He hath fully satisfied the justice of the Father." It was in order that he "might justify many," (Is. liii.) that he came into this world; and the apostle Paul assures us that this result was accomplished, when he says that in him "God is just, and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus." Rom. ii. 26. The debt was completely paid, and hence in the sight of God, his people are faultless, without iniquity or perverseness. (2.) "He hath purchased reconciliation." "God," says the apostle, "was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself." Under the influence of that love which is his very nature, God was always willing to be reconciled to sinners, if it could be done in consistency with his attributes. But while man was a sinner, he must be an enemy, and justice claimed his punishment. When, however, Jesus assumes the debt, and bears the penalty, the stain of guilt is removed, and man may be an object of the divine love. "God is reconciled unto man." It remains, indeed, that man be reconciled to God—and this is effected when the Divine Spirit slays the enmity, takes away the heart of stone, and makes the sinner know God and love him. (3.) The Lord Jesus has also provided "an everlasting inheritance." He says that he has gone to prepare mansions for his people, and he tells us of a kingdom prepared for us from before the foundations of the world. This is "that inheritance incorruptible," &c., of which Peter speaks. We cannot describe it, "for eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive the things which God hath prepared for them that love him."

3. When was all this secured? Some think the mediatorial work restricted to the time of the incarnation. If it respected merely Christ's active and passive obedience, as the substitute of sinners, this would be true, but it seems to us that it means a great deal more. As Mediator he administered the government of the universe, at least since the fall of man. In Old Testament times, by his Spirit he communicated the will of God to his people, and as their Priest he interceded for them. Hence while the "work of redemption," was "not actually wrought," until the incarnation, the efficacy and benefits thereof were bestowed previously. As there was an absolute certainty that Christ would fulfil his mission, the payment was advanced, if we may so speak, and Old Testament saints were justified on his merits, although as yet he had not suffered. This was represented and sealed to them in the sacrifices, which were typical of the sufferings of Jesus on behalf of his people.

4. The Lord Jesus discharges these Mediatorial functions, according to both the natures which he possesses. Some things properly belong to the one nature, and some to the other. Thus, for instance: "To suffer, can be predicated only of the humanity, while to know all things, belongs to his Divinity." Yet, since the two natures are united in one person, what is proper to one nature is sometimes ascribed to the other. As, for example, when we read of the 'church of God purchased with his blood,' and again when it is said, "The Son of Man, which is in heaven."

5. The last thing to be considered is the manner in which this redemption which Christ as Mediator has procured, is applied. And this is in three ways. (1.) In his sacerdotal office he intercedes for his people. (2.) In his prophetical office he reveals to them the mysteries of salvation. (3.) In his regal office, he effectually subdues them to himself.

Did time permit, it would be proper to make some remarks on each of these offices—but we must forbear; and therefore close with mentioning a few inferences:

1. The miserable and helpless condition of man. Had he not been in this state, God would not have needed to send him a Saviour. In the sufferings of Jesus we see our own doom, if not delivered by him.

2. The divine mercy in providing a ransom. "God hath so loved the world," &c. What has he given? his own Son. Not a part of this world—not the whole of it—not myriads of worlds—not angels and archangels—all these are as nothing—he has given his own Son. What mercy and love is here displayed! What could he give greater or better than this?

3. The dignity of the Mediatorial person. The Lord Jesus Christ possessed a person and character, and occupies a position superior to any other being, God himself alone excepted. Whether we consider his qualifications for his work—his great achievements as our Mediator—the reward he has received from his Father—all show us that he is crowned with glory and honour, and possesses a name which is above every name.

4. How happy are they who are interested in this Mediator, who have him for their Friend! In this life he will make all things work together for their good; and in death, he will not leave them, nor forsake them. Do we feel a fear when we approach God? As sinners, we must and do. How dreadful will that be, when we meet him at death, or at judgment! Will we not then need a friend? What will we do then if Jesus be not our friend? O let us now seek an interest in Him, that it may then be well with us! Let us ever come to God, in and through him. He is the new and the living way: all who come unto God, by him, will in no wise be cast out. "Let us then draw near with boldness to the throne of grace, that we may find mercy, and obtain grace, to help us in our time of need."

FAMILY PRAYER.*

"As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord." This should be the plain, the avowed, the steadfast resolution of every one who bears rule in a house; of every master of a household; of every father, of every mother of a family. When God ordains that any one should be the master or the mistress of a household, he likewise ordains that they should take care of those who are under their authority, and should look upon them as committed to their special charge. In like manner, when he is pleased to grant any one the blessing of being a father or a mother, he links this blessing with the duty of taking care of the children, of bringing them up, of providing for them. Now these duties, whether of parents toward their children, or of masters and mistresses toward their servants, so far as relates merely to earthly things, cannot well be grossly neglected; and few do so neglect them. Even those who have no higher principle for their conduct, those who merely wear the harness of custom, and are driven along by the lash of self-interest, will take care of their children and of their servants; will see that they have a roof over their heads, that they are duly fed and clothed; nay, will wish, and even try, in a manner, to make them cleanly and orderly and sober and honest and industrious. All this is right: all this is a part of a Christian master's, of a Christian parent's duty; but it is not the whole of that duty, nor the highest part of it. The reason, too, why most people fail so lamentably in the discharge of this part is, because they cut it off from the remainder, and try to discharge it by itself. Cut a bunch of grapes off from the vine: will it ripen? You may hold it before the fire till you scorch it: but it has no living juice in it; and when it is cut off from the vine, none can flow into it. Or should it be already ripe, it will soon shrivel, or grow mouldy; or some accident will mash it. The master and mistress of a household, the father and mother of a family, have not only the low, earth-born, downward-looking duty of providing for the temporal well-being of those committed to their charge: they have also the high, glorious, heaven-sprung, heaven-seeking duty of providing for their spiritual well-being. This duty of helping the helpless onward along their road to heaven is indeed a glorious one. It is a privilege we ought to prize and to be thankful for. It is a privilege we ought to rejoice in, even as a candle rejoices in the privilege of being allowed to give light, and lifts up its bright flame on high, and gladly wastes its own life in fulfilling its noble duty of standing in the stead of the sun. So, too, should all we, whom Christ has appointed to stand in his stead—so should we, poor candles as we are, whom he has chosen to keep up his light among such as would otherwise be sitting in darkness—so should we rejoice that we are permitted to give light, and gladly spend our lives in doing so, burning clearly and steadily until we have burnt away. Glorious, however, as this duty is, it is a duty for which we shall have to give account; and we may not neglect it, or cast it aside, except at our grievous peril. We shall have to give account, not only for our own souls, but also more or less, for the souls of those whom God has committed to our charge.

Let this, then, be your watchword, my brethren, every one of you, who have any souls in any way dependent upon you, and intrusted to your management and care; let this be your watchword, and the rule of your life: "As for me and my house, I will serve the Lord." It is not enough for you to say, "As for me, I will serve the Lord." A grape never stands alone: it is always part of a cluster. In truth, no one can feel any hearty desire to serve the Lord himself, without being at the same time anxious that others also, that his friends and neighbours—above all, that the members of his own household should bear their part in this goodly service. And one of the ways in which it behoves you to provide that your house shall serve the Lord, is by setting up his worship in your house; by taking care that you and your whole house join day by day in serving him with prayer and thanksgiving and praise.

Some among you may, perhaps, tell me that you cannot well manage to gather your families together of a morning. Be it so. It would not take up much time indeed. After a few days' trial, you would probably find that you met together for prayers just as easily and as naturally as for meals; and when you had spent a few minutes in prayer, and had called down God's blessing on your labour, how differently, with how much lighter heart, would you go forth to your labour, instead of going forth [as you do now, with no other thought than that of the wearisome burden of the day. Or, if the father of the family goes out too early, the mother may gather the children together, and offer up a prayer in the midst of them, before she sends them to school. Of an evening, too, at any rate, you have plenty of time on your hands. Every evening, before you lie down to take your rest beneath the shelter of the same roof, before you close your eyes and fold up your thoughts in sleep, you may kneel down together, and pray to God to shelter you and yours with the overshadowing wings of his love, and to watch over you with his all-seeing eye, while you are unable to watch over yourselves. Every evening you may pray that God will forgive whatever he has seen amiss in you and yours during the past day, and that he will give you understanding to know his will, and grace to keep it; and that he will bless you with refreshing and comfortable sleep, and be with you in your down-lying and in your up-rising. Surely this is little to ask of you. This, however, is the very least that can be asked; a mere grain of dust in comparison with the pearl above all price which you are seeking thereby, namely, that once a day, at the least, you gather your family together (they who can do so twice a day are without excuse if they do not,) and that you offer up some simple prayer, with one voice and one heart, to God. You who are married, and have nothing but infant children, should do so along with your wives; for remember, so gracious is our Lord, his promise is to be with those who are gathered together in his name, even if there are but two of them. You should pray to God, along with your wives, to sanctify and bless your marriage, and to enable you to bring up your children in his faith and to his glory. You, who have children old enough to understand what you say, should make them kneel down along with you, that they may be trained from their childhood to behold their parents daily kneeling in the presence of the living God, and seeking communion with his Son. Then may you truly hope that they will be like olive branches about your table, emblems of peace, like olive branches, and flowing with the oil of gladness. You, again, who have servants, should call them to share in your prayers. It is such a burden for a man to have to command—to have to be waited on by another. Let there at least be one moment in the day when this burden is cast off, when the difference is lost sight of, and you all kneel down together as brethren in sin and brethren in grace, praying each for the other, and that each may discharge his duty to the other. Surely, if we will not do thus much, we can never have said in our hearts, “As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord.”

PEOPLE ENCOURAGING THEIR MINISTER.

Dr. Sharp, one of the oldest and most venerable ministers in this city, has lately preached a sermon with the above title. It would afford us much pleasure to transfer the whole of it to our columns, but we have room only for a few extracts.

Encourage your own pastor by your regular and constant attendance upon his ministry.

This is a duty of much greater moment to the usefulness and happiness of a pastor, than Christians generally imagine. When a church and congregation regularly attend on the ministry of a pastor, it cheers and elevates him. He considers it as an assurance that he shares their affection, esteem and confidence. He goes to his pulpit, feeling that he shall not preach in vain, nor spend his strength for naught. He pursues his studies with greater diligence, and goes to the house of God with greater pleasure. And when he stands in the presence of a serious and soberly listening throng, whose eyes are fastened upon him, he is animated and encouraged. A new impulse is given to his feelings—his thoughts are quickened—his imagination soars with a truer and bolder wing—his appeals are more earnest—his sympathies well up, and pervade his whole nature—he feels strong in argument, and there is a concentration both in mind and heart, followed by an earnest and ready utterance, that he can never have who is doomed to preach to listless hearers or to empty pews. When the people, with one consent, come together to hear God's minister, his words come from his lips with facility, strength and attractiveness; chaining the attention of his hearers to the close. To the minister so situated, the pulpit is more than a throne. It is the pleasantest, as it is the most honourable place in which he ever stands; and the ministry is preferred by him to any other service on earth.

But when a pastor perceives that his ministry is neglected—when the absence of some is occasioned by a vain and itching curiosity to hear or see some new preacher, or to be enlightened by some new doctrine, and when the absence of others is occasioned by their love of the world, or by their dislike of the plain and faithful preaching of God's word—when one service is deemed better than two, and none better than one, even by some church members, the pious pastor returns from his scene of labour disquieted and cast down.

In the bitterness of his soul he is ready to relinquish his work—to remove to some other station—and to doubt whether the ministry can be his province. He is discouraged in his studies. The energies of his mind are palsied. He knows not what subject to select, nor how to illustrate it; for he fears there will be but few to hear him. He goes bound in spirit, and is both thought-tied and tongue-tied.

See this poor discouraged pastor. In his visits among his people, he has found some of his brethren in affliction—some in temptation—some in despondency, some, it may be, in self-confidence. They need consolation, counsel, warning. He goes prepared to be a minister of consolation—a preacher of righteousness, a guide to wanderers. He hopes to do some good, because he draws his bow not at a venture. But when he has announced his text, and his lips are ready to pour forth words of consolation, the afflicted are not there, to hear the words of comfort; the weak are not there to be strengthened; the bowed down are not there that their minister may lift them up; the wanderer is not there that he may reclaim him. What discouraging sensations must a minister feel to be thus disappointed in his benevolent aims. Encourage your minister, then, by your habitual attendance on his ministry. Let neither the weather, nor worldliness, nor the love of hearing or seeing something new, cause you to leave your own seat vacant in the house of God. He that is a wandering worshipper “is as a bird that wandereth from her nest.”

I have said, and I repeat it, that were I a hearer, and the apostle Paul should come to the city, I would not leave my own chosen pastor to hear him. I would wait till he came to the house where I worshipped, or, if he preached but once, I would persuade my pastor and the whole church to go and hear him; but I would not leave my place to hear any one. I would thus act, not from a bigoted attachment to my own minister, nor merely to manifest for him a just respect and regard, and thus to “encourage him,” but from an undoubting conviction that myself should be thereby more benefited. It is not something brilliant, profound or novel, coming from strange lips, and accompanied by new tones and gesticulations, that can meet the real wants of the soul, and give a right direction to the life; but the plain, sensible, scriptural teachings of one whom we know, whose kind attention we share, and in whose integrity and purity of character we have entire confidence. The constant hearer of such a minister, however common he may be deemed, will make far greater progress in every thing that is truly excellent, than he who, choosing no stated place of worship, is always in quest of some uncommon preacher. Of this latter class I have seldom known one who had attained the true end of all hearing—that of being not only a hearer, but a doer of the word.—N. E. Puritan.

DANGER OF REVERIE.—Do any thing innocent, rather than give yourself up to reverie. I can speak on this point from experience. At one period of my life I was a dreamer, castle-builder. Visions of the distant and future took the place of present duty and activity. I spent hours in reverie. I suppose I was seduced, in part, by physical debility. But the body suffered as much as the mind. I found, too, that the imagination threatened to inflame the passions, and that if I meant to be virtuous, I must dismiss my musings. The conflict was a hard one; I resolved, prayed, resisted, sought refuge in occupation, and at length triumphed. I beg you to avail yourself of my experience.—Memoir of Dr. Channing.

IMPORTANCE OF PUNCTUALITY.—Method is the very hinge of business; and there is no method without punctuality; it is important, because it subserves the peace and good temper of a family; the want of it not only infringes on necessary duty, but sometimes excludes this duty. The calmness of mind which it produces, is another advantage of punctuality; a disorderly man is in a hurry; he has no time to speak to you, because he is going elsewhere; and when he gets there he is too late for his business; or he must hurry away before he can finish it. Punctuality gives weight to character. “Such a man has made an appointment; then I know he will keep it.” And this generates punctuality in you; for like other virtues it propagates itself. Servants and children must be punctual where their leader is so. Appointments, indeed, become debts. I owe you punctuality; if I have made an appointment with you, I have no right to throw away your time, if I do my own.

GOOD RECOMMENDATION.—It is stated that a president of the United States Bank dismissed a clerk, who had an aged mother depending on him for support, because he refused to write in that institution on the Sabbath. A few days after, he was requested to name some one as cashier for another banking institution. He mentioned his dismissed clerk. “You can trust him,” said he, “for he would not work for me on the Sabbath.”

A HINDOO'S NOTIONS OF THE SABBATH.—Rev. Dr. Steinkopff relates that an English sailor, in Calcutta, had gone on shore one Sabbath to perform some work. While he was engaged in it, a Hindoo observing him, said to him, “Do you call yourself a Christian?” To which he replied, that he did. “Why,” said the Hindoo, “does your God require you to work on the Sabbath-day?” To which he did not attempt to make an answer; but on returning to the vessel, he found these questions incessantly recur to his mind, till they brought him, on his knees, to acknowledge his ignorance and sin; and from that moment he dated his conversion to God.

Obituary.

DEATH OF DR. PAUL.

The following interesting obituary of the late Dr. Paul is taken from the Scottish Presbyterian, and is probably from the pen of his son-in-law, Rev. Dr. Bates, of Glasgow. It is a well merited expression of the worth of one of "the excellent of the earth.

On Thursday, the 16th of March, the Rev. John Paul, D. D., of the Eastern Reformed Synod in Ireland, departed this life, in the seventy-first year of his age, and the forty-fourth of his ministry. We believe it may be said, without offence, that the church with which he was connected has lost, by his removal, its most distinguished member—a minister who would have held high rank in any church. It may be interesting to our readers, and we hope not unprofitable, while we make this solemn announcement, to lay before them a few particulars, in so far as they have been ascertained, respecting the closing period of his mortal pilgrimage.

On the first Sabbath of the present year, he preached in a vacant congregation, at some distance from home, and, on the following day, moderated in a call to a young licentiate. He returned home on the following day, apparently in his usual good health. On the evening of Wednesday, he was visited with paralysis. The members of his family observed the change; and expressing the fear that he was unwell, requested him to retire to rest. He, himself, was quite unconscious of any illness, and, in reply to their inquiries, alleged that he was quite well. On attempting to remove to his chamber, however, he was unable to walk, and was carried to the bed, from which he did not again arise. In a few days, a degree of cloudiness or stupor seemed to rest in his mind, but in a short time his understanding was restored, and continued with him to his last hour. And while, in all the important matters, the vigour of his intellect seemed unabated, the sensibilities of his heart were quickened and elevated. A large number of people of all religious denominations visited him in his illness, and he was greatly disappointed if any person was refused admission, even in compliance with medical advice.

To a young minister, who paid him a visit, he said, "I esteem it a great honour and privilege that the Lord has sent you to make this friendly call. I feel it to be a greater honour than to be visited by an ambassador from an earthly prince. You come from a higher court. I feel humbled to the dust by the Lord's mercies to me—a poor unprofitable creature, unworthy of the smallest crumbs of his goodness." To another minister, who, knowing the deep interest he took in the progress of public events, and the dispensations of God's providence, was giving him a brief outline of the recent occurrences on the continent of Europe, he replied, by saying, "Well, these things are very wonderful and important; and I do not doubt that God will bring out of them happy results: yet they are only temporal things; and, to a person in my situation, the things which immediately concern the soul and eternity are infinitely important. Would you now give me a brief outline of any sermon you have lately preached, which you may think most suitable to my circumstances, or of any discourse you may have recently heard at communion?" This having been done, he proceeded to remark:—"I cannot now preach to others; but I sometimes try to preach to myself;—and here are the heads of a sermon in which I have been exercising my mind as I was able. 1st, How is it, since Christ has paid the full penalty for all who truly believe in him, that God, nevertheless, exercises his people with so many and so sharp afflictions? 2d, What are the leading benefits which may be expected from affliction, when rightly improved? and, 3d, (which is to me all-important,) what ground have I for concluding that I myself have realized, or am realizing these benefits?"

Although his disease had approached so gently as to elude, for a time, his own consciousness, it was soon evident that he had lost the power of one side, and that his sight was seriously impaired. His freedom of utterance was less affected than is usual in such cases, and his articulation continued distinct to the last. Being unable to read, however, he was accustomed to have portions of Scripture read to him frequently by members of his family, and other Christian friends. On these he occasionally made brief comments, with the greatest propriety. It was often not a little affecting to ministers and other friends, who conversed and prayed with him, to observe him overpowered with a sense of gratitude, feeling themselves to be as much his inferiors in understanding and Christian experience as they often were in years. He was made aware, by letters, that in several places in the north of Ireland, companies of Christian friends were in the habit of meeting to present united prayer for him under his affliction. A few weeks after, he desired letters to be sent in reply, requesting that these kind friends would not fail to offer thanksgivings also on his behalf, on account of the Lord's abundant mercy towards him. The circumstance having been mentioned to a friend from a distance, who had come to visit him, he proceeded to remark—"I felt that it might appear assuming in me to expect any such notice to be taken of me; but these friends have been pleased to testify their Christian regard by meeting to pray for me. I believed that I had experienced the benefit of their prayers; and I was afraid that I might commit sin by withholding the acknowledgment of the Lord's faithfulness in fulfilling his own promises."

Speaking on the same subject, some time after, he remarked, "I have not had any thing of the rapturous experience which has been the privilege of some of the children of God, yet I trust I can, without enthusiasm, adopt the apostle's statement, that, when our afflictions abound, our consolations much more abound; the afflictions have been exceeded by the consolations;" and then he proceeded to specify some of the channels through which the special mercy of God had been vouchsafed to him from the beginning of his trouble. "I have no wish," said he, "to outlive my usefulness; and if it shall please the Lord to spare me for a little, now that I can no longer engage in active service, it is my strongest desire, I trust, that he may glorify himself in my affliction."

A friend from a distance had written to request that notice should be sent to him once a week of Dr. Paul's state of health, as many were inquiring for him, and, among others, parties with whom he had formerly been engaged in earnest controversy. In reply to this communication, he requested his correspondent to make due acknowledgment on his behalf to those friends who had so kindly interested themselves in his situation, and particularly to those to whom he had formerly stood in an ecclesiastical relation, which, of late years, had been broken up; "tell them," said he, "that I know I have passed from death to life, because I love the brethren; that I have loved them, and do love them still; that no deed of Presbytery, Synod, or Assembly can separate them from my affection; that I shall love them during life, and hope to enjoy their fellowship throughout eternity."

There was no symptom of the renewal of the disease; but he never rallied after the first attack; and as he could scarcely take any nourishment, his strength progressively declined. Yet he was lifted out of bed, and sat for about two hours in his chair, on the day of his death. His mind continued clear and unimpaired, although his weakness rendered him incapable of much conversation with his family on that day. He often selected the psalms which he wished to be sung beside him. There were a few uninspired compositions, also, in which he took pleasure, and wished to have often repeated to him, as his strength declined. One of these was the hymn—

"All hail the great Immanuel's name;
Let angels prostrate fall;
Bring forth the royal diadem,
And crown him Lord of all."

And another, which he often repeated himself with great energy and fervour, was the well-known hymn—

"The hour of my departure's come," &c.

With strong emotion, and the tears flowing down his face, he would repeat a second time the verse—

"Not in mine innocence I trust,
I bow before thee in the dust;
And through my Saviour's blood alone,
I look for mercy at thy throne."

He had taken a warm interest in the meetings of the Evangelical Alliance. Both at Liverpool and at London, he was one of a few white-headed patriarchs who exulted in this remarkable movement; who expressed the hope that, although it might not for the present effect a re-union of churches, it might lead the sounder portions of many churches to a better understanding with each other; that although it might not terminate controversy, it might powerfully tend to clear it from the animosity and rancour by which it had been so often embittered. And this was one of the subjects that dwelt much on his mind in his last illness. He often expressed his regret that more had not been done in the north of Ireland, and that he had not exerted himself so much as he should have done in furtherance of that cause. A few days before his death, he was made aware that a meeting of the Executive Council of the British Organization was to be held in London on the following week; and it was remarked to him, that if his illness were made known, the assembled brethren would not fail to present special and earnest prayer on his behalf. His reply was, that he would account it a very high privilege to be so remembered. It so happened, that on the evening of Wednesday, the 15th, while the Council was sitting, a friend had opportunity of expressing his wish in this matter, when intercessory prayer was presented for him by two brethren, with great fervour and affection. One of these brethren was the Rev. Edward Bickersteth, of the simplicity and fervency of whose prayers Dr. Paul had often spoken with much admiration. He could not have foreseen that these prayers should ascend on his behalf in the time of his greatest need. No more were these brethren aware, when rendering this tribute of Christian sympathy, that he for whom they pled that "the eternal God might be his refuge, and underneath the everlasting arms," was just entering on his final struggle with the king of terrors. In a few hours after, he had ascended to that place where prayer is exchanged for praise, and suffering for everlasting joy.

We may be excused for recording herè a pleasing coincidence, communicated in a letter to a member of Dr. Paul's family since his death. The minister to whom it refers, who died several years ago, had once been the intimate friend of Dr. Paul; but, subsequently, they were on opposite sides in a controversy, which issued in ecclesiastical separation. But although their fellowship was broken off, their mutual esteem and regard continued unimpaired. The incident is communicated by the son of that minister, in a letter, from which we make the following extract, the excellent spirit of which will be evident to our readers:—"I can, in some measure, estimate," he says, "the poignancy of your grief, by the loss I myself sustained, eleven years ago, in the removal by death of a kind and estimable father; of one who, in his day, had been instrumental in adding members to the church of Christ; who most devoutly loved the Redeemer, his cause, and people on earth, and in the agonies of dissolving nature, and with his last breath, committed his spirit into that Redeemer's hands. Your departed father was not less estimable, while as a public advocate of the Redeemer's cause and divine character, he was more generally and widely known. But, however much I might otherwise feel in reference to the removal of Dr. Paul, the sensibilities of my heart kindle into love towards you, while I relate the following incident. My father's last illness was of short duration, as he was only ten or twelve days confined, and he died on a Sabbath evening. On that evening, Dr. Paul was preaching in Dr. Alexander's church, in Belfast, and received information, during the service, I think, of my father's illness, and that there was little or no hope entertained of his recovery. He took occasion, therefore, at the close of the service, to mention the fact to the congregation, and in the prayer which succeeded, most feelingly and affectionately commended him in his affliction and bodily sufferings to the tender care and sympathy of a covenant-keeping God and exalted Redeemer. On being informed of these particulars, I found, that during the time that Dr. Paul had been engaged in prayer, my father's spirit had taken its flight to the heavenly rest; and I can assure you, that oftentimes since, when I have reflected on this remarkable coincidence, I have said, I could not have wished him to depart under other circumstances. We can herein sensibly realize the communion of saints. One is on his death-bed, suffering the agonies of dissolution; the other, separated from him by space, is standing at the altar on his behalf, pleading at a throne of grace, and presenting also the prayers of a worshipping and believing congregation. How closely must they now be united in glory, where all minor differences have been removed—where together they admire and adore a God of redeeming love, and sing together the song of Moses and of the Lamb! For they who be wise, or are teachers, shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they who turn many to righteousness, as the stars, for ever and ever."

The vast assembly which came spontaneously together to attend the funeral of Dr. Paul, was a proof of the estimation in which he was held in the surrounding district. The number of ministers and of carriages was unusually great, as well as of gentlemen on horseback.

But as the day was extremely beautiful, and as a great part of the road lay along the face of a hill, which commands a complete view of Belfast Lough, and one of the noblest and most extensive prospects any where to be met with in the north of Ireland; a great number, who had brought their own conveyances, chose to walk on foot. And although the distance from Carrickfergus must have been more than five miles, the length of the procession, and the dense mass of people were not perceptibly diminished to the last. It had been resolved to assemble in his usual place of public worship, to have religious exercises before the interment; but, on arrival, it was obvious the multitude could not gain admission into the church, and the services were conducted in the open field. The body was then lowered into its resting-place, in a corner of a burying ground adjoining to the place of worship.

It was a mixed multitude that followed the bier. There were the ministers of six or seven different denominations, a long line of them, wearing generally the white linen scarf, which in the north of Ireland is usually assigned to clergymen and medical men at funeral processions. There were the farmers, many of them on horseback. There were the shopkeepers and merchants of the small town where he spent nearly thirty years of his life. There were the gentry of the district, the magistrates and proprietors, some of them choosing to walk on foot, while their carriages were in the charge of their servants. There were companies of the members of his own congregation, including some groups of women, who, with sorrowful countenances, kept their places close behind the hearse the entire way. When this circumstance was noticed, as not common in other parts of the kingdom, to one who also followed the hearse, he replied, "Oh, yes, they do like to come; they loved him for his Master's sake;—they were last at the cross and first at the sepulchre; why should they not be here?" It was gratifying to the friends of Dr. Paul to witness such an assemblage at his funeral. But to the reflecting mind there was a moral spectacle in it which should not pass unnoticed. It was not his wealth, nor the personal influence arising out of it, that drew together so great an assembly. It was not the extent or influence of his congregation—for he ministered to a little flock widely scattered over a moorland district. It was not the number or influence of family connexions, for he had few relations. That large assembly was an honourable tribute to sanctified talent and to moral worth. It was a proof, that notwithstanding many adverse circumstances, and an obscure position, he himself was acknowledged as a burning and shining light. It was a proof that eminent ability, great honesty of purpose, a fearless intrepidity in defending what is held to be truth, are appreciated by an enlightened public, and will be had in honour by the candid among all parties.

The conductors of the public press in the north of Ireland and elsewhere, many of them differing widely in opinion from him, both on public questions and in religious matters, concurred generally in pronouncing a warm eulogium on him, at the time of his decease. And it must be admitted that this was the more honourable to them, that in the course of his controversial writings, he had, at one time or other, been opposed to almost all parties. And all the more, when it is considered that his controversies, although remote from acrimony were often conducted with an earnestness and impetuosity which left little room for courtesy or much consideration for the feelings of his opponents.

It seems to be admitted, however, that his warmth was an honest warmth; that his impetuosity arose from the force of his convictions, and not from the impulse of any unkind feeling. As a proof of this, it might be mentioned, that some leading men among the Arian party, with whom he had repeated and staunch controversy, were forward to testify their respect for him when alive, and that very honourable mention was made of him after his decease, in a journal understood to be under their auspices. "He was long known," says the editor, "as the most distinguished member of the Reformed Presbyterian church in Ireland, as a learned and able theologian, and an enlightened and powerful advocate of civil and religious liberty. Holding ecclesiastical principles which may be applied unfavourably to the right of the people, he was, nevertheless, an ardent champion of freedom; and when some of his brethren endeavoured publicly to make such application, he smote them with the strength of an intellectual giant. He possessed a clear judgment, and a very logical mind; and his close reasoning powers were seldom if ever equalled in the many combats in which he was engaged. His manners were characterized by a winning gentleness and vivacity, and he was a downrightly honest man." (Belfast, March 18th, 1848.)

Another journalist writes:—"Constitutionally of an active and energetic temperament, he devoted his mental energies with characteristic vigour to the investigation and exposition of sacred truth. Distinguished by great force and power of intellect, he bore a marked resemblance, as it has always seemed to us, to two of the leading minds in another denomination—we allude to Andrew Fuller and Alexander Carson,—though one is an English, the other an Irish Baptist. Dr. Paul was, perhaps, not less successful than either of these illustrious dead in elucidating the grand peculiarities of the Christian faith. At the period when his earlier productions appeared, the witnesses for truth in the north of Ireland were comparatively few and feeble in their testimony. The publications to which we refer exerted a mighty influence in exposing the sophistries and plausibilities of error, and in laying broad and deep in the minds of many the foundations of sacred truth."

A third thus speaks of the deceased:—"We knew Dr. Paul intimately and well, and felt for his character an almost filial veneration. His powers of mind were of a highly original and vigorous order, and had been cultivated by diligent study; while the amount of his erudition, especially in metaphysical theology and biblical criticism, was accurate and extensive. He had so studied the works of Jonathan Edwards, as to have imbibed the very tone, and spirit, and entire cast of thought of the theological philosopher of New England. Still he was neither a copyist nor an imitator. . . . His first appearance as a theological writer was in defence of 'Creeds and Confessions,' the propriety of which had been impugned by a Unitarian minister of some note, then in connexion with the Synod of Ulster. In this publication, Dr. Paul had occasion to touch on some other topics; and the vigour of his style, the acuteness of his logical discrimination, the sustained closeness of his argument, and especially the caustic, ironical, amusing pleasantry with which he surrounded it, when dealing with some hostile absurdity, attracted immediate attention, and convinced the adversaries of the evangelical faith, that in the Rev. John Paul they had no ordinary antagonist. . . . Dr. Paul's next was also his great work, 'The Refutation of Arianism,' published in Belfast, in 1826. [It was in the form of a reply to discussions and arguments, in a volume of sermons by the Rev. Dr. Bruce.] From that period, his fame as a theological writer of high eminence, became firmly established. . . . At a subsequent period, he had occasion again to employ his pen in the Unitarian controversy, in opposition to Dr. Montgomery. At this time his logical powers were so well known, that few cared to meet him in polemic discussions, and he was left in a great degree unanswered. A contemptuous reference, publicly made by his antagonist, 'to a Mr. Paul of Carrickfergus,' provoked on his part a letter to the public journals, which, for the caustic vigour of its style, and the manly energy of thought which it evinced, excelled all his previous compositions. It possessed, in fact, all the admirable qualities of Cobbet's best manner. Had Cobbet been a religious character, it was precisely such a letter as he would have written. And its effect was in proportion to its power. There were no more sneering references from any quarter; as Mr. Paul had now given to a plurality of the church's adversaries instructive intimations of his individuality, and of his characteristic attributes."

Dr. Paul's principal work, his Refutation of Arianism, in which the leading doctrines of Calvinism are stated and vindicated, in a style remarkably clear and effective, has been out of print for many years. It was published at a crisis when the grand struggle for orthodoxy among the Presbyterians of the north of Ireland had little more than well begun. The work had extensive circulation, and the effect of it was as salutary as it was seasonable. In speaking of that work and its author, a minister, formerly of the Synod of Ulster, but whose literary attainments have raised him to a high eminence, remarked, a short time ago, that the Presbyterians of the north of Ireland might well raise a monument to the memory of Dr. Paul, as there were few living men to whom the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church in Ireland is so largely indebted, as it is to him, for the soundness in the faith by which it is now characterized. A strong desire has been expressed in some quarters for a new and cheap edition of this work, or rather for a re-publication of several of Dr. Paul's treatises in one volume—all bearing on the Arian or Arminian controversy. Whether adequate encouragement might be met with, in such an undertaking, the writer is unable to express a decided opinion.

THE DEATH OF THE PIOUS.—Says an eloquent writer: "As one after another departs, it will be like the vanishing of the stars in the morning light—the passage of spirit after spirit, resplendent in glory to the upper world."

"Thus star by star declines,
Till all are passed away;
As morning high and higher shines,
To pure and perfect day;
Nor sink those stars in empty night,
But hide-themselves in heaven's own light."

"WHAT THINK YE OF CHRIST?"—Matthew xxii. 42.

BY THE REV. JOHN NEWTON.

"What think ye of Christ," is the test
To try both your state and your scheme;
You cannot be right in the rest,
Unless you think rightly of him.
As Jesus appears in your view,
As he is beloved or not,
So God is disposed towards you,
And mercy or wrath is your lot.

Some take him a creature to be,—
A man, or an angel at most;
Sure these have not feelings like me,
Nor know themselves wretched and lost.
So guilty, so helpless am I,
I durst not confide in his blood,
Nor on his protection rely,
Unless I were sure he is God.

Some call him a Saviour, in word,
But mix their own works with his plan,
And hope he his help will afford,
When they have done all that they can.

If doings prove rather too light,
(A little, they own, they may fail,)
They purpose to make up full weight
By casting his name in the scale.

Some style him the pearl of great price,
And say he's the fountain of joys;
Yet feed upon folly and vice,
And cleave to the world and its toys.
Like Judas, the Saviour they kiss,
And while they salute him, betray;
Ah, what will profession like this
Avail in his terrible day?

If asked, what of Jesus I think?
(Though still my best thoughts are but poor,)
I say, he's my meat and my drink,
My life and my strength and my store;
My shepherd, my husband, my friend,
My Saviour from sin and from thrall,
My hope from beginning to end,
My portion, my Lord, and my all.

WALL FLOWERS.

—"they smell sweetest by night-time, thae flowers; and they're maist aye seen about ruined buildings."—EDIE OCHILTREE, in the Antiquary.

Sweetest by night: like gracious words,
That scent the sacred page;
But freeliest pour their perfumed store,
In sickness, grief, and age.

Seen most by ruins: like the love,
That gave itself for all;
Yet closest clings to guiltiest things,
As Magdalene, or Saul.

A DESPERATE CASE AND ITS CURE.

An aged and venerable clergyman of Wurtemberg, the Rev. Mr. Flattich, was celebrated for his successful efforts in training and educating young men for usefulness both in church and state. An eminent officer of government one day waited on the good man, and requested him to receive under his care and tuition a spoiled and obstinate son. "I must acknowledge," said he to the clergyman, "that my boy is a desperate fellow, on whom all my counsels, reproofs and corrections, have hitherto failed to produce any good effect. I have exhorted him with much kindness—I have chastised him—I have reproved him in the presence of others in order that shame might have its perfect work upon him—but he has remained an incurable boy. Neither praise nor blame, neither the birch nor an empty stomach, could accomplish any thing—it was all in vain."

The clergyman then inquired of the officer, whether he had not tried other means than those just named. "Yes," replied the father, "I have for two days shut him up in a solitary apartment, giving him only water and bread—but this also proved in vain."

"And did you not try some other remedy?" inquired the clergyman.

"I have made him suffer with cold, but equally in vain," replied the father.

Upon similar queries propounded to him, he made similar replies, stating various other, especially mild measures, which he had employed to bring his son to reason. After detailing all the particulars, the venerable clergyman remarked, that none of these seemed to him to be the right kind of cures for a "desperate case," as he termed that of his son. "I know of one," said he, "which is far more effectual than any or all of those which you have named, and that is—Prayer." "And now, do tell me," continued the good man, "did you ever pray earnestly and frequently for your child?"

The officer cast down his eyes and acknowledged that he had not.

"Do not be surprised, therefore," continued Flattich, "that all your labour upon the outward frame of your boy has proved fruitless. You have neglected that which alone can give life and corresponding natural feelings to that outward frame. To tan a dead skin, does not impart life to it. The breath of God alone can give spiritual life to the spiritual dead. I will take your son, and, in dependence upon God, I will see what can be done."

He took the boy under his care—he tried his cure on the "desperate case." With God's blessing on the labours of the pious man, he gradually became cured. He was an excellent, devoted and useful man.—Ger. Ref. Mess.

AN INDIAN WIGWAM.—A wigwam is the tent or house of the Indian in his savage state. This picture shows the interior of such a house. It is made of a few poles, fastened together at the top, and covered with the bark of trees or the skins of animals. It has no fire-place, and the fire has to be kindled on the ground in the middle of the tent—filling it with smoke. The wigwam has no windows; of course it must be a very dark and gloomy place. It has no nice parlour nor bedrooms; neither table nor chairs; nothing but the earth for a floor. Our little readers will say, "What an ugly place." So it is. And you, dear children, should feel thankful to God, who has given you such a pleasant home, and so many blessings which the poor Indian children do not enjoy. Especially should you feel thankful that, in the Scriptures, you are taught that there is a home in heaven for all good children—for all who love the Saviour, trust in him, and keep his commandments.

Many of the Indian children, and their parents, too, know nothing about the Bible, nor about the Saviour, nor about that heavenly home. The missionary pities them, and goes to live among them, and tries to teach them the way of salvation. Some of the Indians have already learned to read the Scriptures, and have become, as we hope, true Christians. Whenever an Indian thus becomes a Christian, he wants to leave his old way of living, to build himself a better house, to send his children to school,—so that, you see, religion promotes the comfort of its followers in this world as well as in the next.

But there ought to be more missionaries among the Indians. One reason why more have not been sent is, the want of money to bear their expenses. Now, if the children would keep their pennies and sixpences for the missionary box or collection, instead of spending them in buying crackers and other useless things, a large sum would be raised. If all the children in our church would do so, twenty missionaries at least might be sent to preach the gospel to the Indians. What a noble use that would be to make of your money.

It is not enough, however, to give our money to support the missionaries among the Indians and other heathen people. We ought often to pray for them. They have many difficulties and hardships to meet, and much to discourage them. We ought to ask God to bless and keep them, and to prosper them in their good work. Without his blessing they will labour in vain.—For. Miss.

THE DAY'S THREE RULES.—The Duty, the Burden, and the Lesson.—An old man called to him his son and pupil one morning, and said to him, "Theodore, have you prepared your mind for the three things?"

"What three things, father?"

"The three claims of the day, my son, concerning which I instructed you. We should enter on no day of life, without carefully inquiring what is before us, and what is expected of us."

"Now I remember," said Theodore, "they are the three rules which you desired me to say once to myself every morning on rising."

"What are these rules, my son?"

"They are these," replied Theodore, "First, Do the duty of the day; secondly, Bear the burden of the day; thirdly, Learn the lesson of the day."

"Yes, my son, and there is no day to which these do not apply. Each has its duty, its burden, and its lesson. Something has to be done, something to be borne, and something to be learned. And he who neglects no one of these three things, spends his days aright. Endeavour, Theodore, to apply these rules to some one day, which is fresh in your remembrance, as, for example, yesterday."

"I will do so," said Theodore. "The duty of yesterday was, that of making a catalogue of your books and engrossing it in a volume. This, I mean, was my grand business. There were many lesser duties, arising from my circumstances. The burden of the day was a heavy one, but I am afraid to name it, lest you laugh at me."

"Out with it."

"It was a mortification of my vanity at the rejection of my verses sent to the newspaper."

"Ah, I can believe it; mortification of pride and vanity are among our heaviest burdens."

"The lesson of the day," continued Theodore, "was taught me by a lamb in the meadow, which suffered itself to be rudely pushed about by my dog, without the least sign of resentment, and thereby soon forgot the injury and healed the wound."

"I perceive," said the old man, "that you have observed my precept, in recalling to your memory these three things, on closing your eyes for sleep. But suppose you go further, and endeavour to apply them to the future. We have but just begun a new day; how do the three rules apply to what it is likely to bring you?"

Theodore paused a little, and then replied, "The duty of the day is to go on in my studies, especially to perfect myself in what remains of geometry; and it is well you have called it to my mind, for I have to row myself across the river to get my book. The burden of the day is in great part unknown to me. I can, however, foresee something of it in these severe studies, added to the knowledge that my companions will be keeping it as a holiday. The lesson of the day, so far as not included in the geometry aforesaid, cannot be foreseen. But I shall be more on the watch for it, in consequence of your reminding."

"My son," said the old man, "it is impossible for me to tell you the advantage I have derived from the habit of looking forward every morning, and backward every evening, upon the passing day, with these three little words in my mind, THE DUTY—THE BURDEN—THE LESSON."—*S. AN ILLUSTRATION OF FAITH.—"Father," said a little Welsh boy to his parent, who had been explaining the Scriptures to his family in the hall of what was once the manor-house, but which was then occupied by a farmer—"Father, you said you would one day, when I was old enough, teach me what faith is. Am I old enough now?"

"Well, I think you are, Willy: come to me," said his father, rising from his chair.

The boy had no sooner approached, than his father raised him from the ground, and set him on the top of a double chest of drawers that stood beside the wall.

The child's colour went and came; and he was evidently afraid to stand upright in so unusual a situation.

"Now, Willy," said his father, placing himself at a little distance, and holding out his arms, "now, Willy, stand upright and jump into my arms." The child's position and the father's command were alike calculated to produce alarm, and did produce it; but the father's look was calm, and kind, and serious; and the child had invited the lesson, so he had nothing for it but to turn his mind to compliance.

Raising himself somewhat, at length he made an effort to jump, but his heart failed him, and he drew back, and stood farther from the edge of the drawers.

"Ah, Willy," said his father, "thou hast no faith: try again."

Willy thought a moment, and perceived the nature and drift of his father's experiment. He came again to the edge; and this time he did make the spring, but so imperfectly, and with so divided a mind, that he would have fallen but for a beam of the ceiling just above him, on which he clapt his hands, and recovered himself.

His father smiled, and said: "Willy, thou hast no faith yet: but that was better than the last: come, try once more."

The look of quiet love in the father's face, and his still open arms at length assured our little hero that there really was no danger; or, it may be that he saw so much to reverence and to trust in that parental smile, that he forgot the danger. Be this as it may, this third time little Willy stood bolt upright, and jumped over the dreaded gulf into his father's powerful arms. He looked up with a smile; and his father, setting him on the floor, said, "There, Willy, that was faith. There is the gulf of hell between you and eternal life; but your heavenly Father holds out for you the arms of his love, and has sent his only Son to die, and prove it to you. Trust him as you have trusted in me, and you will save your soul."

This anecdote I have put as nearly into the form, as well as I can remember, in which it was related to me. In repeating it to his class, the teacher can relate it in his own words, and add his own comment. To me it seems not only to afford a comment on the prophet's assurance, "The eternal God is thy refuge; and underneath are the everlasting arms," but more especially to supply a plain and speaking illustration of the exercise of that grace of faith, whereby alone we can "live to God," find any pleasure in the self-denying duties of life, sufficient to counterbalance the attraction of the pleasures of sin; or, in a word, save our souls.

THE POWER OF PRAYER.

Not very long ago, there lived a poor, but pious woman. Her name need not be mentioned, but she was a widow; her husband was dead, and she had but one son. He was a wicked boy, and often caused his mother's heart to ache. At length he went to sea, not caring any thing for her, but rather anxious to be out of her sight, and far removed from the sound of her earnest and affectionate advice and entreaties. Deeply and bitterly did she mourn over her wild and wayward child, but she did not abandon herself to sorrow. She remembered she had a Father in Heaven, and to him she unburdened the grief of her heart.

From the time of her son's departure, she resolved to set apart one hour every week to make him an object of special prayer. She besought God to watch over him, to keep him from falling into sin, and to convert his soul. No other engagements were permitted to set aside this duty, and regularly at the appointed hour, she withdrew from the toils and cares of the world, to plead with God for her absent boy. Days, weeks, months, and years rolled on in rapid succession, and no tidings of the young sailor were received—no letter, no kind message reached the heart-stricken mother. She was inclined to think that he must be dead, yet could not bring herself to discontinue her weekly practice of praying to God on his behalf. One evening she went into her little room, intending as usual to pray for his conversion, but not a word could she utter, she could only sigh and weep. Were those sighs and tears in vain? We shall see.

A long time after this, one warm bright summer's evening, when the beams of the setting sun cast on every thing a golden tinge, and all nature was peaceful and lovely, the poor widow was seen sitting in her cottage porch. Her countenance had a sweet but melancholy expression, and often did the unbidden tear tremble in her eye. She thought of her son, her long lost boy. As she sat there, a tall and weather-beaten sailor approached the wicket gate, and looking very wistfully at her, said, "Is Mrs.

M. at home?" "Yes, sir," she replied, not knowing to whom she spoke, "I am Mrs. M., pray what is your business?" "Oh, mother!" he exclaimed, "don't you know me? I am your son." What a joyous meeting they had, and how much they had to say of many things that had transpired during this long period of separation!

For some time after the young sailor had left, he had lived a sinful life, and endeavoured to forget all the good things he had heard. One Sabbath day, as he wandered through the streets of Calcutta, his attention was arrested by the sound of voices singing a tune that was familiar to his ear. It was one which he had sung, when sitting at his mother's side. He went into the building, (which was a chapel,) whence the sound proceeded, and when the singing was over, he thought he would stay a little to hear what the minister had to say. His attention was riveted, and his heart was touched, by what he heard from the good missionary. He lifted up his heart in prayer to God, exclaiming, "God be merciful to me a sinner!" That prayer was heard. He had bid adieu to his sinful pursuits, and his worldly companions, and returned to fill the heart of his mother with joy, and to receive her blessings.

My children, have you a mother who prays for you? Bless God for this; but, remember, your mother's prayers will not save you. Like the sailor at Calcutta, you must cry for God's mercy for yourselves.—Miss. Rep.

SENTIMENTS OF DONORS.

Some of the contributions towards paying the debt of the American Board, received since its annual meeting, are accompanied with sentiments, or are from sources, well adapted to awaken profitable meditations. A few of them are subjoined:—

"FOR THE HEATHEN. The first avails of a young minister's preaching. I can spare it better than the heathen can, though I have but little." Ten dollars were enclosed.

"A widow's thank-offering for sustaining grace; towards liquidating the debt of the Board." Thirty dollars.

"A thank-offering for the sweet privilege of being providentially permitted 'to sit in heavenly places in Christ' this day, in 'the assembly of his saints.'" Fifteen dollars from a lady.

"A woman confined to a sick bed ten years, gathered one cent at a time." One dollar.

"Please accept of the widow's mite for the missionary debt." Two dollars.

"A Friend on a sick bed." Ten dollars.

"Poor widow of a minister." Ten cents.

"God willing, I will double my subscription the coming year, for the liquidation of the debt of the Board. From one whose only dependence for the support of his family is good health, and the prayer, 'Give us this day our daily bread.'"

A donor of $250 writes:—"Never think of reducing the missions."

Another donor writes:—"I will give $1,000 towards the debt of the Board; and if measures are taken now to raise enough to pay the whole, I will increase the amount to accomplish that object."—Day Spring.

Miscellaneous.

THE CHAFF OF A CONGREGATION.—When the celebrated Mr. Irving had once exceeded, by the length of his sermon, the patience of a modern congregation, seeing several persons quietly stealing out of the chapel, he sat down in the pulpit, saying, "I shall now wait until the chaff has blown off." The reproof had the desired effect, and shamed the people into remaining quiet.

THE TAXES are, indeed, heavy—said Dr. Franklin on one occasion—and if those laid on by the government were the only ones we had to pay, we might more easily discharge them; but we have many others, and much more grievous to some of us. We are taxed twice as much by our idleness, three times as much by our pride, and four times as much by our folly: and from these taxes the commissioners cannot ease or deliver us by allowing any abatement.

THE CHOLERA.—The following are some of the suggestions published by the commissioners of the English government concerning this fearful pestilence. They may help to put our own people more upon their guard in their daily habits.

I. Observe the following sanitary arrangements in your dwelling and its neighbourhood.

1. It should be remembered that low and marshy grounds, and the neighbourhood of bogs and standing pools, are just the places for the cholera to visit and remain in for a long time.

2. Avoid the neighbourhood of uncovered drains, unless they are carefully and frequently cleansed.

3. Let every impurity—animal and vegetable—be quickly removed to a distance from your habitation, such as slaughter-houses, pig-sties, cess-pools, offensive privies, and other domestic nuisances.

If you cannot effect the removal of such nuisances, exert yourself at once to do so; and if you cannot succeed, and if you value your life, leave their neighbourhood.

4. Let every room be daily thrown open for fresh air, and avail yourself of the hours of sunshine, if there be any, and noon, when the air is most likely to be dry.

5. Study great cleanness in every part of the house, at the same time avoiding damp floors.

6. Let all the bedding and clothing be daily exposed, during winter, to the fire, and during summer to the heat of the sun.

7. Let crowding of persons within houses and apartments be avoided.

8. Avoid sleeping in low and damp rooms.

9. During the time of danger and alarm, from the presence of the cholera, let fires be kept up during the night in sleeping and adjoining apartments.

10. Do not place much reliance on what are termed "disinfectants," such as chlorine, chloride of zinc, nitrate of lead, &c. &c.

It appears from the evidence taken by the sanitary commissioners, that these things, however useful in typhus, will not avail in cholera. They will serve to conceal bad odours, but will not touch the cause that produces them. To use them with confident hope of success, is like trying to cure a bad stomach by virtue of peppermint lozenges.

II. Attend to your personal health.

1. Cultivate a cheerful frame of mind, and go about your usual business with the confident expectation that, if suitable means are used, you will, through the Divine goodness, be saved from the "pestilence that walketh in darkness." Remember that the cholera is not infectious.

You cannot expect bodily health apart from a healthy frame of mind.

2. Let excessive fatigue and exposure to damp and cold, especially during the night, be avoided.

3. Avoid cold drinks and acid liquors, especially under fatigue, or when the body is heated.

4. Avoid the use of cold acid fruits and vegetables.

5. Let ardent spirits be avoided.

6. Let a poor diet, and the use of impure water, in cooking and for drink, be avoided.

7. Let the wearing of wet and insufficient clothing be avoided. The feet, particularly, should be kept warm and dry.

8. To protect the stomach from cold, wear a broad belt of flannel, which should be frequently changed, next the skin, and around the waist.

This has been found serviceable in checking the tendency to bowel complaints, so common during the prevalence of the cholera.

9. Let personal cleanliness be carefully observed. All impurities left on the skin are absorbed into the system, where they operate most injuriously.

A NOBLE AND BLESSED DEED.—In September last, an offer of $2000 was made by a benevolent gentleman of Cincinnati, for the purchase of lands in Africa to form a new Colony of Coloured people from the western free states. The agent of the Colonization Society for Ohio, Mr. David Christy, to whom the offer was made, on communicating the fact to the Society at Washington city, was informed, says the Cincinnati Gazette, from which we take these facts, that the purchase would be made on condition that two hundred emigrants can be raised to take immediate possession of the territory. This number being present on the coast, it is believed, would repel the slave-traders and thus break up the traffic.

In order to comply with this condition, Mr. C. applied to the friends of the cause in Indiana, and they will cordially unite in the scheme. The coloured population of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, being similarly situated, and able to concentrate with equal ease at any point on the Ohio river, a wise policy will dictate that they should combine, as proposed, in emigrating to their new homes, to form a republic for themselves.

The territory between Sierra Leone and Liberia, out of which it was proposed by the Society to make the purchase, embraces about 200 miles of coast, and contains some of the darkest dens of the slave-trade. In 1837, Don Pedro Blanco shipped from Gallinas, one of the points in this territory, more slaves than were captured by all the British cruisers on the coast. The traffic is still actively carried on along this coast as far as Grand Cape Mount adjoining Liberia. The probable cost of the latter district is estimated at $3000, and the former at a larger amount. The Gallinas, however, possesses very great advantages of commerce, and will be an invaluable acquisition.

These facts being communicated to the above mentioned donor of the $2000, he at once responded to Mr. Christy, authorizing him to instruct the Society to take the necessary steps for the purchase of the whole two hundred miles, and that unless the price demanded should be exorbitant, he would at once advance the funds to pay for it.

Such an act as is here contemplated is worth living for. It will not only drive all the traffickers in human flesh from that coast, but at once emancipate many tens of thousands of slaves at present held in bondage by the kings and head men of that region. It is a free-will offering to the cause of humanity, affording additional evidence of the power possessed by the wealthy for accomplishing great good to the world.

Domestic Missions.

THE PRESENT DUTY OF THE CHURCH AS TO DOMESTIC MISSIONS.

By a reference to the proceedings of Synod, on the subject of Domestic Missions, it appears that an equitable and general distribution was made of all the services of the different persons under the direction of Synod. This is as it should be. In the distribution of the labours of the ministers, no portion of the church should be supplied at the expense of that of another. When this is the case, just cause of complaint is given to those who are neglected. A few sheep in the wilderness, in the most lonely portions of the country, should be as punctually visited, as those in the most eligible locations. None but those who have experienced it, or witnessed it, can conceive of the reviving influences produced by even a few sermons, in the year, upon those compelled to spend, what is commonly termed, "lonely Sabbaths."

But the question is, how shall the appointments of Synod be duly fulfilled? In order that this may be done, there is a present duty to be done by all concerned, namely, by the licentiates and unsettled ministers, by the pastors of congregations, by churches and by the people generally.

1. By licentiates and unsettled ministers. They should, at the appointed season, faithfully perform the duties assigned them. This should be done with a punctuality not inferior to that of meeting the obligation of a promissory note. The appointments are given by Synod and by Presbyteries, in faith of such fulfilment; they go abroad before the people, who expect them in due time; and the expectations of all concerned, even to the children, are anxiously anticipating the arrival of these supplies. When supplies are not faithfully rendered, according to appointment, and especially when the person failing gives no previous notice of his failure, the spirits of the people are cast down. Hope deferred maketh the heart sick. Confidence is lost in the appointments of the judicatories of the church, and some cause is given for reflecting on the defaulter. Nothing short of a providential interference is an adequate reason for the non-fulfilment of stated appointments. Licentiates have generally acquitted themselves well on this subject, and there is no apprehension that it will not be so in future. It is much to be desired that licentiates would furnish short notices of their services, and of the state of the vacancies, where they are called to labour, for publication in the Banner.

2. There is a present duty to be done by settled pastors. What is this? It is to lay the state of the church, both foreign and domestic, before their congregations, and to let them know what is expected of them to do, in order that the plan of Synod, for planting and watering of the church, may be fully carried out. We are to strive together for the faith of the gospel. Licentiates are not to be expected to travel over the length and breadth of our extensive country, without a reasonable support. And how is this support to be raised? In part from those to whom the ministrations are given. But it is only in part; because, that while some vacancies do raise the per diem allowance, others do not, and cannot, and that, too, where the most lengthy and expensive rides are to be undertaken by the preacher. How, then, is the remainder of the support to be raised? It is from the older, more able, and settled churches. But how will these churches be brought to act? Only by the pastors doing their present duty, in calling upon their congregations to do what Synod and the whole church expect them to do. And, in this matter, let ministers not only call the people to their duty, but let them encourage them by setting the example in contributing to this end. In this, as in other things, let them be examples to the people.

3. What is the present duty of the churches? It is, promptly, on learning from the Minutes of Synod, or from their pastors, what is their duty, to adopt measures to raise the support expected from them, as strong towards those who are weak. What these measures are, or should be, let every church, in city or country, decide for itself. The end is what is needed; the means may vary according to circumstances. But let every congregation, independently of what is done for the support of the gospel in their midst, raise a separate fund, one for Domestic Missions, one for Foreign, and one for the Seminary. These are measures that belong to the church as a whole, and, in order to execute them, the Presbyterian mode of government, it is supposed, has advantages above all other modes, whether merely voluntary, or otherwise. Were the united strength of all our congregations collected together, what a power to plant and to water, to extend the church of God, at home and abroad. We are verily persuaded, that did pastors do their duty, congregations would not fail in doing theirs. Let us all strive together, with one spirit and with one mind, for an object so noble, as the growth of the principles of the Reformed Presbyterian Church. In their diffusion, the church, the country, and the world are deeply concerned.

4. What is the duty of vacancies themselves? It is to sustain, by all means in their power, the persons who labour amongst them. The principle is never to be lost sight of, "the labourer is worthy of his hire," and if men serve them in spiritual things, is it a great thing that they who do so should reap in carnal things? It is not expected that many vacancies can sustain the supplies sent. Let them do what they can. The poor will have the gospel preached to them.

Thus, in order to carry out the plan of Synod, it is expected that every one will do his duty. This should be done promptly, vigorously and perseveringly. It is not a single effort. It is the work of our day. And who does not rejoice at the many doors that are opened and opening for the spread of divine truth. This truth, we believe, we love in its purest form. For its dissemination, at home and abroad, we ought to be proportionately zealous.

One remark more, and this article is closed. It is that appeals should be made, by the Board of Domestic Missions, and by Presbyteries, to the more wealthy, and public-spirited in the church, to raise a fund, whose end should be expressly to sustain weak congregations. There are many vacancies in our church nearly ripe for settlement, but not able to present a call for a minister to labour permanently amongst them. By a little temporary aid, given to such congregations, they could immediately call a pastor, and, in a short time, would be in a state to give aid to others. We say this aid is to be temporary. Let it be from $50 to $100, subject to a decrease of ten or more dollars, annually, till the whole be exhausted. In this way, we are verily persuaded, more can be done, in ten years, to cultivate and enlarge the church, than has been accomplished in the last fifty.

Will not every one, then, try and do his present duty? Our labour shall not be in vain in the Lord. "They that spring of Jacob shall take root; Israel shall blossom and bud, and fill the face of the world with fruit."—OBSERVER.

Total—Missionaries, 1452; Assistant Missionaries, 191; Native Assistants, 2028.

In regard to native assistants the returns are incomplete, and most of the large numbers set down are in the employment of English societies. Ministers of the gospel are classed as missionaries. Females are not enumerated.

Let the reader look at the map and observe the small spots of earth that are engaged thus in the work of bringing all their fellow-men to the knowledge of the truth. The largest territory that we can mark as the home of the supporters of protestant missions, is the United States. To these we can add, as embraced in the above table, only Germany, France, England, Scotland, and Ireland.

In the United States there are engaged in the work, the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions—the Presbyterian Board (Old School)—the Northern Baptist—the Southern Baptist—the Free will Baptist—the Northern Methodist—the Southern Methodist—the Protestant Episcopal—the American Missionary Association (Anti-slavery)—the Protestant Methodist—Reformed Presbyterian. From the United States there are Missionaries among the Indian Tribes 112—to the West Indies 5—to South America 2—to Africa 42—to Western Asia (countries approached by the Mediterranean) 37—to India and Ceylon 52—to Burmah, Siam, and Asiatic Isles 27—to China 44—to the South Sea Islands 30—to the Jews 7: total 365.

England has missionaries to the North American Indians 22—to the West Indies 183—to Africa 92—the Mediterranean countries 2—India 240—Indian Isles 3—China 20—South Sea Isles 82—Jews 31: total 675.

It will be noticed that the American missions are more extensively and equally diffused than the English in the countries named; and this fact would appear still more striking on an examination of particulars. Of all existing protestant societies, the American Board occupies most fields with the most equally divided force.

Scotland has in the West Indies 7 missionaries—in Africa 12—in India 30—among the Jews 12: total 61.

Ireland (Presbyterian) has 5 missionaries in India and 4 among the Jews: total 9.

France has 13 missionaries in the interior of South Africa.

Germany has 34 missionaries in Africa—56 in India, and 3 in China: total 93.

The United Brethren seem to have sought out the most degraded and miserable of the human race. Their missions are now confined to three regions—to the Greenlanders and Esquimaux 37—to the negroes in the West Indies 170—to South Africa 24: total 231.

It is worthy of remark, that the only missionaries to South America are two Americans, one at Valparaiso, and the other at Buenos Ayres.

To the countries approached by the Mediterranean—Greece, Syria, Western Asia, Persia, &c.—all the missionaries but two are American, and all but six (that is thirty-three) are missionaries of the American Board; and these last have been eminently successful: a very remarkable fact, when we look at the map and consider how near Europe is to those countries, and how constant the intercourse with them for other purposes. The youngest and freshest of nations is displaying its vigour in the cradle of the human race—the seat of the earliest civilization, and birth-place of Christianity. Shall we say that the circle has been completed, and that we have here a significant fact in the new era—the NOVUS ORDO SECLORUM?

Of the missionaries reckoned above as English, a very large portion are of continental birth. The English Established Church, especially, finds many of its missionaries elsewhere than in its own bosom. Those employed by the church societies from abroad are mostly German.—Vermont Chron.

A BRIEF SURVEY OF THE MISSIONARY FIELD,—JANUARY, 1849.

All intelligent persons have observed the progress that has been made within the last twenty years, in the means of conveying knowledge by steam-presses, steamships, and last of all, and most wonderful of all, the electric telegraph. When our missions in India were commenced, fifteen years ago, one hundred and twenty days' distance was reckoned to lie between the church and her missionaries; now the distance, though the same in miles, is but one-half of what it then was, in time. But on topics of this kind we do not propose here to enter.

We would rather look at the marked events of the last year, and consider their bearing on our great work. Beginning with the greatest missionary field, and the one most lately opened, China, we see a large increase in the number of protestant missionaries; a new city occupied as a station—that of Fuh Chow; prejudices greatly removed at the city longest known to foreigners,—so that the missionaries are now living among the native population, instead of being shut up in the foreign factories; and a general advance in the missionary work—more sermons preached, chapels opened, tracts prepared, the scriptures under revision, scholars instructed, and even female children presented by their parents for admission to the mission schools in larger numbers than can be received, and what is infinitely more important, souls hopefully converted unto God.

In the next great field of eastern missions, India, which has been much longer and more extensively under cultivation, we see also a decided advance in the work of the Lord. New stations have been occupied, and at the old more labour has been performed. There is yet much land to be possessed; many millions of the Hindus have never seen a minister of the gospel; but in most of the great centres of influence, missionary efforts have been made for years, and a change in the prejudices, attachments, and popular feelings of the people, is becoming apparent in many quarters. The opposition is greater—not an unfavourable sign amongst such an apathetic race; but the additions to the churches are not thereby diminished. Larger numbers of the native youth are in Christian colleges and schools, and many are under instruction for the office of catechists, teachers, and evangelists.

These two nations embrace about one-half of the population of the earth, and more than two-thirds of the heathen portion of its inhabitants. It is, therefore, with the deeper gratitude that we mark these favourable signs, and the absence of any providential discouragement to the missionary work amongst them.

We have not space for a separate consideration of each missionary field, but we see, in general, the door still open, and the prospect still encouraging in Siam, the islands of the Indo-Chinese seas and the Pacific Ocean. Africa yields fruit wherever the sickle is thrust in; no part of the harvest-field has rewarded the missionary labourer with more sheaves; alas, that the labourers there are so very few. The West India Islands, and the adjacent parts of South America, settled chiefly by people of African descent, seem to have borne witness to the remarkable readiness of the negro race to embrace the gospel. In the South American states, the day seems hardly yet to have dawned; though in some places hopeful signs of its approach are visible. The indifference of our own government to questions of a religious nature has prevented our securing, in the adjustment of our sad war with Mexico, that protection for our citizens of the protestant faith in that country, which Roman catholics of Mexico and other countries enjoy every where in our own states. Why should there not be a reciprocity of rights in this all-important matter, as well as in the pursuits of commerce? Mexico, however, we may believe, has not received unmingled injury from this unhappy conflict. New ideas have been diffused amongst her people concerning many subjects, and particularly the despotism and corruption of her priesthood, that might otherwise have been long unknown, and of which the results will be seen in future years. In the immense territories added to our government, the exclusive claims of Romanism are of course thrown to the wind, and numerous protestant ministers will soon be found employed in their high vocation. Amongst our Indian tribes, never were the hopes of the missionary more full of promise.

We turn back to Asia to have a glance at the Mohammedans, and we see them, like the Pagans, almost every where forgetting the use of the sword, even in the defence of their religion, and not using it at all in its propagation; we even see the Sublime Porte granting a law of toleration to his infidel subjects. And we see a work of grace going on silently, but with power, among the Armenians and Nestorians; who dwell in the midst of the followers of the false prophet.

The Jews cannot be overlooked. We see providential changes in their civil and political condition, in some of the European states, which will bring them into more kindly relations with their Christian neighbours; and we read of a spirit of inquiry in some places, as well as of hopeful conversions in others, that tend to confirm our belief that, with "the fulness of the gentiles," "all Israel shall be saved."

Our review would be imperfect, were we not to advert to the condition of the nominally Christian nations. We are greatly impressed with the wonderful events of the last year amongst the nations of Europe, and especially with the fact that it has been mainly on the Roman catholic countries of the Old World, that the vials of wrath seemed to have been poured out. Blood has been shed in Italy, Austria, and France. Famine, in the year preceding, had visited Ireland, and chiefly the southern counties of that unhappy country. Distress of various kinds has been felt amongst all the nations of Europe, but its burden has mainly fallen on the nations subject to the religion of Rome. And the pope, himself, after being almost worshipped by the populace for his liberality, seems now to be virtually a prisoner in his own capital, at the mercy of an ignorant and infidel mob, themselves the legitimate offspring of popery. We are little capable of understanding the dealings of the Most High towards nations. We would ever form judgments of charity as well as of humility. We have little more to hope from infidelity than from Romanism, as is manifest in the Canton de Vaud. But these things, all considered, we are still at liberty to indulge the humble hope that, as the pecuniary resources of the church of Rome and her political power become wasted away, and as the door is opened for the circulation of the Holy Scriptures, and the entrance of the minister of the gospel, God's ways, in these events, will soon appear to have been ways rather of mercy than of judgment; in the end, we trust, it will be seen that the kingdom of righteousness and peace has been greatly advanced by these political changes.

If we mistake not, then, there is a general progress of events over the whole earth in the direction of Christian knowledge and salvation. For these things, let the church of Christ be deeply grateful. Let her members humble themselves for their past lukewarmness in the cause of their Redeemer; and let them gird up the loins of their minds with new zeal and greater hopefulness for the work yet before them. "The Lord of hosts is with us."—For. Miss. Chron.—January.

PRESBYTERIAN FOREIGN MISSIONS.

RECENT INTELLIGENCE.

India: Allahabad Mission.—A letter of the Rev. J. Wray, of November 2d, mentions the continued progress of the missionary work at that city. Mr. Wray and his family were about to set out on their journey to this country.

Furrukhabad Mission.—Letters have been received of dates to the 3d of November. On the 13th of October, the Presbytery of Furrukhabad, after a full and satisfactory examination, proceeded to license Mr. J. Uhlman to preach the gospel. Mr. and Mrs. Irving were about to leave Futtehgurh on their return to this country, Mrs. Irving's health continuing very feeble. The synod of North India was to hold its first meeting at Agra, on the first of December.

Lodiana Mission.—Letters have come to hand, dated to the 7th of November. The church at Saharanpur was completed, at a cost of nearly $2000, of which about one-half was contributed by generous friends in India. The attendance of the natives on public worship was quite encouraging.

Omahaw and Ottoo Mission.—A letter of the Rev. E. M'Kinney, of November 21st, represents the prospects of this mission as still encouraging. Considerable difficulty had been met with in procuring suitable domestic help, which in so large a family of boys is indispensable. On one occasion, the hired domestics, "such as they were," having left the establishment on a few hours' notice, and Mrs. M'Kinney being in feeble health, Mr. M'Kinney and Mr. Reed had to "take the field as cooks, immediately. We worked through one week very well, and made considerable improvements in the state of affairs." Afterwards they succeeded in making other arrangements, though not of a permanent kind.—Application had been made for the admission of some Pawnee children into the school, and also the children of some half-blood Indians. A remarkable instance is mentioned of the estimate placed on education by an Indian woman. She has two "very interesting little boys in the school, the older of whom is much disposed to play truant;" but he is always corrected and sent back by his mother. On the last time of his going home, she said, "What do you come here for? I have nothing to do with you. I am an Indian. I cannot teach you any thing. I know how to put your victuals in the pot, and hang it on the fire. Is that what you want to learn? Go up to the missionary's house. There you will learn to read and write. I cannot teach you any thing." Mr. M'Kinney speaks of her as a very indulgent mother. Two persons are spoken of as giving an encouraging degree of serious attention to religious things.

Iowa Mission.—A letter from the Rev. W. Hamilton, of December 2d, reports the number of scholars in the school at thirty-five, and speaks of its prospects as now more interesting than at any former time. Mr. Hamilton adds, "I am well aware that this mission has always been a discouraging one: but with the same difficulties in prospect for ten years to come, that have been encountered during the ten that have passed, the committee, I am sure, would not, to avoid them, send these children back to grow up in heathenish darkness. It is true that many of them may cause us grief; but though the blessing may seem to tarry very long, let us hope that it will come and not tarry."—Missionary Chronicle.

ARRIVAL OF THE RE-ENFORCEMENT.

We have the pleasure of announcing that a letter has just been received from Mr. Campbell, dated, "River Hoogly, near Kedgerie, 18th November, 1848;" by which we learn that the Mission families had arrived safely almost to Calcutta. The time of their passage was one hundred and five days, and the health of all was good. In our next number we hope to publish an account of the voyage, from the pen of Mr. Woodside.

Editorial.

The first article in our present number, is the commencement of an Essay by one of the fathers of our church, which will be found interesting and valuable, at it brings scriptural principles to bear on a subject which has almost always been determined only by the impulse of the passions. While we do not doubt that war may be in some cases lawful, we must remember that the "fruit of the Spirit is peace," and we should pray and labour for the time when "men shall love war no more."

DOMESTIC MISSIONS.

The suggestions made in the article on this subject will meet, we hope, with careful attention. If the plan, which has been formed, be carried out with efficiency and adequately sustained, great good will be likely to result. We expect, in our next number, to present an address from the Board on the whole subject.

DAY OF FASTING.

We would remind our readers that the 4th Thursday, the 22d day of the present month, has been appointed by General Synod as a day of Fasting. We hope it will not be neglected. In addition to the ordinary reasons for attention to this duty, the presence, and anticipated increased virulence of the cholera should lead us to humble ourselves before God, acknowledging, with sincere penitence, our many sins, abandoning all practices contrary to the divine law, and seeking mercy through the LORD JESUS CHRIST. "Who can tell if the LORD will turn and repent, and turn away from his fierce anger, that we perish not?"

PRESBYTERIAN BOARD OF PUBLICATION.

We regret to state that the building recently purchased by the Presbyterian Board, was destroyed by fire on the 6th of last month. By this calamity the valuable stock of books, and the Library, belonging to the Board, were consumed, and their business operations considerably embarrassed. We are glad to learn that their stereotype plates were saved, and that they have re-opened their store in the building belonging to the Am. S. S. Union. Liberal subscriptions have been made in this city in aid of the Board, and we hope that their losses will soon be retrieved. We have frequently called the attention of our readers to the valuable books published by this Board, and we are sure that they feel, as we do, a deep interest in its success. We hope that soon it will be engaged in its good work with its former energy, and be, hereafter, as heretofore, a fountain of living waters sending forth its streams to make glad the city of our God.

IRISH HOME MISSION.

The Rev. Dr. Dill and Rev. Jonathan Simpson, delegates from the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, have been actively engaged since their arrival in this country, in presenting this subject to the consideration of the Christian public, and their statements have excited great interest in the minds of all who have heard them. The effort to evangelize the Roman Catholic districts of Ireland, we consider a very noble and benevolent one, and we rejoice that it appears so far to have been highly successful. In this enterprise the Irish Presbyterian Church stands almost entirely alone, and hence those who wish to do any thing in favour of this object, find in this the only, as it is, also, a most excellent, way of accomplishing their wishes. We would remind our readers of the appeal from the Irish Church on this subject, which was laid before our Synod, in 1847, and the recommendation which was given to it at that time. The document, and the proceedings in regard to it, may be found in the Banner for July, 1847. The resolution passed was as follows:

"Resolved, That Synod have heard, with deep interest, the communication now submitted to them, that they highly approve of the objects referred to, and will cordially welcome any deputation which may be sent by the Irish Presbyterian Church for such a purpose, and that they recommend the people under their care to give such deputation their encouragement and aid."

NEW EDITION OF THE TESTIMONY.

We would call the particular attention of our readers to the following circular, issued by the committee appointed by the last General Synod, to publish the new edition of the Testimony. We consider the subject one of much importance, and especially so to all who love the principles of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, and desire their perpetuation and extension. We are sure the work will be well done, and we hope that the committee will be adequately sustained.

CIRCULAR.

To the Ministers of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, in the United States, and others interested.

The undersigned were appointed by the General Synod, at its late meeting, a Committee to publish a fourth edition of the "Declaration and Testimony" of the church, with the Book of Discipline appended. To effect this, it is necessary that the funds required should be transmitted as soon as possible. All the other ministers, ruling-elders, and members of the church have the same interest in the matter, as have the Committee. The Synod did not specify the mode in which the means of publication should be obtained, and the treasurer is already considerably in advance of the funds of Synod committed to his management. The Committee, therefore, respectfully submit the following proposition:

At an expense of say, $250, the work can be stereotyped, and an edition well executed, and adequate to meet the present demand be printed. The plates being paid for, may remain the property of Synod, and the proceeds of future editions may be applied to such objects, connected with our church, as may most require it, or as may hereafter be determined. Let a collection be taken up in the various congregations to meet the first cost, and the Committee will return, in books, the amount contributed. There will, then, be no debts incurred. The Committee will be able to make their contracts at cash prices, the members of Synod will not be called upon personally to pay the bills of the mechanics, perhaps at a distant period, and the object will be accomplished with the greatest ease to the church.

The Committee view the publication of the "Testimony" not merely as a matter of dollars and cents, or of present convenience, but in its much more important bearings, as a measure for extending and perpetuating the principles of the Reformed Presbyterian Church. All concerned will want the "Book of Discipline," as yet unpublished, and the Committee, therefore, most respectfully but earnestly call upon the ministry and other members of the church to aid in the object sought.

Let a collection be taken forthwith, and be transmitted to the treasurer for this specific object.

Signed,

JOHN N. M'LEOD, Stated Clerk.

ENGRAVING OF THE LATE DR. M'LEOD.

By an advertisement on the cover it will be seen that an engraving of the late Dr. M'Leod can now be procured. We have room at present to mention only, that it is executed in Durand's best style, and a very excellent likeness.

PEACE AND WAR.

IN the Old Testament war is authorized by God himself, and directions given respecting it. Prov. xx. 18: "Every purpose is established by counsel; and with good advice make war." The same idea is repeated, Chap. xxiv. 6: "For by wise counsel thou shalt make thy war." The proverbs of Solomon are the dictates of the Holy Ghost. Making war is here allowed by divine authority, and advice given by the inspiration of Heaven about the carrying it into effect. Make war, and make it with good advice. In perfect accordance with this is the advice of Jesus Christ, Solomon's antitype. Luke xiv. 31: "What king going to make war against another king, sitteth not down first, and consulteth whether he be able to meet him, &c." Now can we suppose, for a moment, that the Spirit of God would give directions how to manage or conduct a thing in its nature contrary to the law of Christ? Would it not be blasphemy to suppose the Holy Ghost giving directions to robbers, how to rob, or to slave-dealers how to steal men? The thing which God gives directions how to perform, must be in its nature right. War, therefore, defensive war, cannot be wrong. God may, in his sovereignty, command things in themselves indifferent. In the same manner, he may prohibit similar things. He may, also, change or suspend laws predicated upon mutable relations. But that which is in its nature unholy, he never can command, and that which the moral law requires, he never can forbid. Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?

Abraham, and Moses, and Joshua, and many of the judges and kings of Israel made war with divine approbation, and even by the express command of Jehovah. War and bloodshed are not only sometimes lawful, but those who from compassion, or peace principles, or any other cause, keep back the sword, are threatened with the curse of God. Jer. lvi. 10: "Cursed be he that doeth the work of the Lord deceitfully, and cursed be he that keepeth back his sword from blood." Judges i. 23: "Curse ye Meroz, (said the angel of the Lord,) curse ye bitterly the inhabitants thereof; because they came not to the help of the Lord, to the help of the Lord against the mighty."

Those who kill in a just war, are not only acting under divine authority, but may be greatly glorifying God in the doing it. Ps. cxlix.

6: "Let the high praises of God be in their mouth, and a two-edged sword in their hand; to execute vengeance upon the heathen, and punishment upon the people; to bind their kings with chains, and their nobles with fetters of iron."

To all this it may be still objected, we admit that war was lawful in Old Testament times, but Jesus Christ has changed the whole system. We do not say that war is in its own nature unlawful, but Christ's example, which we are bound to follow, and his doctrine entirely forbids it.

We answer, Jesus Christ came not to change the nature of civil government, for it never was a typical thing. It formed no part of the system of grace, although it is made subservient to it. It is no church ordinance, and originates, not in the system of grace, but in the law of nature. It flows not from Christ as Mediator, but from God Creator, although it is one of the "all things" put under his feet to be administered by him, for the good of his body the church. The things which he changed in the gospel dispensation, were all appertaining to the church and the priesthood. But war, and the office, and duties of the civil magistrate, were none of these. Such laws as were positive, local, or peculiar to the nation of the Hebrews, expired by their own limitation. Jesus Christ came not as a civil ruler. He made no new institution of civil government, much less did he abolish it. He gave no new laws to magistrates. They were all given already, in the Old Testament. Peculiar duties were appended to the magistrate's office, arising from the peculiar character of the Jewish nation, but they did not belong to the essential character of the magistrate's office, such were many of the precepts of the judicial law, such as punishing idolaters, destroying cities, groves, &c.; just as typical things were attached to the Jewish church, which formed no part of the essential character of the church but were appended to it.

Much is said about the example of Christ, and the application made of it by the non-resistance party is most unwarrantable. It is true that he has left us an example, that we should follow his steps, but they are only such steps as we can follow—not all the steps of the Saviour. He laid down his life, when none else could take it from him. Are we to do so? If we do, we are guilty of self-murder, while he was not, for he had power to lay down his life, which we have not. Paul defended his life before his judges. Jesus did not. His submitting to the unjust sentence, without pleading his own cause, or taking any step to save his life, is no example for us to follow. He even tells his disciples that they might be in such danger that he that had no sword should "sell his garment and buy one." It is true that they who take the sword,—who, without a just and lawful call, run immediately to the sword to revenge themselves, shall, in an ordinary way, perish by the sword. But this says nothing against using the sword for self-defence as it is highly probable the disciples did, for the evangelists inform us that they had two swords among them, which Christ might allow them to use in their own defence, although he would not in his. His object was to die for the salvation of his people, and that death was to be viewed as the death of a criminal, for they for whom he died were guilty. Therefore he must be "cut off," and not die a natural death. Thus he was brought to the slaughter, and as a sheep before his shearers is dumb, so he opened not his mouth. Is this a rule for every innocent person on his trial, where falsely accused, and about unjustly to be put to death? Would this be using all lawful endeavours to preserve our own lives, which we are bound to do by the law of God? The death of Christ being peculiar, and extraordinary, is, therefore, not for our imitation, as non-resistants would contend.

War, in defence of right, is not, in the nature of it, condemned by the Saviour himself. John xviii. 36: "If my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight." Christ does not condemn fighting in that kingdom to which it is suitable. But as Christ's kingdom is spiritual, consisting in a dominion over men's souls and consciences, carnal weapons do not suit it, or belong to it. But are secular affairs, and civil governments spiritual? Certainly not. This is the grand and leading error of the non-resistance scheme, it makes all things spiritual. It destroys the human body, to make the man all soul. The kingdoms of this world are not the spiritual kingdom of Christ. And yet they are to become "kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ." And still they will be kingdoms of this world. They never will become the kingdom of grace, for that is but one. They are still kingdoms, after they become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ. Nations, as such, are still of this world. They are not spiritual corporations. They are subjects of the divine government, and are amenable to the law of God. They are required to acknowledge Messiah, as the "prince of the kings of the earth," by taking his law as the law paramount, by which all their constitutions and laws are to be regulated; otherwise they are not the ordinance of God, and are not to be recognised as that civil government to which obedience is due for conscience' sake, whatever submission may be yielded for wrath's sake, as we obey the commands of a robber demanding our purse, for fear of wrath, lest he should do worse, and we suffer more by refusing. Still obedience even for wrath's sake, must be in physical evils only; between moral evils we have no choice. Every moral evil is sin, and we may not commit sin. We never may do evil that good may come. Better suffer than sin. The non-resistance society say, "The dogma, that all governments of the world are approvingly ordained of God, and that THE POWERS THAT BE, in the United States, in Russia, in Turkey, are in accordance with his will, is not less absurd than impious." To this we most heartily subscribe. But is this dogma generally believed? Or is it believed at all, except by tyrants, despots, and slave-holders, and their abettors and supporters? Was it believed by the English at the Revolution in 1688? Was it believed by the Americans at our own revolution? Was it believed by the French nation at their own revolutions? Was it ever believed by the great body of any nation? The governments which both the Old and New Testaments declare to be "approvingly ordained of God," are moral, and not immoral governments. In the Old Testament, the law is plain and explicit. Deut. xvii. 15: "Thou shalt in any wise set him king over thee, whom the Lord thy God shall choose, one from among thy brethren—thou mayest not set a stranger over thee, which is not thy brother." 2 Sam. xxiii. 3: "The God of Israel said,—He that ruleth over men, must be just, ruling in the fear of God." Exod. xviii. 21: "Moreover, thou shalt provide, out of all the people, able men, such as fear God, men of truth, hating covetousness; and place such over them to be rulers." All unjust, incapable, ungodly men—strangers to religion and moral justice, are hereby excluded from God's ordinance of civil government.

[To be concluded.]

THE WORD "SELAH."—The translators of the Bible have left the Hebrew word SELAH, which occurs so often in the Psalms, as they found it, and of course the English reader often asks his minister, or some learned friend, what it means. And the minister, or learned friend, has often been obliged to confess ignorance, because it is a matter in regard to which the most learned have by no means been of one mind. The Targums and most of the Jewish commentators give to the word the meaning of eternally, for ever. Rabbi Kimchi regards it as a sign to elevate the voice. The authors of the Septuagint translation appear to have regarded it as a musical or rhythmical note. Herder regards it as indicating a change of tone. Matheson thinks it is a musical note equivalent, perhaps, to the word repeat. According to Luther, and others, it means silence. Gesenius explains it to mean: "Let the instruments play, and the singers stop." Wocher regards it as equivalent to sursum corda,—up, my soul. Sommer, after examining all the passages in which the word occurs, recognises, in every case, "an actual appeal or summons to Jehovah. They are calls for aid and prayers to be heard, expressed either with entire directness, or if not in the imperative—'Hear, Jehovah, or Awake, Jehovah,' and the like, still earnest addresses to God that he would remember and hear," &c. The word, itself, he regards as indicating a blast of trumpets by the priests. Selah, itself, he thinks an abridged expression used for Higgsion Selah—Higgsion indicating the sound of the stringed instruments, and Selah a vigorous blast of trumpets.—Bibliotheca Sacra.

FLEMING'S APOCALYPTICAL KEY.*

PROPHECIES AND THEIR FULFILMENT.—Miracles, we are told, cannot now be looked for, as they were only permitted, by Divine goodness, to those ages when faith was not firmly established, and revelation needed the active and visible interference of Divine influence to make its way into the heart of denying man. Thus much for a prelude. We said yesterday that we should resume to-day the consideration of the extraordinary circumstances attending the flight of the head of the Papal Church. In these days of revolution, the mere flight of a Papal prince is certainly not more extraordinary than the startling events that are now almost daily transpiring in continental Europe; but when it is taken into consideration that this event, which has filled the Roman Catholic world with fear and apprehension, was prophesied nearly one hundred and forty years ago, we may well exclaim, "Verily, the age of miracles has not passed!" The prophet in question—for he surely deserves that name—flourished during the reign of William III. We allude to the Rev. Robert Fleming. We have before us the December number of Blackwood's Magazine, in which there is an elaborate review of Mr. Fleming's prophecies. From this review we make up the following article.

The Rev. Robert Fleming was the Protestant minister of the Scotch churches at Rotterdam and Leyden, and afterwards of the Presbyterian church of Lothbury, during the reign of William III.; he was renowned for his piety as well as his learning, and was even much favoured by the reigning monarch. His Discourse Concerning the Rise and Fall of Papacy, in which the prophetic deductions have been formed, was published in the year 1701. The species of mystical history of the Romish church, which forms the main subject of his work, is sought for entirely by the author in the prophetic enunciations of the book of Revelation; and in order to attach a great interest to his interpretations, and the deductions thence drawn, it is necessary to accept a priori, as a matter of faith, those postulata, which the author considers certain at his very outset, and which he sets down as incontrovertible, namely, that "The Revelation contains the series of all the remarkable events and changes of the state of the Christian church to the end of the world," that "The mystical Babylon doth typify Rome in an anti-Christian church state;" that "The seven heads of the beast are indubitably the seven forms of government that obtained among the Romans;" and that, consequently, "The grand apocalyptic question answers the great anti-christ," which is thus assumed to be papal Rome. Once more, it is not our present purpose to enter into any theological discussions: we do no more than place before our readers the curious and interesting deduction of a divine celebrated for his piety, his learning, and his sacred research.

The key with which Fleming proceeds to open the mysteries of what he calls "the dark apocalyptic times and periods," is certainly of singularly ingenious construction. He commences by entering into a proof that the different periods mentioned, of 1260 days, of forty-two months, and of "a time, times, and a half," are absolutely synchronical, and refer exactly to the same period of time, being meant to describe the duration of the anti-christian kingdom; and that each day must be taken to mean prophetically a year, or Julian year of that age. By a similarly ingenious calculation, relative to the dates and times of days, he ascribes the period, as regards the church, to the so-called rotations of the all-enlightening sun; and as refers to the beast, to the rotations of the unstable moon. Upon these calculations he goes on, with singularly marvellous ability, and an infinite patience of minute reckoning, to comment upon the apocalyptic prophecies. He traces thus the regular series of the prophecy, in the opening of the seven seals, which, in his application of historical events, he refers to the condition of the Christian church, during the Roman empire; of the seven trumpets, as bearing relation to the gradual growth and increase of the anti-christian enemies of the church; and, lastly of the seven vials, as plagues and judgments poured out upon that Babylon, which he assumes to be "Rome Papal," and the vials, more especially, he argues upon, as types of the struggles between the Roman and Reformed parties, each vial typifying an event, or conclusion of some new periodical attack of the former upon the latter.

It is not necessary to follow the ingenious and indefatigable commentator through all his explanations of the other vials; we only refer to his deductions as bearing upon "Prophecies for the Present." Our business lies chiefly with his interpretation of the fifth vial, inasmuch as, by his system of calculation, he predicts the fulfilment of this vial for a period, which, by a singular coincidence at least, he fixes between the two dates of 1794 and 1848. It is the express mention of this latter year which naturally attracts the attention as an extraordinary coincidence, at a moment when, in that year, so many convulsions and so many events important in the history of the world, have taken place. There is no precise prophetic deduction, however, attached by the interpreter to this latter datum, except that he fixes it as the period of the fall, or at least of the tottering and probable decline, of the Papal power.

We now see, in 1848, a perfect fulfilment of this prophecy. The papal power is not only in a tottering and declining state, but the startling intelligence has reached us of the flight of the head of the Papal Church. It may not be out of the way here to add, that the Rev. John Wesley, the founder of Methodism, made a similar prophecy to that of Fleming, more than fifty years ago—and, like Fleming, designating the year 1848—if our memory serves us—for the period of its fulfilment.

Coincidences, predictions, revelations—all may, perhaps, be looked upon, by the skeptically reasoning mind of plain matter-of-fact, with scorn. To such, then, they are here only given as curious matters of historical interest. At the same time, in the uncertainty as to the issue of the convulsions under the throes of which Europe at present writhing, the troubled mind may surely attach itself to the obscure revelations of such strange announcements, and endeavour clearly to see its way through all their dimness, without too much deserving the stigma usually attached to superstitious credulity.—*Phila. Practical Essays. I

MY AUNT DEBORAH.

Be kindly affectioned one to another.—Rom. xii. 10.

Never was a better meaning woman in the world than my Aunt Deborah; but yet, never did any one act with less judgment in many things. She was, undoubtedly, a christian woman; not only fearing God herself, but desiring that others might fear him too; yet having but a moderate understanding, and being somewhat of a bigot in her disposition, she was always harping on the same string: always repeating those parts of Scripture which were most in unison with her own views, instead of looking at the whole word of God as a boundless mine of inexhaustible treasures, and a fount of unspeakable consolation. She had her favourite books in the Scriptures, her favourite chapters, and her favourite verses, as perhaps we all have; but she too much disregarded the remainder, and thereby became confirmed in her peculiar views, and deprived herself of much edification. She was one of those abrupt and churlish Christians who appear to delight in throwing a text of Scripture at your head, rather than in affectionately inscribing it on your heart. I do not wish to speak hardly of my Aunt Deborah, for I have reason to honour her memory, not only on account of her many acts of charity to others, but also for her great kindness to myself; but my motive is to point out the great advantage of Christians mingling kindness and affection with the commonest actions of life. Had my aunt done this toward me, I think I should have profited much more by her instructions; and I am sure that I should have loved her much more than I did. I know that young people ought to bear with those that are older than themselves; for, frequently, there are lurking infirmities in the body and mind of aged people, which render them more abrupt, and peevish, and severe than they should be; and I look back with sorrow to many instances wherein I did not bear, as I ought to have done, with the infirmities of my Aunt Deborah. We are exhorted in the word of God to put on "kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, long-suffering, forbearing one another, and forgiving, one another."

When I was young, I lived for some time with my aunt; and then it was that my mind was impressed with her apparent want of kindness and judgment. She did not seem to know what was going on in my heart, otherwise she would doubtless have managed me better than she did; for a kind word brought down my proud spirit, but an unkind one made me obstinate and wilful.

She had a very abrupt way of bringing forward Scripture: her intention was good, but, as I said before, she had little judgment. Had she taken pains to explain the passages she quoted, they might have been useful; but as it was, they only puzzled me. One day, she said to me,—"Robert, you are 'wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked,' and you do not know it." It was very true, certainly, that I did not know it, and it was equally true that I did not believe it. Wretched and miserable! why there was not a lighter hearted lad in the parish; and as for being poor, I had in my pocket at that very time, the half-crown given me by my uncle Joseph; no eyesight could be better than mine, for I could see to pick up a pin in the twilight; and it was but the week before that William Brooks the tailor brought me home a new suit of clothes. Now how was it to be expected that a thoughtless lad, under such circumstances, could understand such a text of Scripture when applied to him, without it being explained. I know now that "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness," but I did not know it then; and my aunt took no pains to instruct me, thinking she had done her duty when she had addressed to me a text of Scripture.

It would be unreasonable to expect to find Christians free from infirmity, however it may have pleased God to bestow upon them the riches of his grace: but the grace of God usually does much in softening the rugged hearts of his creatures, and in tempering them with kindness. "The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance."

I remember on one occasion, that a poor lad, heavily laden, fell down and cut his knee sadly, so that he was no longer able to sustain his load, which he had to carry a full mile further. I pitied the poor lad, and helped him to carry his load all the way: and when I came back, I told my aunt Deborah all about it, and added, that in the chapter which we had read that morning there was the text, "Bear ye one another's burdens." My aunt peevishly replied, she supposed that I meant to get to heaven by such things, but that I was sadly deceiving myself. The Scripture said, "Not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy, he saved us."

Now there is not a more gracious truth in the whole word of God than that quoted by my aunt Deborah: and if I had really considered the act of carrying the poor lad's burden as a work of righteousness, and entertained any expectations of heaven for it, the text might have reproved me for my error; but, as I had no idea of either the one or the other, I considered that my aunt was reproving me for assisting the poor lad, and I thought to myself, what a hard-hearted woman is my aunt Deborah!

Our judgment, and, indeed, every gift of our Heavenly Father, has been given to us for useful purposes: and we should use it in reading and applying the word of God as well as on other occasions; but my poor aunt Deborah seemed to think that her favourite passages of Scripture were suitable to every person, and on all occasions; but there is a rightly dividing the word of truth, and a proper application of it, that we may be instructed, and reproofed, and comforted according to our wants and necessities.

To offer the consolations and encouragements of the gospel to hard-hearted and unrepenting sinners when they require reproof, is to cast "pearls before swine;" and to threaten with the terrors of the law the humbled and penitential believer in Jesus Christ when he stands in need of encouragement, is only breaking the bruised reed and quenching the smoking flax. The word of God is too precious to be used carelessly: it should never be spoken without reverence, nor heard without a desire profit. My aunt Deborah was too bitter in her expressions against those whose religious opinions were different from her own. If they were ministers of the gospel, she likened them to "whited sepulchres which indeed appear beautiful outwardly, but are within full of dead men's bones." And if they were not ministers, they were hypocrites, "having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof." She appeared to have more pleasure in reproving, than in amending a fault; and this quality in her led me into the error of supposing that it was her religion that made her so churlish and severe: but no; it was her infirmity, and not her religion, which gave her this unkind and unlovely appearance.

The disciples of the Redeemer are all required to be "kindly affectioned one to another." "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another." Whenever, then, we are churlish, and unkind, and bitter towards each other, we are disobeying the law of Christ. It was a sad thing, but the longer I lived with my aunt Deborah, the more prejudiced I was against religious people. After a time I was removed from her, and dwelt in a habitation where a profession of religion was accompanied with kindness, and forbearance, and charity. Pity it is that they should ever be disunited! Here I had every advantage: and I can now look back with unfeigned thankfulness to that time when I was led into the way of peace, and affectionately instructed to remember my Creator in the days of my youth.

Frequently did I visit my aunt Deborah; but to the day of her death she always showed the same churlish and severe disposition. She was constant in her religious duties; just in all her dealings; charitable to the poor; and much more kind to all in her deeds than she was in her words: but her infirmity was that of a churlish spirit, and this sadly overshadowed her good qualities.

Who is there without infirmity? Reader! whatever yours and mine may be, let us in sincerity strive to know and overcome them; seeking through the grace of the Redeemer, that disposition which will enable us to abound in love one towards another. Thus shall we imitate the good qualities, without partaking of the infirmity of my aunt Deborah.

WORLDLY-MINDEDNESS.—What is the reason many know their shops better than their hearts, and are acquainted with the temper of their body more than with the constitution of their souls; that they are so careful and industrious in the prosecution of their worldly designs, so negligent and remiss in looking after heaven? What is, or can be, the reason of these things, but that inordinate love and affection they have for money, or the things of this world, which makes them so eager in the pursuit of them, that they forget that they have any thing else to mind; and so much taken up with worldly business, that God, and Christ, and heaven, and soul and all must give way to it!

O, the folly and madness of sinful men! What a strange, corrupt, and degenerate thing the heart of man becomes, that we should be so foolish and unwise as to prefer our bodies before our souls, earth before heaven, toys and trifles before the eternal God, and the worst of evils before the best of goods, even sin itself, with all the miseries that attend it, before holiness and that eternal happiness which is promised to it; and all for nothing else than the love of a little pelf and trash, which hath no other worth but what our own distracted fancies put upon it!

Bishop Beveridge.

A FAITHFUL STEWARD.—An agent, soliciting funds for a certain benevolent object, called upon the minister of a poor country town, made known his object, and inquired of that minister, whether there were any individuals in his parish who would contribute for that object. The minister answered, "No." Then, checking himself, he said, "We have, however, one man who considers himself as a steward of the property of God. Perhaps he would give something. You will find him upon the mountain yonder." The agent toiled up the steep ascent, and approached his dwelling. It was built of logs, and its door was opened by a leather string. He entered and made known the object of his visit. "We have," said the benevolent farmer, "for several years considered all the products of our farm, as the Lord's property, to be devoted to some good object, above what is necessary for the supply of our wants. We have so disposed of the whole this year, excepting one article, that is our cheese. It may be worth twenty or twenty-five dollars. We had not determined to what object to devote it. We will give you that." This man, living in his cabin of logs, and cultivating a small farm upon the mountain, was accustomed to give for purposes of benevolence, about three hundred dollars yearly.

A VISIT TO THE CELESTIAL CITY.

Not a great while ago, passing through the gate of dreams, I visited that region of the earth in which lies the famous city of Destruction. It interested me much to learn, that, by the public spirit of some of the inhabitants, a rail-road has recently been established between this populous and flourishing town and the Celestial City. Having a little time upon my hands, I resolved to gratify a liberal curiosity by making a trip thither. Accordingly, one fine morning, after paying my bill at the hotel, and directing the porter to stow my luggage behind a coach, I took my seat in the vehicle, and set out for the station-house. It was my good fortune to enjoy the company of a gentleman—one Mr. Smooth-it-away—who, though he had never actually visited the Celestial City, yet seemed as well acquainted with its laws, customs, policy and statistics, as with those of the city of Destruction, of which he was a native townsman. Being, moreover, a director of the rail-road corporation and one of its largest stockholders, he had it in his power to give me all desirable information respecting that praiseworthy enterprise.

Our coach rattled out of the city, and, at a short distance from its outskirts, passed over a bridge of elegant construction, but somewhat too slight, as I imagined, to sustain any considerable weight. On both sides lay an extensive quagmire, which could not have been more disagreeable either to sight or smell, had all the kennels of the earth emptied their pollution there.

"This," remarked Mr. Smooth-it-away, "is the famous Slough of Despond—a disgrace to all the neighbourhood; and the greater, that it might so easily be converted into firm ground."

"I have understood," said I, "that efforts have been made for that purpose, from time immemorial. Bunyan mentions that above twenty thousand cart loads of wholesome instructions had been thrown in here, without effect."

"Very probably,—and what effect could be anticipated from such unsubstantial stuff?" cried Mr. Smooth-it-away. "You observe this convenient bridge. We obtained a sufficient foundation for it, by throwing into the Slough some editions of books of morality, volumes of French philosophy and German rationalism, tracts, sermons and essays of modern clergymen, extracts from Plato, Confucius, and various Hindoo sages, together with a few ingenious commentaries upon texts of scripture—all of which, by some scientific process, have been converted into a mass like granite. The whole bog might be filled up with similar matter."

It really seemed to me, however, that the bridge vibrated and heaved up and down, in a frightful manner; and in spite of Mr. Smooth-it-away's testimony to the solidity of its foundation, I should be loath to cross it in a crowded omnibus; especially if each passenger were encumbered with as heavy luggage as that gentleman and myself. Nevertheless, we got over without accident, and soon found ourselves at the station-house. This very neat and spacious edifice is erected on the site of the little Wicket Gate, which formerly, as all old pilgrims will recollect, stood directly across the highway, and, by its inconvenient narrowness, was a great obstruction to the traveller of liberal mind and expansive front. The reader of John Bunyan will be glad to know, that Christian's old friend, Evangelist, who was accustomed to supply each pilgrim with a mystic roll, now presides at the ticket office. Some malicious persons, it is true, deny the identity of this reputable character with the Evangelist of old times, and even pretend to bring competent evidence of an imposture. Without involving myself in the dispute, I shall merely observe, that, so far as my experience goes, the square pieces of pasteboard, now delivered to passengers, are much more convenient and useful along the road, than the antique roll of parchment. Whether they will be as readily received at the gate of the Celestial City, I decline giving an opinion.

A large number of passengers were already at the station-house, awaiting the departure of the cars. By the aspect and demeanour of these persons, it was easy to judge that the feelings of the community had undergone a very favourable change, in reference to the celestial pilgrimage. It would have done Bunyan's heart good to see it. Instead of a lonely and ragged man, with a huge burden upon his back, plodding along sorrowfully on foot, while the whole city hooted after him, here were parties of the first gentry and most respectable people in the neighbourhood, setting forth towards the Celestial City, as cheerfully as if the pilgrimage were merely a summer tour. Among the gentlemen were characters of deserved eminence—magistrates, politicians, and men of wealth, by whose example religion could not but be greatly recommended to their meaner brethren. In the ladies' apartment, too, I rejoiced to distinguish some of those flowers of fashionable society, who are so well fitted to adorn the most elevated circles of the Celestial City. There was much pleasant conversation about the news of the day, topics of business, politics, or the lighter matters of amusement; while religion, though indubitably the main thing at heart, was thrown tastefully into the back-ground. Even an infidel would have heard little or nothing to shock his sensibility.

One great convenience of the new method of going on pilgrimage, I must not forget to mention. Our enormous burdens, instead of being carried on our shoulders, as had been the custom of old, were all snugly deposited in the baggage car, and, as I was assured, would be delivered to their respective owners at their journey's end. Another thing likewise the benevolent reader will be delighted to understand. It may be remembered that there was an ancient feud between Prince Beelzebub and the keeper of the Wicket Gate, and that the adherents of the former distinguished personage were accustomed to shoot deadly arrows at honest pilgrims, while knocking at the door. This dispute, much to the credit, as well of the illustrious potentate above mentioned, as of the worthy and enlightened directors of the rail-road, has been pacifically arranged, on the principle of mutual compromise. The Prince's subjects are now pretty numerously employed about the station-house; some in taking care of the baggage, others in collecting fuel, feeding the engines, and such congenial occupations; and I can conscientiously affirm, that persons more attentive to their business, more willing to accommodate, or more generally agreeable to the passengers, are not to be found on any rail-road. Every good heart must surely exult at so satisfactory an arrangement of an immemorial difficulty.

"Where is Mr. Great-heart?" inquired I. "Beyond a doubt, the directors have engaged that famous old champion to be chief conductor on the rail-road."

"Why, no," said Mr. Smooth-it-away, with a dry cough, "he was offered the situation of brakeman; but, to tell you the truth, our friend Great-heart has grown preposterously stiff and narrow, in his old age. He has so often guided pilgrims over the road, on foot, that he considers it a sin to travel in any other fashion. Besides, the old fellow had entered so heartily into the ancient feud with Prince Beelzebub, that he would have been perpetually at blows or ill language with some of the prince's subjects, and thus have embroiled us anew. So, on the whole, we were not sorry when honest Great-heart went off to the Celestial City in a huff, and left us at liberty to choose a more suitable and accommodating man. Yonder comes the conductor of the train. You will probably recognise him at once."

The engine at this moment took its station in advance of the cars, looking,

I must confess, much more like a sort of mechanical demon that would hurry us to the infernal regions, than a laudable contrivance for smoothing our way to the Celestial City. On its top sat a personage almost enveloped in smoke and flame, which—not to startle the reader—appeared to gush from its own mouth and stomach, as well as from the engine's brazen front.

"Do my eyes deceive me?" cried I. "What is this? A living creature?—If so, he is own brother to the engine that he rides upon."

"Poh, poh, you are obtuse," said Mr. Smooth-it-away, with a hearty laugh. "Don't you know Apollyon, Christian's old enemy, with whom he fought so fierce a battle in the Valley of Humiliation? He was the very fellow to manage the engine; and so we have reconciled him to the custom of going on pilgrimage, and engaged him as chief conductor."

"Bravo, bravo," exclaimed I with irrepressible enthusiasm, "this shows the liberality of the age; this proves, if any thing can, that all musty prejudices are in a fair way to be obliterated. And how will Christian rejoice to hear of this happy transformation of his old antagonist! I promise myself great pleasure in informing him of it, when we reach the Celestial City."

The passengers being all comfortably seated, we now rattled away merrily, accomplishing a greater distance in ten minutes than Christian probably trudged over in a day. It was laughable as we glanced along, as it were, at the tail of a thunderbolt, to observe two dusty foot-travellers, in the old pilgrim guise, with cockle-shell and staff, their mystic rolls of parchment in their hands, and their intolerable burdens on their backs. The preposterous obstinacy of these honest people, in persisting to groan and stumble along the difficult pathway, rather than take advantage of modern improvements, excited great mirth among our wiser brotherhood. We greeted the two pilgrims with many pleasant gibes and a roar of laughter; whereupon they gazed at us with such woful and absurdly compassionate visages, that our merriment grew tenfold more obstreperous. Apollyon, also, entered heartily into the fun, and contrived to flirt the smoke and flame of the engine, or of his own breath, into their faces, and envelop them in an atmosphere of scalding steam. These little practical jokes amused us mightily, and doubtless afforded the pilgrims the gratification of considering themselves martyrs.

At some distance from the rail-road, Mr. Smooth-it-away pointed to a large antique edifice, which, he observed, was a tavern of long standing and had formerly been a noted stopping-place for pilgrims. In Bunyan's road-book it is mentioned as the Interpreter's House.

"I have long had a curiosity to visit that old mansion," remarked I.

"It is not one of our stations, as you perceive," said my companion. "The keeper was violently opposed to the rail-road; and well he might be, as the track left his house of entertainment on one side, and thus was pretty certain to deprive him of all his reputable customers. But the foot-path still passes his door; and the old gentleman now and then receives a call from some simple traveller, and entertains him with fare as old-fashioned as himself."

Before our talk on this subject came to a conclusion, we were rushing by the place where Christian's burden fell from his shoulders, at the sight of the Cross. This served as a theme for Mr. Smooth-it-away, Mr. Live-for-the-world, Mr. Hide-sin-in-the-heart, Mr. Scaly-conscience, and a knot of gentlemen from the town of Shun-repentance, to descant upon the inestimable advantages resulting from the safety of our baggage. Myself, and all the passengers, indeed, joined with great unanimity in this view of the matter; for our burdens were rich in many things esteemed precious throughout the world; and, especially, we each of us possessed a great variety of favourite habits, which we trusted would not be out of fashion, even in the polite circles of the Celestial City. It would have been a sad spectacle to see such an assortment of valuable articles tumbling into the sepulchre. Thus pleasantly conversing on the favourable circumstances of our position, as compared with those of past pilgrims, and of narrow-minded ones at the present day, we soon found ourselves at the foot of the Hill Difficulty. Through the very heart of this rocky mountain a tunnel had been constructed of most admirable architecture, with a lofty arch and a spacious double track; so that, unless the earth and rocks should chance to crumble down, it will remain an eternal monument of the builder's skill and enterprise. It is a great though incidental advantage, that the materials from the heart of the Hill Difficulty have been employed in filling up the Valley of Humiliation; thus obviating the necessity of descending into that disagreeable and unwholesome hollow.

"This is a wonderful improvement, indeed," said I. "Yet I should have been glad of an opportunity to visit the Palace Beautiful, and be introduced to the charming young ladies—Miss Prudence, Miss Piety, Miss Charity and the rest—who have the kindness to entertain pilgrims there."

"Young ladies!" cried Mr. Smooth-it-away, as soon as he could speak for laughing. "And charming young ladies. Why, my dear fellow, they are old maids every soul of them—prim, starched, dry and angular—and not one of them, I will venture to say, has altered so much as the fashion of her gown, since the days of Christian's pilgrimage."

"Ah, well," said I, much comforted, "then I can very readily dispense with their acquaintance."

The respectable Apollyon was now putting on the steam at a prodigious rate; anxious, perhaps, to get rid of the unpleasant reminiscences connected with the spot where he had so disastrously encountered Christian. Consulting Mr. Bunyan's road-book, I perceived that we must now be within a few miles of the Valley of the Shadow of Death; into which doleful region, at our present speed, we should plunge much sooner than seemed at all desirable. In truth, I expected nothing better than to find myself in the ditch on one side, or the quag on the other. But, on communicating my apprehensions to Mr. Smooth-it-away, he assured me that the difficulties of this passage, even in its worst condition, had been vastly exaggerated, and that, in its present state of improvement, I might consider myself as safe as on any rail-road in Christendom.

Even while we were speaking, the train shot into the entrance of this dreaded valley. Though I pleaded guilty to some foolish palpitations of the heart during our headlong rush over the causeway here constructed, yet it were unjust to withhold the highest encomiums on the boldness of its original conception and the ingenuity of those who executed it. It was gratifying, likewise, to observe how much care had been taken to dispel the everlasting gloom, and supply the defect of cheerful sunshine, not a ray of which has ever penetrated among these awful shadows. For this purpose, the inflammable gas, which exudes plentifully from the soil, is collected by means of pipes, and thence communicated to a quadruple row of lamps, along the whole extent of the passage. Thus a radiance has been created, even out of the fiery and sulphurous crust that rests for ever upon the valley; a radiance, hurtful, however, to the eyes, and somewhat bewildering, as I discovered by the changes which it wrought in the visages of my companions. In this respect, as compared with natural daylight, there is the same difference as between truth and falsehood; but if the reader has ever travelled through the dark valley, he will have learned to be thankful for any light that he could get; if not from the sky above, then from the blasted soil beneath. Such was the red brilliancy of these lamps, that they appeared to build walls of fire on both sides of the track, between which we held our course with lightning speed, while a reverberating thunder filled the valley with its echoes. Had the engine run off the track—a catastrophe, it is whispered, by no means unprecedented—the bottomless pit, if there be any such place, would undoubtedly have received us. Just as some dismal fooleries of this nature had made my heart quake, there came a tremendous shriek, careering along the valley, as if a thousand fiends had burst their lungs to utter it, but which proved to be merely the whistle of the engine, on arriving at a stopping-place.

The spot where we had now paused is the same that our friend Bunyan—a truthful man, but infected with many fantastic notions—has designated, in terms plainer than I like to repeat, as the mouth of the infernal regions. This, however, must be a mistake; inasmuch as Mr. Smooth-it-away, while we remained in the smoky and lurid cavern, took occasion to prove that Tophet had not even a metaphorical existence. The place, he assured us, is no other than the crater of a half extinct volcano, in which the directors had caused forges to be set up for the manufacture of rail-road iron. Hence, also, is obtained a plentiful supply of fuel for the use of the engines. Whoever had gazed into the dismal obscurity of the broad cavern mouth, whence ever and anon darted huge tongues of dusky flame—and had seen the strange, half-shaped monsters, and visions of faces horribly grotesque, into which the smoke seemed to breathe itself—and had heard the awful murmurs, and shrieks, and deep shuddering whispers of the blast, sometimes forming itself into words almost articulate—would have seized upon Mr. Smooth-it-away's comfortable explanation as greedily as we did. The inhabitants of the cavern, moreover, were unlovely personages, dark, smoke-begrimed, generally deformed, with mis-shapen feet, and a glow of dusky redness in their eyes; as if their hearts had caught fire, and were blazing out of the upper windows. It struck me as a peculiarity, that the labourers at the forge, and those who brought fuel to the engine, when they began to draw short breath, positively emitted smoke from their mouth and nostrils.

Among the idlers about the train, most of whom were puffing cigars, which they had lighted at the flame of the crater, I was perplexed to notice several, who, to my certain knowledge, had heretofore set forth by rail-road to the Celestial City. They looked dark, wild, and smoky, with a singular resemblance, indeed, to the native inhabitants; like whom, also, they had a disagreeable propensity to ill-natured gibes and sneers, the habits of which had wrought a settled contortion of their visages. Having been on speaking terms with one of these persons—an indolent, good-for-nothing fellow, who went by the name of Take-it-easy—I called to him, and inquired what was his business there.

“Did you not start,” said I, “for the Celestial City?”

“That’s a fact,” said Mr. Take-it-easy, carelessly puffing some smoke into my eyes, “but I heard such bad accounts, that I never took pains to climb the hill on which the city stands. No business doing—no fun going on—nothing to drink, and no smoking allowed—and a thrumming of church-music from morning till night. I would not stay in such a place, if they offered me house-room and living free.”

“But, my good Mr. Take-it-easy,” cried I, “why take up your residence here, of all places in the world?”

“Oh,” said the loafer, with a grin, “it is very warm hereabouts, and I meet with plenty of old acquaintances, and altogether the place suits me. I hope to see you back again, some day soon. A pleasant journey to you.”

While he was speaking, the bell of the engine rang, and we dashed away, after dropping a few passengers, but receiving no new ones. Rattling onward through the valley, we were dazzled with the fiercely gleaming gas lamps, as before; and ever and anon grim faces, that bore the aspect and expression of individual sins or evil passions, seemed to thrust themselves through the veil of light, glaring upon us, and stretching forth a great dusky hand, as if to impede our progress. I almost thought that they were my own sins that appalled me there. These were freaks of imagination—nothing more—mere delusions, which I ought to be heartily ashamed of; but all through the dark valley, I was tormented, and pestered, and dolefully bewildered with the same kind of waking dreams. The mephitic gases of that region intoxicate the brain. As the light of the natural day, however, began to struggle with the glow of the lanterns, these vain imaginations lost their vividness, and finally vanished with the first ray of sunshine that greeted our escape from the Valley of the Shadow of Death. Ere we had gone a mile beyond it, I could well nigh have taken my oath that this whole gloomy passage was a dream.

At the end of the valley, as John Bunyan mentions, is a cavern, where, in his days, dwelt two cruel giants, Pope and Pagan, who had strewn the ground about their residence with the bones of slaughtered pilgrims. These vile old troglodytes* are no longer there; but into their deserted cave another terrible giant has thrust himself, and makes it his business to seize upon honest travellers, and fat them for his table with plentiful meals of smoke, mist, moonshine, raw potatoes, and saw-dust. He is a German by birth, and is called Giant Transcendentalist; but as to his form, his features, his substance, and his nature generally, it is the chief peculiarity of this huge miscreant, that neither he, for himself, nor any body for him, has ever been able to describe them. As we rushed by the cavern's mouth, we caught a hasty glimpse of him, looking somewhat like an ill-proportioned figure, but considerably more like a heap of fog and duskiness. He shouted after us, but in so strange a phraseology that we knew not what he meant, or whether to be encouraged or affrighted.

BE KIND TO THE OLD.—O, be kind to those who are in the autumn of life, for thou knowest not what suffering they have endured, how much it may still be their portion to bear. Are they querulous and unreasonable? Allow not thine anger to kindle against them—rebuke them not, for, doubtless, many and severe have been the crosses and trials of earlier years, and, perchance, their dispositions, while in the "spring time of life," were more gentle and flexible than thine own. Do they require aid of thee? then render it cheerfully, and forget not that the time may come when thou mayest desire the same assistance from others that now thou renderest unto them. Do all that is needful for the old, and do it with alacrity, and think it not hard if much is required at thine hand; lest when age has set its seal upon thy brow, and filled thy limbs with trembling, there may be found those who will wait upon thee unwillingly, and who will feel relieved when the coffin lid has covered thy face for ever.

The old must soon pass from this to another world. Is it a world of bliss? Then, though they have much to cheer them through the remnant of their earthly existence, be kind, very kind, to them, for they have many sorrows to endure, before they seek the abodes of happiness; they have yet to pass through "the valley of the shadow of death." Is it a world of wo to which they are hastening? Have they no hope of heaven? then be doubly cautious how thou addest a single drop to a cup already full; for surely they have enough to bear, if their prospects for both time and eternity are shrouded in gloom.

A GOOD REFERENCE.

In relating his experience in a conference meeting, an honest-looking stranger remarked, "If you don't believe I've got religion, go and ask my wife. She'll tell you." This came out so bluntly, many felt like having a hearty laugh. But is it not a good reference? Many a man's boast about his religion might be proved all vanity just by asking his wife, and getting an honest answer from her. How does his religion make him act at home? is the pungent inquiry,—that is the grand test. See to it, reader, that this reference may be to your credit.

* Inhabitants of caves.

Poetry.

GEMS FROM GEORGE HERBERT.

The verses below are from The Church Porch, a long poem by this delightful author. More than two centuries have taken nothing from the freshness of his thoughts and vigour of his language. "Words fitly spoken," might be inscribed over all he wrote.

BE TRUE.

Lie not; but let thy heart be true to God,
Thy mouth to it, thy actions to them both.
Cowards tells lies, and those that fear the rod;
The stormy working soul spits lies in froth.
Dare to be true. Nothing can need a lie.
A fault, which needs it most, grows two thereby.

BE MANLY.

Do all things like a man; not sneakingly.
Think the king sees thee still; for his King does.
Simpering is but a lay-hypocrisy;
Give it a corner, and the clue undoes.
Who fears to do ill, sets himself a task:
Who fears to do well, sure should wear a mask.

BE THOUGHTFUL.

By all means use sometimes to be alone.
Salute thyself. See what thy soul doth wear.
Dare to look in thy chest, for 'tis thy own:
And tumble up and down what thou find'st there.
Who cannot rest till he good fellows find,
He breaks up house, turns out of doors his mind.

BE CALM.

Be calm in arguing; for fierceness makes
Error a fault, and truth discourtesy.
Why should I feel another man's mistakes
More than his sicknesses, or poverty?

In love I should; but anger is not love,
Nor wisdom neither: therefore gently move.

Calmness is great advantage. He that lets
Another chafe, may warm him at his fire,
Mark all his wanderings, and enjoy his frets:
As cunning fencers suffer heat to tire.
Truth dwells not in the clouds: the bow that's
there
Doth often aim at, never hit, the sphere.

BE USEFUL.

Be useful where thou livest: that they may
Both want and wish thy pleasing presence still.
Kindness, good parts, great places, are the way To compass this. Find out men's wants and will;
And meet them there. All worldly joys go less,
To the one joy of doing kindnesses.

BE CHARITABLE.

Man is God's image; but a poor man is Christ's stamp to boot: both images regard.
God reckons for him, counts the favour his,
Write—So much given to God. Thou shalt be heard.
Let thy alms go before, and keep heaven's gate
Open for thee; or both may come too late.

PASSING EVENTS.

To the year 1849, its immediate predecessors have transmitted a wondrous state of things, crowns cast away, thrones abandoned and overturned, and kingdoms forsaken by their monarchs; while the people of the nations—the masses of the nations—are in tumultuous agitation. The representative of "the man of sin," himself is a fugitive from his secular empire, and of his ghostly see, which he carries along with him, the possession is very precarious. This condition of things was not unforeseen. Many an eye, through the perspective of inspired prophecy, had for years past been directed to A. D. 1848. A reverend friend, who is justly ranked among the first expositors of the prophetic page, but who, alas! is with us no more, in the last year of his earthly life, repeatedly referred to the termination of the next fifteen years as connected with great events—events of commanding public interest. Those fifteen years, when passed, were succeeded by 1848, and its occurrences have proved that those anticipations of a far-seeing and powerful mind were not visionary. Such anticipation, indeed, at a remote and earlier period by some others had been entertained. But the end is not yet.

We rank not ourselves with mere agitators, who, regardless of sound principles, legitimate measures and moral results, from restlessness of spirit, uneasiness of condition, or love of change, are seeking the revolution of States. For, whatever the violence of revolution may do in the breaking up of unhallowed relationship, or in the removal of rubbish, it will, we are assured, effect nothing directly in laying the solid foundations, or in rearing the stately walls of the moral edifice of the nation. In that work other principles, measures, and agencies must be employed. Still, as matters are, revolution must do its work. Crowns must be taken away, diadems must be removed, thrones must be overturned. All this God has threatened against the enemies of righteousness as a judgment of his wrath, and to his people it is a promise of his mercy. The day of vengeance accompanies the year of his redeemed. For, whatever may be said of the great fundamental principles of truth and right as lying at the foundation of the establishments of the nations, and as being adequate, not only to the keeping of them in connexion with the throne of God, but also of effecting their reform if brought to bear upon that, and we assuredly know, that through the perverse actings of bad men, such connexion has been formed in the social organization throughout the antichristian empire, between those fundamental principles of truth and right and those of falsehood and wrong, that there can, in the complex system, be no safe practical recognition of it by the enlightened and consistent friend of the claims of God and rights of men. Ere he can identify himself with, or give a pledge of adherence to it, there must be an entire reform. Those principles of truth and right that are said to lie at the foundation, must be freed from the rubbish by which they are overlaid. In this business revolution, violent revolution, must have a hand. Over this the exalted Redeemer provides. He will put in requisition all that agency that is adequate to the task. In it the people will have little to do. Of the people, there was none with me. To them he will assign the more appropriate work of bringing the principles of moral order, so long disjointed and out of place, and to a lamentable extent unheeded, to bear upon the reorganisation of the nations, in order to their being recognised as the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ.

It is humbling in looking back over the history of the antichristian empire, to see, subsequent to the reformation, Protestants so extensively as they were, and are, connected by oaths of allegiance, by bribes of paltry pelf, under the name of regium donum and other devices of the enemy, with thrones of iniquity; and to their shame, and lasting disgrace, boasting of their fidelity to systems of mischief established by cunningly devised decrees, systems with which God refuses to have fellowship, and which he is pledged to destroy. To this ecclesiastical and political profligacy it is refreshing to find within the boundaries of the Latin earth, even one exception. Against the immorality of those Antichristian systems many individuals, at sundry times, had been found to lift their voices and record their protests. But, previous to A. D. 1679, or June 22d, 1680, no organized body had ventured to disavow allegiance to any Antichristian secular throne. At the latter of these dates, in that remarkable paper, the Sanquhar declaration, a body of faithful and fearless men as heroically as piously, publicly and solemnly disavowed all allegiance to Antichristian domination, separating themselves from the immoral system that trampled down the rights of men in the state, and in the church usurped the crown of Christ. The tyranny of the Capitol, and the impiety of the Pantheon were combined into one pile of unrighteousness, and made to overlay conceal, and for practical ends, to make void the first principles of constitutional law. From that remarkable day to the present time, an organized body of men have been found, keeping off from their souls the fetters of profane oaths, and their hands from corrupting bribes intended to fasten them to the throne of iniquity, and by the prostituting of their religious influence, to aid in the sustaining of the profligate measures of that throne. They denied their allegiance to the secular beast, in that one of his horns which demanded it of them. Their successors continue to do so. To the aid of their cause the aroused and agitated masses of Europe are coming. In the providence of Immanuel, these masses of outraged and enraged humanity will prove to be the besoms with which the Antichristian rubbish shall be swept away. When will the declaration of the Sanquhar witnesses, by enlightened men and regenerated states, be justified? Prophecy assures us of this, and its impartial interpreters tell us—the passing events of Europe tell us—that the day of its fulfilment is coming on, that it is “confining on our times.”

Thus Dr. Junkin, in his lectures on prophecy, following the lead of thought so strongly and eloquently expressed thirty years before by Dr. A. McLeod, to whom, as an able expounder of the Revelation, Dr. J. gives due credit, says of the third angel, Rev. xiv. 9, 10—“The ministry symbolized by this angel shall exhibit the lion-like spirit of the Protestant reformers, saying with a loud voice. Clear and decided language will they utter. No timid, doubting state of mind, hesitating whether to say hard things against the beasts and their images, or to speak smoothly and fawningly. Their language will be the fearless and honest exposition of their thoughts and feelings. The burden of their song is a denunciation of God’s wrath upon the children of the apostacy. ‘If any man worship the beast.’ This regards the secular beast, (the existing political power) in which at this time the dragon or diabolus is incarnate. Consequently, worshipping the beast implies the maintenance of the whole doctrine of legitimacy, the divine right of kings, non-resistance,” &c. For the establishment of “the illustrious house of Hanover” on the British throne, in some quarters regarded with great and pious veneration, Dr. J. finds no exception; “In England,” he remarks, “the monarch is the head of the church. And, in this particular, the English monarchy is more strictly Antichristian than any other since the days of Phocas. Henry VIII. assumed this power, which the crown still holds. This dependence of the church on the crown is fully Antichristian. The third angel is the body of evangelical ministers who now labour, and in years to come will labour much more efficiently, to make the church see the connexion between popery and all who abet it, and the terrible judgments that await it. The fearful consequences of adhering to the despotic system will be now clearly exhibited before the eyes of mankind,” &c. See pp. 237—240. Thus the ministry symbolized by the third angel, carry along with them all that the messages of the first two contained, and to their content add the annunciation of the judgments awaiting those who still worship the beast, that is, who still maintain their allegiance to the antichristian secular power, and its adherents. Instead of thundering, as heretofore, from the pulpit anathemas against those who oppose lawless power, the thunder will be directed against the lawless power itself. Prov. xiv. 9, 10. The revival predicted in this passage, is, indeed, future; but that angel has, long since, begun to utter his voice. It was, perhaps, an oversight—an inconsistent one—in our friend, the president of Washington College, Va., when he said, p. 239, “We see no body of preachers to whom this prophecy is applicable.” On a review of this subject, he, perhaps, may find them in the martyrs of the Sanquhar declaration, and in their successors, at least within the territories of the “man of sin.” It is true, however, that in its entirety and results “the fulfilment is yet future,” and, with our friend, we rejoice that it is “confining on the present.”

But while we contemplate with deep interest the movements of Europe, we are not without subjects of serious thought at home. We, indeed, have no desponding fears for our own Republic. As we have the most free, so we have the strongest government on earth. The people, free men, associated under constitutional law, law fundamentally moral, and neither the tyrant nor the lawless man rules in our favoured land. Blunders in measures, indeed, frequently occur, and unsightly spots are often seen upon our character; but the former can be corrected and the latter will be soon washed out. Among these, slavery is the deepest and the darkest; but it is not hopeless. Less than half a century ago a small body of men, animated by the spirit of freedom, and guided by the “perfect law of liberty,” ecclesiastically took decided action against that system which goes to reduce the moral and immortal being, MAN, to the level of the chattel. On them and their action other evangelical bodies, for the time, looked askance. But the measure was sustained by the united voice of divine revelation and that of moral reason. That view, as time advanced, speaking in its own clear and emphatic tones, other bodies were made to hear. Slowly, indeed, did they begin to open their ears, and reluctantly to move in the same measure, but begin they did. We are glad of it; and, knowing the embarrassments of the case, and remembering our own too tardy steps, we are not disposed to speak too severely of their slow and reluctant action. In aid of the good cause, statesmen have now risen up, and powerful States have spoken. The discreet and timid ecclesiastic will no longer fear. He, too, will speak, and not refuse to act. The work of turning men, by law, into chattels, perpetrating their degradation, and extending the field of their labour, is nearly over. On this subject the events of 1848 will claim and find a conspicuous place, and that in fair and legible characters in records of history. The friends of Reformed Presbyterianism, wherever they may be found, have no cause of misgivings as to the final result. The signs of the times loudly speak in favour of their cause. In their own minds tolerating no unfriendly feeling toward their brethren of other names, and keeping themselves untrammelled by silly partialities, to mere party names, or to the corporate monopolies, whether in chattels personal or impersonal, which constitutes the machinery in the hands of little politicians to subserve their own little ends; as their European friends are untrammelled by state bribes, let them understand the great purpose of their calling and be faithful to it and to themselves. The issue will be the universal influence of the principles of moral order in the happy settlement of all the social relations of men, the kingdoms of this world becoming the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ. The Bible is abroad, and Bible principles and measures unallied with disorder, extravagance, or unmanly and unprincipled compromises will accomplish their lofty aims. For the security of those blessed results the evangelical church, and especially the several portions of the Presbyterian family in that church, are furnished with an extensive and powerful instrumentality. Let them be true to themselves.

January, 1849. Walter H. Spies SPES.

REMINISCENCE OF THE FIRST CONGRESS IN PHILADELPHIA.—When the congress met, Mr. Cushing made a motion that it should be opened with prayer. It was opposed by Mr. Jay, of New York, and Mr. Rutledge, of South Carolina, because we were so divided in religious sentiments, some episcopalians, some quakers, some anabaptists, some presbyterians, and some congregationalists, that we could not join in the same act of worship. Mr. Samuel Adams rose and said, “that he was no bigot, and could hear a prayer from any gentleman of piety and virtue, who was at the same time a friend to his country. He was a stranger in Philadelphia, but had heard that Mr. Duche (Dushay, they pronounced it) deserved that character, and, therefore, he moved that Mr. Duche, an episcopal clergyman, might be desired to read prayers to congress to-morrow morning.” The motion was seconded, and passed in the affirmative. Mr. Randolph, our president, waited on Mr. D., and received for answer that, if his health would permit, he certainly would. Accordingly, next morning, he appeared with his clerk and his pontificals, and read several prayers in the established form, and then read the psalter for the seventh day of September, which was the thirty-fifth Psalm. You must remember this was the next morning after we had heard the rumour of the horrible cannonade of Boston. “It seemed as if Heaven had ordained that psalm to be read on that morning.”

After this, Mr. Duche, unexpectedly to every body, struck out in an extemporary prayer, which filled the bosom of every man present. I must confess, I never heard a better prayer, or one so well pronounced. Episcopalian, as he is, Dr. Cooper, himself, never prayed with such fervour, such ardour, such correctness and pathos, and in language so elegant and sublime, for America, for congress, for the province of the Massachusetts Bay, especially the town of Boston. It had excellent effect upon every body here. I must beg you to read the psalm. If there is any faith in the sortes Virgilianæ or Homericæ, or especially the sortes Biblicæ, it would have been thought providential.”

Here was a scene worthy of the painter's art. It was in Carpenter's Hall, Philadelphia, a building which still survives, that the devoted individuals met to whom this service was read.

Washington was kneeling there, and Henry, and Randolph, and Rutledge, and Lee, and Jay, and by their side there stood, bowed in reverence, the puritan patriots of New England, who, at that moment, had reason to believe that an armed soldiery were wasting their humble households. It was believed that Boston had been bombarded and destroyed. They prayed fervently “for America, for the congress, for the province of Massachusetts Bay, and especially for the town of Boston;” and who can realize the emotions with which they turned imploringly to Heaven for Divine interposition and aid. “It was enough,” says Mr. Adams, “to melt a heart of stone. I saw the tears gush into the eyes of the old, grave, pacific quakers of Philadelphia.”—From the Pen of the Venerable John Adams.

IMPORTANCE OF A VOTE.—An Historical Fact.—In Foster's Lives of the British Statesmen occurs the following passage:—Cromwell had offered himself as a member for Cambridge; his opponent was John Cleveland. The contest was obstinately fierce, and ended in Cromwell's return, at last, by the majority of a single vote. “That vote,” exclaimed Cleveland, “that vote, that single vote, hath ruined both church and state.” Every body the least versed in English history knows to what extent the prophecy was fulfilled. That vote cost Charles his head.

A COLLEGE.

We invite attention to the following communication :

THE COMMITTEE

Appointed by the First Associate Reformed Synod of the West, at its last meeting, "to open a correspondence" on the subject of "establishing of a Literary Institution, in which, in connexion with a thorough education, a religious influence shall be exerted favourable to the cause of Evangelical Truth;" and to "obtain information, in regard to the most eligible location; and also to invite the co-operation of such sister churches as agree with us substantially in their views of Evangelical Truth,"—would respectfully submit the following communication to the consideration of the members of the A. R., the Associate, and the Reformed Presbyterian churches, through the medium of their respective public Journals.

DEAR BRETHREN :

It will be seen in the Minutes of the First Associate Reformed Synod of the West, of which the undersigned committee are members, that this Synod has resolved upon establishing a Literary Institution. The propriety of establishing such an institution seemed to be generally, if not unanimously admitted. This point being settled without any difficulty, the question arose whether the enterprise ought to be undertaken by the First A. R. Synod independently, inviting the General Synod, and the other denominations mentioned above, to co-operate with us, or, whether the First Synod ought merely to memorialize the General Synod on the subject, and let the work of establishing a College begin there, and be carried forward by the direction of the General Synod.

The undersigned, committee, are of opinion that a single College, well sustained, would be sufficient for the General A. R. Synod of the West; that the facilities for travelling are now so great in our country that the distance which most of our youth would have to travel in order to enter the College, located in a central place, would be no great difficulty in the way, especially when they would take into view the advantages which they would enjoy in various respects, by being educated in such an institution, and to secure which advantages the Synod has undertaken to establish such a College. Besides, as it appears, the Second A. R. Synod of the West has also taken some steps for the purpose of establishing a similar institution, it is feared that neither of the Synods, independently of the other, could elevate a College to such an eminence as would command any greater public respect, or secure any great advantages to the youth who might enter it for an education. Every institution of the kind ought to sustain itself after it has been put fairly under way. But in order to have this commencement made, the churches would have to contribute liberally of their pecuniary resources. Suitable buildings must be erected, a philosophical and chemical apparatus and a library must be procured, before the College can even begin its operations as a College. It is true that a respectable grammar-school might both begin and terminate its operations without either apparatus or library, but the committee understand it to be a College that is in contemplation. Now, would it not require ten or twelve thousand dollars, at least, to procure the necessary ground and erect comfortable and respectable buildings for such an establishment, even in a place where ground could be obtained on very low terms, and at least two or three thousand to make even a decent beginning of a library and apparatus? And does any one suppose that either of the Synods alone could raise this amount of money? Would the members regard a College as more important to her interests than her Theological Seminaries? And how have they struggled along without perhaps half this amount of money raised for buildings and libraries, both together; and that, too, after repeated and strenuous effort having been made, during a long series of years, to collect money for these purposes? Now, this does not arise from any peculiar penuriousness on the part of the members of the A. R. Church, for we see that their liberality in supporting gospel institutions, does not fall behind that of other churches generally. How then could either of the two Synods alone reasonably expect to raise the necessary funds for the establishment of a respectable College during perhaps the present generation? But if the General A. R. Synod would unanimously and vigorously undertake the work next spring, it seems to us that the object might be accomplished within a reasonable length of time; and, that if the Associate and Reformed Presbyterian churches would unite with the A. R. church in this important work, it might be done, perhaps, in two or three years.

Besides, how would such a union College, sending forth throughout the great valley of the West, ministers of the gospel well acquainted with, and attached to each other, and having passed through the same literary, moral, and religious training, tend to secure union of sentiment, union of action, and brotherly love throughout the length and breadth of the church, and consequently increase her moral strength and influence!

And suppose the other denominations, mentioned above, to join in the establishment and support of this union College, how much more extensive and powerful still would be this moral strength and influence that would be spread over the land! How would it tend to bring together those denominations, amongst which it is admitted that there is no difference in principle sufficient to justify a separation, if, indeed, there be any at all! "In union is strength." "Sic Senatus et populus quasi unum corpus discordia pereunt, concordia valent."

Now, from these considerations, and others which might be mentioned, the committee of correspondence are induced to suggest respectfully to all the Presbyteries, not only of the Associate Reformed church of the West, but also of the Associate and Reformed Presbyterians, the propriety of considering the subject of a united College, at their spring meetings, and of reporting to their respective Synods at their next meetings their sentiments on this subject, together with the number of votes for and against this plan of a College, in order that their Synods may have before them, at as early a period as possible, all the information necessary to enable them to act judiciously on this important subject.

Perhaps some may think that so much haste is unnecessary. In reply, the committee would state, that the First Associate Reformed Synod has resolved to go forward in the work alone, without delay, if other Synods do not see proper to fall in with her. And if the plan of extending union on this subject be the better one, it seems that speedy action is necessary to secure the adoption of this plan.

The committee would also suggest to congregations the propriety of trying what amount of money they can raise, either on the plan of donations, or of scholarships, expecting some remuneration in the way of education, in order to have the College located within their bounds respectively; and of reporting the result of their experiments to their Presbyteries or Synods at their next meetings, that the Synods may be able to judge more correctly than they could otherwise do respecting the best location for such an institution. By this method, the Synods would be able to determine more certainly where the College, when located, would receive the greatest encouragement, and be likely to be most prosperous, so far as money and the countenance of the vicinity, are necessary to secure its prosperity.

We think it cannot be reasonably objected to the reception of such proposals, on the ground that those whose offers may not be accepted will be likely to withhold afterward their support from the College. To do so, would be to act upon unchristian principles; and, although, some individuals might do so, yet it is thought that the congregations, generally, would not act so unchristian a part. It is true that it would not be expected that those congregations, whose proposals might not be accepted, would afterwards do as much for the support of the College as they would have done if they had obtained the location of the College within their own bounds, yet it would be expected that they, and all others in the church, or churches, connected with the enterprise, would do something, in this way, not only respectable but generous. And it should be remembered by congregations in making these proposals, that they are submitting it to the judgment of the church, through her proper judicatory, to decide what would be the best location, all things considered; and that she would have to take into view, not only the amount of money offered in a particular place, but also its accessibility, healthiness, contiguity to the geographical centre of the church, or churches engaged in the undertaking, so that it might not, perhaps, be the most liberal offer that would ultimately be accepted.

The committee would make another suggestion, with a view to expedite these movements, [for it is believed that no time should be lost in this work,] viz.; that as the Associate and Associate Reformed Synods are to sit at the same time, the former in Pittsburg, and the latter in Wheeling; and as it is thought by many that something conclusive, or nearly so, should be done by these churches at their next meetings, on the subject of ecclesiastical union, either one or the other Synod to adjourn, soon after constituting, to meet in the same house with her sister Synod before its final adjournment, for the purpose of conferring together, not only respecting the establishment of a College, but also respecting an ecclesiastical union of the two bodies. An easy and quick passage between the two cities could be obtained for a whole Synod at once by steamboat.

FIRST ANNUAL REPORT OF THE SCRIPTURE READER OF THE FIRST REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, PHILADELPHIA.

To the Session of the First Reformed Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia. For the Year 1848, December 31st.

"Hitherto hath the Lord helped us."—SAMUEL.

In a few hours the clock will announce to the world, that the year eighteen hundred and forty-eight has terminated. How short to look back! It seems but as yesterday since its commencement, when we received our instructions from you, and entered, formally, upon the discharge of those duties which you assigned us, earnestly hoping that by the blessing of the Almighty upon our efforts, much good might be effected, that the glory of God might be advanced, and the moral condition of our fellow-men improved.

During the present year, many wonderful events have transpired. We cannot say of the world, as the angel did in the vision of Zachariah, "The world sitteth still, and is at rest," but quite the reverse is the fact. The whole civil and religious world has been running to and fro:

There has been a shaking of the nations, and the struggle for freedom has increased. Monarchical power, in some places, has been subverted, and in others restrained. Doubtless these things are the precursors of some great event, perhaps of that which shall tumble the man of sin from his seat. But to descend from generals to particulars, it may be proper to lay before you a brief account of the part we have been acting during the year now about to close.

In laying before you our First Annual Report, it is truly gratifying to be able to say, that we have had some tokens of our heavenly Father's approval of the work in which we have been engaged. He has given us some cheering evidence that our labour has not been in vain.

Our first visits for the purpose of bringing careless and neglected children into the Sabbath school, were confined to the vicinity of Dr. Wylie's church, but soon after, with the same end in view, were extended to the more destitute and neglected sections of the city. Thus we extended our visits, daily, till we reached the district of Moyamensing, some parts of which we found to be in a state of moral destitution.

It seemed to be the asylum of the migrating sons of Erin, who had made their escape from the famine. And in this place, separated from every religious association, their serious impressions, (if ever they had any,) soon became effaced.

No man seemed to care for their souls, and what was worse, they seemed not to care themselves.

Our first effort was to establish a Sabbath evening prayer meeting among them. This succeeded so well, that in a short time the room in which we met was filled to overflowing. Parents flocked to it, and brought their children with them, (we merely mention this as it was detailed in former reports.) We soon saw that this plan was inadequate to meet the wants of the people, especially that of the children. The next step was to open a Sabbath school; and, in connexion with it, to have preaching. In this we succeeded, and, by the exertions of our junior pastor, on every Sabbath, with one or two exceptions, preaching has been regularly kept up. The Sabbath school has succeeded fully as well as we could expect. It was gratifying that when for several Sabbaths, we were prevented by sickness from attending, the operations of the Sabbath school and prayer meeting, &c., were not suspended. Some Sabbath school teachers conducted these with much zeal and propriety. The preaching, in connexion with the school, has been the means of effecting much good. Many, who would have spent the Sabbath in sinful pleasures, have been brought to the sanctuary to listen to divine truth. And many, whom we believe to be Christians, have been fed at the table of the gospel, who would not, likely, have appeared in the large city churches.

There is now a respectable number regularly attending the public worship in the Hall. And we doubt not, if organized, and placed under the care of a minister who could devote his whole time and energies to the work, in a short time there would be a flourishing congregation in this place.

In a former report we stated that our plan in the prayer meetings was to appoint the children lessons to be committed to memory. The Book of Psalms was chosen for this purpose. Lately the proficiency of the children, in this respect, has been surprising; several of them committing from twenty to thirty, and some thirty-five stanzas regularly each week. It may be worth while to state our reasons for appointing psalms in preference to other lessons. Our first reason is, psalms are more easily committed. Second, Roman catholics do not object to their children committing our psalms. We have several of their children attending the class at the prayer meeting, who recite psalms with great accuracy. Third, we know of no better method to repel the innovations now made upon our psalmody than this. For those who have committed our psalms to memory in childhood, will not, likely, substitute for them the hymns and compositions of man.

The person, holding infidel sentiments, mentioned in our last, has since been consigned to the narrow house appointed for all living. There is good reason to hope that he was brought to acknowledge that great God whose very existence he had doubted. He desired his wife and children to pray for him. Soon after this his speech failed him, so that little of a satisfactory nature could be known in reference to his state of mind. From his manner, his wife supposed that he wanted a minister to see him, and pray with him. Our junior pastor visited him a short time before his death. His wife soon after was admitted to our communion, and seemed to be comforted by the hope that she had found Him who is a husband to the widow, and a father to the fatherless children. Her little ones attend the Sabbath school in the hall.

One of our little Sabbath school children, who also attended the prayer meeting, and made wonderful progress in committing psalms to memory, has been removed by death. This child was not quite six years of age, yet for weeks she had committed, on an average, thirty-four stanzas of psalms. She had also learned to read the Testament with great fluency. Altogether we never met with such a child. Only two weeks ago, we heard her repeat her thirty-four verses of a psalm.

But this was the last: soon after, she was attacked with scarlet fever, which carried her off. Some time before her death, she said to her mother, "Mother, do you love God?" Her mother said, "Yes, my child, I hope I do." She seemed to be satisfied, and said, "Mother, I love God, and God is the Lord." These were the last words she uttered distinctly, for the swelling in her neck increased rapidly. We merely mention this now. If we can find leisure, at some future time, we intend to write a full obituary of her. Suffice it to say, on the 25th of December this sweet little one breathed her last.

The father is rather a careless man. We never could induce him to attend regularly at the public worship, nor at the prayer meeting. We believe the mother is a Christian. She attended the prayer meeting very regularly, and was often in the Hall on Sabbath. Perhaps this visitation may cause the father to feel his duty, for Isabella was an only child. Another very amiable child, who attended the Sabbath school and prayer meeting, whose happy countenance often attracted our attention, has also become the victim of death. She was quite attentive to her lessons, and seemed to pay more than common attention to any instruction given her. But her tarrying was very short. About a week ago, she called her parents, and her brothers and sisters to her bed-side, and told them she was going to heaven. Soon after this she died. Perhaps she was not more than nine years old. Word has just been sent us, that another little one, who attended the same evening class, has died. God has been gathering to himself these lilies, who have often cheered us by their wonderful progress in acquiring and treasuring up divine truth. We had many other things which we intended to report, but we must refrain.

Suffice to say, that the feet of the wanderers have been directed in the path that leads to the sanctuary on the Sabbath, and many of the neglected children have been brought into the Sabbath school. In many instances the needy have been relieved, for Mrs. D——, and Mrs. S——, have often made us the donees of their liberality. During the year we have attended one hundred and forty meetings, for prayer and Christian experience. In finding out children for the Sabbath school, &c., we have made nearly four thousand visits. In these visits we have distributed about two thousand pages of tracts, and seventy or eighty little books for children. We have supplied twelve families with Bibles. Many children have been gathered into the Sabbath school, but, from the migrating character of the population, soon removed. It is evident, then, that it required a good deal of exertion to keep up the school. Missionary purses were kept in the classes, and we expect that there will be about thirteen dollars raised by the children during the year. But as we have given full reports, we need not recapitulate.

Thus we have glanced, merely, at some of the things that have been accomplished during the year. And while we rejoice that some good has been done, yet we must lament that many opportunities of doing good have either been feebly embraced, or almost neglected. This has not been altogether for want of will, but often through weakness of the flesh.

We can only say we have tried to do our duty as far as we could, but we must confess that our performances, like all the works of man, have been very imperfect. However we have not been content merely with our own notions of what we should do. In all matters of importance we have consulted with our pastors, and the superintendent of the Sabbath school, and have endeavoured, in all cases, to adhere closely to their advice. We have thus briefly sketched the labours and progress of the year 1848. And should it please God to spare our life, and should you please to continue us in that work to which we were appointed, it shall be our endeavour faithfully to attend to all the instructions given us, rejoicing to spend and be spent in this work.

Respectfully yours,

WM. S. DARRAGH.

For the Banner of the Covenant.

THE THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

The importance of sustaining this institution in connexion with the Reformed Presbyterian Church, cannot be too deeply impressed on all ministers and members. The necessity of having a good supply of zealous, and faithful ministers is felt by all. Our principles, however excellent and valuable in themselves, will not spread without the use of the appointed and appropriate means. And, as a church, we are not diligently using the means. We are not making those vigorous efforts for the dissemination of our principles, which their importance and excellence demand. The glorious motto inscribed on our time-honoured Banner is, "For Christ's Crown and Covenant." In its defence, many of Scotia's noblest sons and daughters shed their blood, not counting their lives dear to them. And should not we, who inherit their principles, manifest, also, their spirit, by "contending earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints?" We present to our fellow-men, "Jesus Christ and him crucified," as the Saviour of sinners, and as the "Head over all things to his body the church." But "how shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard? And how shall they hear without a preacher?" The "labourers" must be sent into the harvest field, in order to the ingathering of the harvest. The "watchmen" must be placed and kept on the walls of Zion, in order to her prosperity. And "good soldiers of the cross of Christ," must enter the battle-field, in order to obtain the victory. How, then, shall these be obtained? We answer, by fostering and sustaining the Theological Seminary. In no other way can the church procure a sufficient supply of devoted and faithful ministers. And who shall sustain this important and excellent institution? The church. It is her privilege, her duty and her interest, to sustain it. The largest and most flourishing denominations, are those who are most attentive to the education and training of young men for the ministry. And until a deeper interest is taken in this subject, by our branch of the Vine, we shall have the day of small things. An extensive and inviting field now lies before us. Our vacancies are numerous, and many of them ready and anxious for settlement. But we have not the men to supply them, and we never will be able to meet the pressing calls made upon us, until, as a church, we awake to the importance of sustaining our school of the prophets. Let parents direct the attention of their sons to the work of the ministry. Let pious and devoted young men be encouraged and aided in the prosecution of their studies. And let the Seminary be sustained by the prayers and contributions of the people, and then, with the Divine blessing, we may hope to obtain an enlightened, sound, and zealous ministry. Let the church, then, show her faith by her works, and let every member resolve to do something for the welfare of the whole body.

At present the Seminary enjoys a high degree of prosperity. The learned and venerable Father who has been so long associated with it, is still unremitting in his efforts to promote its prosperity. And during the present session he is ably assisted by the Rev. T. W. J. Wylie, who attends to the department of Church History. The students are very attentive to their duties, and appear to be in earnest in the work. They give great promise of usefulness, and under the present efficient system of instruction, they will come forth well armed for the contest.

The course of instruction is thorough, embracing Lectures on Divinity and Church History, the Critical Study of Hebrew and Greek, and the composition and delivery of discourses. The present session is drawing to a close, and the church should give some evidence that she feels the importance of sustaining the Seminary, by promptly and liberally discharging her obligations towards it. Let our ministers bring it before the people, and let the people take a deep interest in its welfare, for it is inseparably linked with the best interests of our beloved Zion. "The harvest, truly, is plenteous, but the labourers are few. Pray ye, therefore, the Lord of the harvest, that he will send forth labourers into his harvest." And let us remember, that God honours his people, by making them co-workers with himself in this good and glorious work.

A GLANCE AT THE WORLD.

More than three-fifths of the race of man are idolaters, though we are near the termination of the sixtieth century of his history, and of the nineteenth century of the Christian era. Nearly sixty generations of men—numbering forty thousand millions—have lived and died, since Jesus Christ "brought life and immortality to light through the gospel." There are now one thousand millions on the earth, of whom six hundred and thirty millions are idolaters; one hundred million, Mohammedans; six millions, Jews; two hundred and sixty-four millions, nominal Christians. A few millions more than one-fourth, have nominally recognised Jesus Christ as the Saviour of mankind. Of these, one hundred and thirty millions, are members of the Roman church; fifty-six millions, of the Greek church; eight millions, of the Armenian church; seventy millions, nominally Protestants. There are, then, one hundred and ninety-four millions bearing the Christian name, to whom the Bible is a sealed book, and only about one-fourth of the population of the globe, who are permitted to read it, and are favourable to its circulation. Of these, not more than forty millions are professors of any kind of Christianity—one-sixth of nominal Christians—one-twenty-fifth of the population of the world. Of these, not more than twenty-five millions—one-tenth of nominal Christians—one-fortieth of the entire population, are the evangelical followers of Christ. Therefore, we have reason to believe, that at this very hour, thirty-nine fortieths of mankind possess unregenerate hearts. In this condition do we find the world, having passed through the revolutions of nearly six thousand years.

It is now nearly half a century since the commencement of the Modern Missionary Effort. The following estimate exhibits the brief results of what has been accomplished in these fifty years among the heathen:—Two thousand missionaries; seven thousand five hundred assistants; four thousand churches; two hundred and fifty thousand converts; three thousand missionary schools; two hundred and fifty thousand children and adults belonging to them; two hundred dialects into which the Bible is translated; thirty-two millions of Bibles scattered over the earth, in languages spoken by six hundred millions. But such an estimate will give no adequate idea of what has been accomplished. If the slightest disturbance of the least particle of matter is felt throughout the confines of the material universe, and the influence of a single thought is perpetuated for ever throughout the universe of mind, who shall undertake to limit the influence of a single impulse of good? If no one can estimate the influence which a single regenerated soul can exert on the corrupt mass of humanity; what shall be said of the influence which two hundred and fifty thousand can exert scattered among heathenized millions? If one Bible, left to its leavening influence, would work out, in time, the evangelization of the world, what shall be said of the power which thirty-two millions are every where exerting at this moment?

But vast as are these results, what remains to be done is still more immense. Only one-fortieth of mankind have felt in their hearts the power of the gospel; the remaining thirty-nine fortieths are "aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world;" Eph. ii. 12. When we consider that thirty-two millions of Bibles are abroad in the earth, translated into languages spoken by six hundred millions; let us not forget that only one in thirty-one, on an average, have in their hands the bread of life; that nine hundred and sixty eight millions are destitute, and that to four hundred millions the Bible is a sealed book this very hour. When we consider that several hundred thousand have been rescued from heathenism in the last fifty years, two hundred thousand of whom, perhaps, are now alive, let us not forget the millions that have perished in their sins, and the millions that have been heathenized during the same period. Heathenism has been on a terrible increase for centuries. It is a startling fact, that the disparity between the friends and the foes of Christianity, between the disciples of the Saviour and unconverted men, is greater, vastly more so at the present time than it was fifty years since!

Such, indeed, is only a "glance at the world," a mere coup d'œil upon this vast missionary field—this terrific moral harvest, which so deepens, and widens, and waves in the distance.—J. L. Batchelder.

DUTIES OF RULING ELDERS.

The following rules for elders, prepared by the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of Ireland, are worthy of serious attention.

1. Each elder shall keep a list of the families in his district, and as he is appointed to watch for the souls of those especially committed to his charge, he shall warn the unruly, reprove the careless, comfort the weak, and urge all to avoid the prevailing errors and sins of the town and neighbourhood, and to the faithful discharge of Christian duty.

2. When an elder finds any one in his district negligent of his duty, or indulging in sinful practices, he should first, in great meekness, speak to him in private. But in cases where the sin is notorious and scandalous, he shall report the case to the session, who shall deal with the offender according to the discipline of the church.

3. Each elder shall hold stated meetings in his district for reading the scriptures, religious conversation, and prayer.

4. Each elder shall, when it is practicable or necessary, form Sabbath Schools in his district, for religious education; shall superintend them; and shall encourage the people to attend to the religious education of their children.

5. It is the duty of an elder to visit and exhort the sick and afflicted, and to pray for them.

6. An elder by a conscientious discharge of his duties in these respects, will acquire such a knowledge of the spiritual state of the people in his district as will enable him to act with efficiency in his own sphere, and materially assist the minister in adapting his instructions and exhortations to the peculiar circumstances and necessities of the flock.

Religious Intelligence.

SANDWICH ISLANDS.—During the past two years, the Christians of these interesting Islands have contributed, for benevolent purposes $9,605, 53, in money, and $4,176, 62 in produce, in all, $13,782, 15. One half of this sum has been expended in building meeting-houses, and the rest on school teachers, assistant preachers, and the needy. In a late letter, the missionaries observe:

“Sixteen years ago schools were almost unknown, and few could read; now, rarely a child can be found, over ten years of age, who cannot read. And the government has taken the expense of common-school education upon itself.—In 1820 there was no written language, and no books; now, behold the change. Then, no regard was paid to dress—men and women bathed promiscuously and unclothed, and to the place of bathing would walk naked through the town; and no child was clothed at all till one or ten years old; now, the entire population is clothed, and a man or woman in the ancient costume is rarely seen. Then the people were a nation of drunkards, and every vice that attends it was committed openly. Each man had as many wives as he could feed, and could send them adrift when he pleased; property was insecure, public prostitution was common—men sold their wives, and parents their daughters. There were no books, no schools, no prayers, no service open to the Christian’s God; now, they are a sober people, as much so as can be found under the whole heavens—their domestic relations are sacred, property and life are secure—books and schools, written language, churches and thousands of converts are found, where such darkness and death reigned so short a time since. They practise the arts, and work at most of the mechanical pursuits of life; protection is given to all, and the wilderness has blossomed as the rose.”

HOLLAND.—“The new Constitution fully recognises the principle of religious liberty. In consequence, the Synod of the Reformed Churches of Holland has drawn up a new ecclesiastical constitution. This assembly, which held its meetings during the month of August last, has not yet published the result of its deliberations, but the plan it has prepared will be sent to all the churches in the country, in time enough for them to communicate their opinion upon it to the Synod, before the 1st of May, 1849. A meeting of persons holding evangelical sentiments was held at Amsterdam, on the 18th of August, for the purpose of addressing to the Synod a memorial expressive of their wishes. Thirty-three pastors and two hundred and eighty-eight laymen were present. A declaration of principles, drawn up by M. Groen Van Prinsterer, and communicated beforehand to some of the members, was adopted, after some modifications. This declaration insists on the submission of the church to Jesus Christ, its head, and deduces therefrom the following principles: “The maintenance of the doctrines of the Reformed Church in the Netherlands, the independence of the church with regard to the state, and the internal liberty of each community, in consequence of the abolition of the former aristocratic and oligarchic government. This document was sent to the Synod, together with an address relative to its proposed work of reorganization. The Assembly also sent an address to the king, praying that the government should respect the liberties of the church.”

CHINA.—One of the missionaries says:—

“Hundreds of preachers of the gospel are needed in the city, and hundreds more in neighbouring places. This statement will admit of no modification; the need is absolute. The population accessible, according to consular regulations, or, which may be reached by missionaries without being absent more than twenty-four hours, is not less than three millions! The Roman Catholics have four extensive sites in Shanghai and its suburbs, and many others in the vicinity. Close to our house, they are now building a cathedral, two hundred feet by one hundred and twenty. They have also a college in a neighbouring village.”

Respecting their religious state, another missionary gives the following deplorable account:

“The Chinese have temples and gods without number. But the great mass of the people have very little veneration for their deities. I suppose the sentiment of love to the gods is unknown among them. Their religious feelings would seem rather to consist in superstitious fears. If they neglect the accustomed rites, the gods may, in some way, bring ill luck upon them. But if they observe these rites, they may be prosperous." . . . "Their respect for ancestors is very great; so much so that the species of idolatry which has by far the strongest hold upon their minds, is ancestral worship. This is the strong hold by which Satan maintains his supremacy over the minds of this people, and this, we may expect, will be the last to give way to the power of the gospel of Christ. One may hold up their gods to ridicule, and they will laugh at his remarks; but they do not love to hear the worship of their ancestors spoken against. This worship, after the period of mourning is over, consists chiefly in offering, at stated times, various articles of food to the manes of the deceased; and in burning various kinds of paper, as a substitute for money, by which these spirits are supplied with that most convenient article." . . . "For the present life they can think of no higher happiness than success in acquiring wealth; and the highest happiness, after death, consists in having sons to supply the wants of their manes. These are the two objects which embrace the highest aspirations of a Chinaman."

SYRIA.—Mr. Smith, in speaking of a recent visit to Hasbeiya, under date of December 16, says: "The brethren have now their civil rights secured to them. The Patriarch's excommunication has lost its force and they are well treated by most of their townsmen. Some of the different sects are beginning to assemble with them; and more to read their books. Among the latter are Mohammedans and Druzes, and even some of the Emir's relatives." "On the Sabbath, I had three very attentive audiences."

GREECE.—Mr. King writes from Athens, January 2, as follows:

"My shop for the sale of books is regularly opened every day; and among those who come to it, there is now and then a priest. Several priests, indeed, have been supplied with the word of God since my return. Some even call and converse with me on the subject of religion. One young man, a student in the University, and son of a priest, comes to me regularly on the Lord's day to be instructed in the gospel; and on Thursday evening, I had a service in Greek, which this young man and some others usually attend."

CEYLON.—Mr. Smith has embodied in a recent letter, for the purpose of showing the strength of heathenism in the field committed to his care, the statistics of idolatry and Romanism in Panditeripo, Achavaly and Oodoopitty. The result is, that there are 102 male and 2 female deities, 82 male and 14 female devils, worshipped by the deluded inhabitants; and there are also ten Roman Catholic chapels. The entire population is about 26,000.

REFORMATION IN LAPLAND.—An extensive religious movement is taking place among the supine and vice-sunken Laplanders. The revival commenced on the Swedish frontier, with the labours of Swedish missionaries, and has already extended far into the northern interior of Norway, working wonderful changes. Several Laplanders have been roused to become preachers of righteousness and salvation by the cross of Christ, and the proverbially drunken Laplander has become sober and temperate wherever this gospel zeal has spread.

THE IRISH CHURCH ESTABLISHMENT.—At a meeting lately held in Glasgow to oppose all state endowments of the church, in general, and that of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland in particular, Dr. Taylor, one of the speakers gave, in substance, the following particulars respecting the Irish Establishment.

In 1835, according to the Report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, there were, in Ireland, 151 parishes in which there was not a single Protestant; 194 with less than 10; 198 with less than 20; 107 with less than 40; 77 with less than 50; making a total of 860 parishes, in which, on the aggregate, there were less than 50 Protestants. Out of 1338 churches, 474 have been erected since 1800 by Parliament, at an expense of £445,180, and added to the sums expended in building churches, the cost of glebe houses and glebe lands, during the past and present century, £920,900 has been voted to the Irish Church out of public exchequer, independent of the revenues which are looked upon as the peculiar property of the church. The total number of persons connected with the Irish establishment, is about 800,000, and of the two Archbishops, ten Bishops, 326 deans, prebendaries, canons, &c. &c., 2,200 live in England, and on the Continent, totally neglecting their pastoral duties, yet receiving a large portion of the upwards of £208,000 which is annually paid to the various dignitaries, and of the £656,753 which constitutes the total annual income of the church. Surely in all this there must be grievous wrong.

AREA AND DISTANCES OF THE UNITED STATES' TERRITORIES.—Oregon contains 341,473 square miles; New Mexico, 77,387; California, 448,691.—Territory, west of the Mississippi, 745,584. Total, 1,861,076 square miles, of 340 acres each. This vast extent of territory, if in a square form, would measure 1,800 miles by 1,820. From Eastport, Maine, via of the St. Lawrence, Buffalo, Cincinnati, St. Louis, and South Pass, in the Rocky mountains to Astoria in Oregon, the distance, by the travelled route, is 4,517 miles. From the Madawaska, in Maine, by the Atlantic route, through New York, Washington, &c., to the mouth of the Rio Grande, is 2,923. From New York to the head of Lake Superior, by Detroit and Mackinaw, is 1,856 miles, and thence down the Mississippi, to the Gulf of Mexico, is 2,284. From Eastport, Maine, to the Bay of San Francisco, in California, via Portland, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, St. Louis, Santa Fe, and to the Colorado, of the west, is 3,644 miles.

THE COLONIZATION SOCIETY.—The anniversary of this benevolent institution was held in January, in the Hall of the House of Representatives at Washington. The meeting was largely attended, and a very marked interest was manifested in the noble cause which it seeks to promote. During the past year the society has sent, from 13 states, 443 emigrants to Liberia, 334 of whom, were slaves, liberated for the purpose of being colonized; 113 were free coloured, and two were captured Africans. In this work the society had expended $51,953, and received $50,114.

TOLERATION IN TURKEY.—The Sultan of Turkey has taken a great stride in religious toleration, having issued a decree according to Christians, the privilege of attaining the highest dignities, even that of Pacha and Vizier, and allowing the free exercise of the rights of conscience. Verily, God is at work among the nations.

Romanism.

RULES FOR LENT.—Lent is a Teutonic word.—In German Lenz, meaning the Spring, and used to describe a time of fasting, which is observed as a period of humiliation for forty days before Easter. The Greek church observes four seasons of Lent, and the Episcopal Church has its form in the Spring of the year; but it is in the Roman Catholic Church that it most fully appears. Perhaps we should apologize to our readers, for copying the following from the instructions which the "Archbishop of Baltimore" has just issued for the government of all the Romanists under his jurisdiction, during this season of the year. But it may be well for all to see this system, as it is actually working, in the boasted 19th century. Yet, while we smile, let us pity, and labour that blinded multitudes may be delivered from their strong delusions.

1. All the faithful, who have completed their twenty-first year, are, unless legitimately dispensed, bound to observe the Fast of Lent.

2. They are to make only one meal a-day, excepting Sundays.

3. The meal allowed on fast-days is not to be taken till about noon.

4. At that meal, if on any day permission should be granted for eating flesh, both flesh and fish are not to be used at the same time.

5. A small refreshment, commonly called collation, is allowed in the evening; the general rule as to the quantity of food, permitted at this time, is or can be made. But the practice of the most regular Christians is, never to let it exceed the fourth part of an ordinary meal.

6. The quality of food allowed at a collation is, in this diocese, bread, butter, cheese, all kinds of fruit, salads, vegetables, and fish, though not warm, but fish previously prepared and grown cold. Milk and eggs are prohibited.

7. General usage has made it lawful to drink, in the morning, some warm liquid as tea, coffee, or thin chocolate, made with water, to which a few drops of milk may be added, serving, rather, to colour the liquids, than to make them substantial food.

8. Necessity and custom have authorized the use of hog's lard, instead of butter in preparing fish, vegetables, &c.

9. The following persons are exempted from the obligation of fasting: young persons under twenty-one years of age, the sick, pregnant women, or giving suck to infants, those who are obliged to hard labour, all who through weakness cannot fast without great prejudice to their health.

10. By dispensation, the use of flesh-meat will be allowed at any time on Sundays, and once a-day, only, on Mondays, Tuesdays, and Thursdays, with the exception of the first four days, and all Holy Week, including Palm-Sunday.

THE AFFAIRS OF ITALY AND THE POPE.—The Pope is still in exile at Gaeta. On the 19th of December a supreme Junta of three were installed in office as a Provisional Government at Rome, and thereby the Pope's temporal sovereignty was formally dissolved. The members of a Constituent Assembly were to be elected on the 21st of January, and the assembly was to be convened at Rome on the 5th of February. The basis of election is universal suffrage, and the members are to be two hundred in number, without property qualifications. Against all these proceedings, the Pope has issued his formal protest, and a Convocation of the Roman Catholic powers of Europe is talked of, for the purpose of restoring him to his temporal authority over the Italian states. Indeed, he has appealed to Austria, Spain, and Portugal for assistance, but France and Sardinia remonstrate against it.

The Family Circle.

RULES FOR DOMESTIC HAPPINESS.

HEADS of Families,—Do you wish happiness? Then be happy. It is a Christian duty. To be unhappy is to be disobedient. Do you want directions? The following are offered you in love.

I. Every day let your eye be fixed on God, through the Lord Jesus Christ, that, by the influence of the Holy Spirit, you may receive your mercies as coming from Him, and that you may use them to his glory.

II. Never suffer your regard for each other's society to rob God of your heart, or of the time which you owe to God or to your own soul.

III. Be careful that custom and habit do not lessen your attentions to each other, or the pleasing satisfaction with which they were once received and shown.

IV. Whenever you perceive a languor in your affections, always make it a rule to suspect yourself. The object which once inspired regard, may, perhaps, be still the same, and the blame only attaches to you.

V. Be sure to avoid unkind and irritating language. Always conciliate. It is your interest and duty. Recollect what God has borne with in you.

VI. Study your partner's character and disposition. Many little nice adjustments are needful for happiness. You must both accommodate, or you will both be unhappy.

VII. Do not expect too much. You are not always the same, no more is your partner. Sensibility must be watched over, or it will soon become its own tormentor.

VIII. When you discern feelings which you did not suspect, and this, you may be sure, will be the case, make it your prayer that your regard be not diminished. If you are heirs of the grace of life, your failings will shortly be over; you will hereafter both be perfect in the divine image. Esteem and love each other now as you certainly will then. Forbearance is the trial and the grace of this life only.

IX. Forget not that one of you must die first. One of you must feel the pang and the chasm of separation. A thousand little errors may then wound the survivor's heart.

X. Pray constantly. You need much prayer. Prayer will engage God on your behalf. His blessing only can make you happy in the midst of your mercies. His blessing can make even the bitterness of life wonderfully sweet. He can suspend all your joys. Blessed be his holy name; he can and often does suspend our sorrows. Never pass a day without praising him for all that is past, glorifying him for your mercies, and trusting him for all that is to come.

Editorial.

THE REINFORCEMENT TO SAHARUNPUR.

Letters have been received from our missionary brethren, written after their arrival in Calcutta, by which we learned that they were all well, and expected shortly to commence their journey up the Ganges. A valuable letter, giving an account of their voyage, has been received, but we were unable to publish it in our present number. It may be expected in our next.

THE PROPOSED COLLEGE.

In consequence of the special request of the Committee, by which it was issued, we have published, in this No. of the Banner, the Address of our brethren of the Associate Reformed Synod of the west, in regard to the establishment of a college. While we do so, we are not to be considered as expressing approbation of it, since we are inclined to believe that such a movement is not required by the condition of our literary institutions generally, which, we are happy to say, we think are pervaded with a sound and strong religious influence; nor do we think it desirable to seclude our youth from contact with teachers or classmates of our other denominations, unless they manifest a strong proselyting spirit. We have regretted to see so great a tendency to sectarianize education in the present age, on the part of Protestants as well as Romanists, and we would much prefer a general union of all Christians on this subject, as the best way to promote the influence of truth. But we need not enter into the subject at length, since even if it were intrinsically proper, we believe it to be, as far as regards the Reformed Presbyterian Church, impracticable and inexpedient.

THE NEW EDITION OF THE TESTIMONY.

The importance of the subject leads us again to call the attention of our readers to the suggestions, made in our last number, in reference to the new edition of the Testimony. In many places it is almost impossible to procure a copy of the work, while as the authorized symbol of our church, it should be in the possession of every member. In new settlements it is particularly desirable that it should be accessible, and it would contribute much to the extension and stability of our congregations if such were the case. By the acknowledgment, on the cover of this number, it will be seen that Dr. M'Leod's congregation, in New York, has already made a liberal contribution for this purpose, and we hope the good example will be imitated throughout all our church.

DEFERRED ARTICLES.

A very interesting article on the Past and Present compared, another on Conscience, and several other communications have been necessarily postponed.

THE WESTERN PENITENTIARY OF PENNSYLVANIA.

We have received the Report of the Inspectors of the Western Penitentiary of this state for the last year. We are happy to find that our esteemed friend and brother, Rev. A. W. Black, still retains his post as chaplain of this institution, and that his zealous and faithful labours are not without cheering evidences of success. As soon as we can find room, we will lay before our readers the whole of Mr. B.'s interesting report.

Notices of New Publications.

Thoughts on Public Prayer. By Samuel Miller, D. D., L. L. D., Philadelphia. Presbyterian Board of Publication, pp. 306, 12mo.

This volume is from the pen of the vénéable Dr. Miller, whose ripe fruitfulness in old age is an evidence of the fulfilment of the promise made to the righteous. It is an interesting and valuable discussion of the important subject to which it relates. After some introductory remarks, showing the necessity of attention to this subject, the author presents a history of public prayer, in various periods of the church's history, and then examines the claims of Liturgies. The work then assumes the practical form, and points out the faults frequently made in public prayer, the characteristics which mark it when good, and the means by which excellence in it may be attained. Although especially hinted to those who conduct the public service of the sanctuary, it is calculated to benefit private Christians who may read it, not only from its thorough and masterly examination of several interesting points in church order, but also as preparing them to be the means of edification, when they may be called upon to lead in prayer in the family, or in the social religious meeting.

Grace Raymond, or the evil and cure of Passionate Temper. By a deaf and dumb Lady. Phila. Am. S. S. Union; pp. 104, 18mo. Elms Grave, or the Sunday School Boys contrasted. Phila. American S. S. Union; pp. 84. William Herbert, or Belgian at School. Am. S. S. Union; pp. 89, 18mo.

These little volumes are publications of the Am. Sunday School Union, "the Society that takes care of children." Their titles indicate the general character of the subject of which they treat, and show the suitableness and variety which the Union aims at, and so successfully secures. They are all excellent, but the last named is especially so. We hope they may have an extensive circulation.

The Variations of Popery. By Rev. Samuel Edgar, D. D., of Ireland. New York Holman & Gray, 90 Fulton Street.

The fourth number of this publication has been lately issued, completing the whole of the original work, of the great value of which we have already expressed our opinion. We find, however, that the appendix by Dr. M'Leod, which contained a very interesting discussion of the condition and aspects of Romanism in the United States has not been published. This will prove a great disappointment to many who subscribed for the work on the faith of the advertisement so extensively published, and certainly some explanation of the cause of this deviation from his engagement is due by the person under whose supervision the work has been issued. We are happy to know that the Christian public will not lose the benefit of Dr. M'Leod's appendix, as it will be published by other channels. We hope that another edition of the Variations, with the Appendix in connexion with it, will be furnished by some proper publisher.

American National Preacher, January, 1849. New York, J. M. Sherwood, 120 Nassau Street; pp. 24. Price, $1 per annum.

The January number of the Preacher contains a New Year's Sermon by Professor Smith, of Auburn, and a discourse on the inefficiency of the church and its remedy by Rev. T. S. Cutter, with a short sermon by the editor, called the Warning Voice. This valuable publication we would again commend to our readers, generally, and more especially to our ministerial brethren.

Henry Wood, or the First Step in the Downward Road. Am. S. S. Union; pp. 14, 18mo.

This little volume shows in a very impressive manner the evil of parental indulgence, and the awful results which follow a disregard to the admonitions of conscience and indulgence in little sins. Most valuable for the young.

Domestic Missions.

ADDRESS

OF THE BOARD OF MISSIONS OF THE REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH TO THE MEMBERS OF THAT CHURCH, AND TO ALL WHO FEEL DISPOSED TO UNITE WITH THEM IN MISSIONARY EXERTIONS.

BELoved BRETHREN:—At the last meeting of the General Synod, the Board of Missions, which had been formerly restricted to foreign missionary operations, was directed to take the superintendence of domestic missions also. Having now matured our arrangements, we have felt it proper to address you in regard to the whole subject which has thus been intrusted to our care.

When our Saviour declared to his disciples, "The field is the world," he presented to his church the wide scene of her exertions, and plainly intimated that she should confine them by no narrow limits of nation, condition, or complexion, but extend them wherever perishing sinners were to be found, and souls to be saved. In the commission which our ascending LORD gave to his apostles, the same great principle is kept in view, and it should never be overlooked or forgotten by those who preach the gospel, and by those who sustain its ordinances, that the only authority which the ministry possesses for preaching at home, is that which also requires it to go abroad into "all the world." It is evident therefore, that the church cannot, consistently with duty, neglect either department of effort, and we rejoice that in both, our own denomination is actively engaged. The liberality recently manifested in behalf of the mission at Saharunpur proves her interest in the salvation of the heathen, and it is only necessary that efforts for her own destitute children should be developed and concentrated, to show that she feels no less desire to build up the church at home.

Our foreign missionary operations are now arranged in such a manner that we do not consider any immediate change to be requisite. The salaries of the two brethren who have been for so many years connected with the station, will, it is hoped, be provided for, according to the plan which has been already adopted, while the amount necessary for the support of the missionary who has been last sent out, and the native brethren who are employed as assistants, will be obtained, it is expected, by miscellaneous receipts and special contributions. All we feel it necessary to say, on this subject, is, that we hope none will diminish their contributions to the foreign fund, as this would seriously embarrass her operations, while we also hope that soon there will not be a single member in any part of our church who will not feel it a duty to give such aid as God may enable.

It is therefore to domestic missions we especially invite your attention. On this subject there is reason to believe that our entire church feels a deep interest. The wants of the destitute in our land are so obvious, the openings of usefulness among them so numerous and inviting, the natural sympathies of our hearts so much more readily excited in their behalf, that it is not surprising that there should be a general and earnest desire for more energetic and systematic action on this subject. The church would be following a suicidal course were she to devote her strength wholly or even chiefly to foreign operations, while the field at home was neglected. Even in view of the interests of the gospel abroad, it is a plain duty to build up the church in our own land. Nor should it be forgotten that multitudes of those who have once enjoyed the privileges of the public ordinances, and who may have been even in actual connexion with the church, are scattered abroad throughout this extensive land, in places where, at present, the voice of the living teacher is seldom heard, and the dispensation of the sacraments scarcely ever enjoyed. For these, her own children, scattered as sheep without a shepherd, the church must feel a deep concern. The ardent desire which the great apostle to the Gentiles felt for the salvation of the Jews, should lead us not to be forgetful of our own brethren, our kinsmen according to the flesh, our fellow countrymen in our own land.

Divine Providence presents to us a vast field for domestic missionary operations. From the Gulf of St. Lawrence to the farther side of the Mississippi, importunate calls are made for the ordinances. During last year, the great King and Head of Zion has opened to us new and interesting fields of labour, and in a voice not to be misunderstood, he is calling us to lengthen our cords and strengthen our stakes, and stretch forth the curtains of our habitation. Both the native citizens of our own land, and the hundreds of thousands of emigrants from our mother country, invite our efforts. The latter find in our particular forms of worship such a similarity with the cherished practices of their own native land, as leads them to prefer our church to almost every other, while her position in regard to slaveholding, and the conscientious liberty she maintains in regard to the civil government under which we live, must meet with the approbation of the benevolent, intelligent and liberal-minded. The citizens of our own land find in our system the application of religious principles to civil government, and the recognition of the great truth that "the powers that be," in order to obtain the approbation and sanction of the Christian, must give evidence that they "are of God." We believe that the system of order and doctrine which is maintained in our branch of the church is the best adapted of any to the necessities of our age and nation, and we feel confident that it is only necessary that it should be distinctly and properly exhibited in order to be extensively embraced.

In such circumstances, how painful is it that so little is done to promote the diffusion of our principles! How few are the messengers sent forth to announce them, and how inadequately are they sustained. The life of the domestic missionary is necessarily one of much toil and hardship. While crossing the bleak prairie, or traversing the gloomy forest, or fording the rapid river, exposed to wintry storms or drenching showers, or burning suns, finding but coarse and scanty fare, and rude and uncomfortable shelter, he claims our regard and sympathies, our prayers and our contributions. His condition, necessarily one of much discomfort, should be made as agreeable as possible, and his heart should be cheered by some evidences that he is not forgotten by his brethren. In all cases, there is doubtless much sacrifice of pecuniary advantages and personal convenience in performing the work of a missionary, and all engaged in that work should therefore be adequately and cheerfully sustained by the church on whose behalf they labour. It should be understood by those who are looking forward to the ministry, that they have no reason to fear suffering from poverty, in the service of the church, but that, as they seek only a bare subsistence, there is some security that they who minister at the altar shall live by the altar.

While there are some congregations which can afford a sufficient support to those who dispense the ordinances to them, there are others which cannot as yet do so, but which, if properly supplied, would soon be able not only to sustain their own pastors, but to aid others. In order to accomplish this result, the strong must aid the weak. We must unite together, and bear one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of CHRIST. It is hoped, therefore, that all who love the principles of our church, and desire their diffusion, will sustain her domestic missionary operations. There are some who have thought that too much in proportion was devoted to foreign missions, and who have expressed their desire that more should be done for domestic—the opportunity is now presented, the call is made. Let their liberal contributions prove their interest in this object. There are others who have given their aid generously for foreign missions. Let them do as much for the cause of CHRIST at home. Let it be remembered that “with whatsoever measure we mete, it shall be measured to us again.” Therefore, “beloved brethren, as ye abound in every thing, in faith, and utterance, and knowledge, and in all diligence, see that ye abound in this grace also. We speak not by commandment, but to prove the sincerity of your love. For ye know the grace of our LORD JESUS CHRIST, that though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty might be rich. Now, therefore, perform the doing, that as there was a readiness to will, so there may be a performance also out of that which ye have. For if there first be a willing mind, it is accepted according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not. For we mean not that other men be eased and you burdened, but by an equality, that now at this time your abundance may be a supply for their want, that their abundance may be also a supply for your want, that there may be an equality.” “For the administration of this service not only supplieth the wants of the saints, but is abundant also by many thanksgivings unto God, and by their prayers for you.”

A SABBATH DAY IN NOVA SCOTIA.

The following communication from Rev. Henry Gordon, will give our readers some idea of the nature of the missionary labours in which he has been employed during the past winter, and will enable us to appreciate better the services of the respected brother, Rev. A. Clarke, who so long has borne the hardships of so rigorous a climate.

We regret to learn that Mr. Gordon intends to return to the United States, but we hope his place will readily be filled by some person whom such trials will only stimulate, not alarm or deter. We hope that a suitable coadjutor will be soon procured, and that Mr. Clarke will no longer be left alone.

MR. EDITOR:—It may be interesting to your readers to know how the Sabbath is spent by missionaries in this part of the globe. I shall proceed to give some idea on the subject.

Sabbath, 14th of January, was the usual day for preaching in Sackville. To meet this arrangement, I left Amherst, a small village situated a few miles from the Bay of Fundy, and proceeded to Sackville, a distance of ten miles. The roads in general to the above place were very good, except where the snow had drifted; which, in some places, was four and five feet deep. The house we occupy in Sackville is a temperance hall, which, to all appearance, would hold at least three hundred people. At 11 o'clock, the hour for commencement, the house seemed thronged, and throughout the whole services, the people manifested the most marked attention. Some of them had come a distance of fourteen miles. In this station there are only two families in connexion with us, who are very exemplary for piety, and both evince, by their conduct, that they have not been hearers of the gospel in vain. There are also many others who are very favourable, though not actual members.

On the afternoon of the same day, I went to Jollicure, across a vast, dreary marsh, a distance of eight miles, encountering rude Boreas, with heavy sleet showers. At half-past 3 o'clock, I commenced public worship,—the attendance as large as could be expected, considering the state of the weather. In this settlement, though there is a neat house erected, there are not many members. But there are those in it who rejoice to hear the glad tidings of great joy; there are many whose desire is to go up to the sanctuary on the Lord's day, and bow before him there. After divine service, I left again for Amherst, along a bleak, dreary road, passing across the head of the Bay of Fundy, a distance of eleven miles, to the place where I intended stopping. I had not been long upon my journey, till dark clouds thickened over my head, evidently betokening a storm. On an average, the ground was covered with snow two feet in depth, and this being quite soft, from the rain, it was more disagreeable. Not being very well acquainted with the road, I lost my way, and got into a snow-drift. I managed to extricate myself, however, and proceeded the rest of the way with great difficulty, the hail beating in my face, and not a star to guide me. I reached home about ten o'clock at night.

Thus ended my Sabbath day's journey, after preaching twice and travelling nineteen miles. G.

Theological Discussions.

PEACE AND WAR.

[Concluded.]

The New Testament confirms the same doctrine. Rom. xiii. 1: "There is no power but of God, the powers that be, are ordained of God." The powers here specified are moral powers, or such as have lawful authority. This is evident both from the word here used in the original, and from the character given of these powers, or rulers, in this passage. There are two words, of different meanings, in the Greek language, both of which we translate power, ἐξουσία and δύναμις. The first signifies moral power, or lawful authority, either really possessed, or claimed as such. The second, applies to might, ability, or mere physical force. The latter may belong to the veriest tyrant. The former not. The word here used is the former, and not the latter. Such lawful authority, or moral power, is said to be of God, ordained and approved by him. But when such is not the power, God declares it is not of him. Hos. viii. 4: "They have set up kings, but not by me; they have princes, but I knew it not." That is, I approved it not. When more power or might is intended, the word δύναμις is used, as in Matt. vi. 13, where the omnipotence of Jehovah is declared: "Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory." So in 1 Cor. xv. 43, where the vigorous, strong, and healthy qualities of the body, after the resurrection, are contrasted with its feeble, infirm, and crazy condition, in this life, the same word is used, "raised in power." The physical power of Satan, and of venomous creatures to hurt or injure, is expressed by the same word, Luke x. 19: "All the powers of the enemy." But when moral power or authority, that which is enjoyed by delegation, is concerned, the word ἐξουσία, and not δύναμις is uniformly used. A few examples may suffice. In Matt. xxviii. 18, the "all power" in heaven and in earth, delegated to the Saviour, is expressed by this word. Also the authority to heal sickness as granted to the apostles, Mark iii. 15, is expressed by the same word. In Luke ix. 1, we have both these words, showing their distinct and proper meaning, "power and authority." And in Chap. x. 19, we have an exemplification of the same kind, "power to tread on serpents and scorpions, and over all the power of the enemy."

To this it is objected, that ἐξουσία is used for the dominion of the devil, and therefore cannot always signify lawful authority, Acts xxvi. 18; Eph. ii. 2; Col. i. 13; Rev. xiii. 2. But this is no valid objection. Scripture often speaks of things as they are called among men, and according to the usages of the claimants of what really does not belong to them. The idols of the nations are called gods, and yet they are no gods. Christ bids the woman of Samaria to "go and call her husband," the man who bore that name, and yet he was not her husband. Satan claims rightful power over all the kingdoms of the earth, and to be the prince of the power of the air. Luke iv. 6: "And the devil said unto him, All this power (right and authority) will I give unto thee, and the glory of them; for that is delivered unto me, and to whomsoever I will, I give it." Here is a claim, not merely of physical power, but of right and authority. What tyrant or despot admits that he has not a right to exercise the power which he possesses? Charles the First contended that he was king by divine right, that his absolute power was immediately from God. The pope claims a right, from Jesus Christ, to dispose of all the kingdoms of the earth. Slaveholders derive their right to enslave their fellow-men from the Bible. All, from the devil down, plead divine right. And on this ground, he assumes to give, not only δύναμιν, physical power, but ἐξουσίαν, authority, also, to the beast, Rev. xiii. 2. And how many are there, even in the Christian church, who plead for the same claim in behalf of those beastly powers, who get all their authority from the devil; and still call them the ordinance of God?

It is not, therefore, because the devil really possesses this ἐξουσίαν, but because he claims it, that in giving the relation, it is ascribed to him, as he is called the prince and the god of this world, for, whatever physical power he may possess, authority he has none.* And the same may be said of all immoral powers. And, in one word, the characters given by the apostle, in the thirteenth chapter of the Romans, never could apply to tyrants, or to any but to moral, lawful powers, as we have proved the word here used signifies. And, indeed, the words literally translated, as they ought to have been, would abundantly show this. "For there is no authority unless from God, and these being authorities, (that is, lawful rulers,) are ordained of God." The participle οὖσαι, applies to the being of such magistrates, whenever and wherever they may exist. Such, and only such, are God's ordinance. And resistance is forbidden, only when it is directed against the ordinance of God. This ordinance of God secures the continuance of civil government in the world, as well under the gospel dispensation, as under the Old Testament economy. There were, in the apostle's days, some who "despised dominion, and spoke evil of dignities," who imagined that the gospel had put an end to all civil government. In our own day, we hear of some who cherish the same sentiments, who declare they "cannot acknowledge allegiance to any human government." To all such, the apostle, speaking by the Spirit of God, says, "Let every soul be subject to the higher powers." Refusing the ordinance of God, is equal to resisting it. It is not obeying the command. Some suppose that the apostle contradicts Christ, and that it is better to obey Christ than the apostle. This is to deny a part of divine revelation. It is divine. Be not deceived. Christ inspired the apostles by his Holy Spirit, and they spoke nothing but what he commanded them. Rest assured, if you understand the apostle, and believe that he contradicts Christ, you have misunderstood Christ. And that you have, I most firmly believe. He has, indeed, a spiritual kingdom, and all his saints belong to it, and worship him as King of Saints. But these are not his only subjects. He is also King of nations. He is "the prince of the kings of the earth." "He has a name written on his vesture, and on his thigh, King of kings, and Lord of lords." These do not represent saints. The kingdoms are distinct. Saints and nations do not mean the same thing, otherwise why are they mentioned as two?

Some attempt to distinguish between passive obedience and non-resistance, and plead only for non-resistance. Well, it is granted there is a shade of difference. The one is not precisely the same as the other, and yet they are nearly allied. An improper demand is made upon a female. She, with great propriety, refuses compliance, but to any injury that is offered, according to the principle of non-resistance, passive endurance is all that duty requires. The difference here would not be great. The protection of law is also refused. According to the system all civil government should cease. No more laws to be made and executed by men. The prison doors must be thrown open, and jails emptied upon society. The robbers, and the plunderers, the incendiaries, and the murderers, have free license unrestrained to work their will upon the community. Now unless the divine Being would interpose, by a miracle, could society exist? Have we any ground to believe that such an interposition would be made? Does not the reasoning of Christ himself suppose, and certainly infer, the necessity of magistrates, trials and punishment? Matt. v. 25: "Agree with thine adversary quickly, whiles thou art in the way with him, lest at any time the adversary deliver thee to the judge, and the judge deliver thee to the officer, and thou be cast into prison." Is there any thing in this direction of the Saviour, to countenance the laying aside the ordinary means of preservation, by judges and prisons, and trust to a miraculous interposition of heaven? Verily, no.

* Since the preceding was written, the author has in some measure modified his views in regard to the meaning of ἐξουσία, which he believes does not invariably denote moral power, although when moral power is meant, it and not δυνάμις is the word used.

CONSCIENCE.

Conscience is that principle implanted by the Creator within the human breast, by which we judge of the right or wrong of any question which arises before us. It also connects emotions of pleasure or pain with the observance or neglect of what is right, or the commission of what is wrong by ourselves, and gives rise to a sense of merit or demerit in regard to the actions observed in others. The estimate we put on a person depends almost entirely on the degree in which we suppose they are influenced by this faculty. When we say of persons, that "they have no conscience," we mean that their moral sensibilities are blunted, and that their perception of right and wrong is obscure and dependent on their views of what is most expedient for the gratification of their selfish desires. Nor do we mean, when we say that a person has no conscience, literally, that they are altogether destitute of that faculty, but only that they act as if they were. For although those who neglect the exercise of this faculty or disregard its admonitions, and act in direct opposition to its dictates, may for a time cease to hear its whisperings, or feel its goadings, while it is as it were "seared with a hot iron," yet it is not dead, but only slumbers in a morbid inactivity; and, if not before, will, on the bed of death, or in the unveiling of futurity, awake with thunderings. If its indications are observed—its promptings obeyed—there is no principle of our nature capable of affording more substantial and unalloyed happiness. For it is the voice of God, and this must be its tendency. When, as the scriptures express it, we "harden our hearts," which is but another name for going contrary to and fighting against the dictates of our conscience, we are doing all in our power to ruin our own happiness for time, and perhaps for eternity. For it is only in the path of duty which it points out, that we can find ways of pleasantness and paths of peace. But if we would reap the full benefit of the teachings of conscience, we must exercise it in the light of God's word, with prayer for the illuminating influences of his Holy Spirit, and also avoid the least departure from its decisions, for its calls become less and less distinct to those who turn a deaf ear to them. As it is a fixed law of our nature that our active principles are strengthened by exercise, if we would have our conscience—which is one of them—in a healthful, vigorous state, we must exercise it. As the hunter, in pursuing the trail of the game, acquires a sharpness and quickness of sight, by the exercise of that organ, which enables him to see the way clear where others would find no traces whatever, just so the one accustomed to follow the path of duty watchfully and constantly will find it distinctly marked out in many places where another, not accustomed to seek or travel in it, would not see its course or bearings. And were Christians more careful in following the path of duty—that is, obeying the dictates of conscience, taking God's word as a light to their feet and a lamp to their path, how many errors and wanderings would be avoided which bring trouble and sorrow to themselves, and shame and reproach on their Master. And how would they be able to rejoice as many of their perplexing doubts vanished, that in the humble discharge of known duty, they had found the key to the declaration of the Saviour,—“If any man will do my will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God.” These thoughts were forcibly suggested by hearing a friend remark that “—— had mistaken their calling, for they were not conscientious enough.” O what a pity, what a shame, that Christians should thus not only deprive themselves of the joys of a pure conscience, but also weaken their influence for good, and bring reproach on their Lord, who bought them. Let each one ask themselves with prayer and self-examination, whether they are constantly exercising their conscience as becomes Christians in view of their obligations and interests; or whether they are slighting its calls, neglecting its warnings, and often acting in direct opposition to its requirements. And let those who are smothering and disregarding the voice of this vicegerent of God in their breasts, consider that the calm and quiet they seek is but the awful, death-like stillness which precedes the bursting of the storm. As conscience now pleads for God and they refuse to hear, so God may leave them to call when he will not answer; but say as he did to Ephraim, “He is joined to his idols; let him alone.” And may we all remember the warning of the Spirit: “He that being often reprov'd, hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy;” and be striving, that “the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself to God, may purge our consciences from dead works, to serve the living God.” B.

A VISIT TO THE CELESTIAL CITY.

[Concluded.]

It was late in the day when the train thundered into the ancient city of Vanity, where Vanity Fair is still at the height of prosperity, and, exhibits an epitome of whatever is brilliant, gay and fascinating beneath the sun. As I purposed to make a considerable stay here, it gratified me to learn that there is now no longer the want of harmony between the town's-people and pilgrims, which impelled the former to such lamentably mistaken measures as the persecution of Christian and the fiery martyrdom of Faithful. On the contrary, as the new rail-road brings with it great trade and a constant influx of strangers, the lord of Vanity Fair is its chief patron, and the capitalists of the city are among the largest stockholders. Many passengers stop to take their pleasure or make their profit in the Fair, instead of going onward to the Celestial City. Indeed, such are the charms of the place, that the people often affirm it to be the true and only heaven; stoutly contending that there is no other; that those who seek farther are mere dreamers, and that if the fabled brightness of the Celestial City lay but a mile beyond the gates of Vanity, they would not be fools enough to go thither. Without subscribing to these, perhaps exaggerated encomiums, I can truly say, that my abode in the city was mainly agreeable, and my intercourse with the inhabitants productive of much amusement and instruction.

Being naturally of a serious turn, my attention was directed to the solid advantages derivable from a residence here, rather than to the effervescent pleasures, which are the grand object with too many visitants. The Christian reader, if he have had no accounts of the city later than Bunyan's time, will be surprised to hear that almost every street has its church, and that the reverend clergy are nowhere held in higher respect than at Vanity Fair. And well do they deserve such honourable estimation; for the maxims of wisdom and virtue which fall from their lips, come from as deep a spiritual source, and tend to as lofty a religious aim, as those of the sagest philosophers of old. In justification of this high praise, I need only mention the names of the Rev. Mr. Shallow-deep, the Rev. Mr. Stumble-at-truth, that fine old clerical character, the Rev. Mr. This-to-day, who expects shortly to resign his pulpit to the Rev. Mr. That-to-morrow; together with the Rev. Mr. Bewilderment, the Rev. Mr. Clog-the-spirit, and, last and greatest, the Rev. Dr. Wind-of-doctrine. The labours of these eminent divines are aided by those of innumerable lecturers, who diffuse such a various profundity in all subjects of human nature or celestial science, that any man may acquire a universal erudition, without the trouble of even learning to read. Thus literature is etherealized by assuming for its medium the human voice; and knowledge, depositing all its heavier particles—except, doubtless, its gold—becomes exhaled into a sound, which forthwith steals into the ever-open ear of the community. These ingenious methods constitute a sort of machinery by which thought and study are done to every person's hand without his putting himself to the slightest inconvenience in the matter. There is another species of machine for the manufacture of individual morality. This excellent result is effected by societies for all manner of virtuous purposes: with which a man has merely to connect himself, throwing, as it were, his quota of virtue into the common stock; and the president and directors will take care that the aggregate amount be well applied. All these, and other wonderful improvements in ethics, religion, and literature, being made clear to my comprehension by the ingenious Mr. Smooth-it-away, inspired me with great admiration of Vanity Fair.

It would fill a volume, in an age of pamphlets, were I to record all my observations in this great capital of human business and pleasure. There was an unlimited range of society—the powerful, the wise, the witty, and the famous in every walk of life—princes, presidents, poets, generals, artists, actors and philanthropists, all making their own market at the Fair, and deeming no price too exorbitant for such commodities as hit their fancy. It is well worth one's while, even if he had no idea of buying or selling, to loiter through the bazaars, and observe the various sorts of traffic that were going forward. Some of the purchasers, I thought, made very foolish bargains. For instance, a young man, having inherited a splendid fortune, laid out a considerable portion of it in the purchase of diseases, and finally spent all the rest for a heavy lot of repentance and a suit of rags. There was a sort of stock or scrip called conscience, which seemed to be in great demand, and would purchase almost any thing. Indeed, few rich commodities were to be obtained without paying a heavy sum in this particular stock, as a man's business was seldom very lucrative, unless he knew precisely when and how to throw his hoard of conscience into the market. Yet, as his stock was the only thing of permanent value, whoever parted with it was sure to find himself a loser in the long run. Thousands sold their happiness for a whim.

Gilded chains were in great demand, and purchased with almost any sacrifice. In truth, those who desired, according to the old adage, to sell any thing valuable for a song, might find customers all over the Fair; and there were innumerable messes of pottage, piping hot, for such as chose to buy them with their birth-rights. A few articles, however, could not be found genuine at Vanity Fair. If a customer wished to renew his stock of youth, the dealers offered him a set of false teeth and an auburn wig, if he demanded peace of mind, they recommended opium, or a brandy bottle.

Tracts of land and golden mansions, situate in the Celestial City, were often exchanged, at very disadvantageous rates, for a few years' lease of small, dismal, inconvenient tenements in Vanity Fair.

Day after day, as I walked the streets of Vanity, my manners and deportment became more and more like those of the inhabitants. The place began to seem like home; the idea of pursuing my travels to the Celestial City was almost obliterated from my mind. I was reminded of it, however, by the sight of the same pair of simple pilgrims at whom we had laughed so heartily, when Apollyon puffed smoke and steam into their faces, at the commencement of our journey. There they stood amid the densest bustle of Vanity—the dealers offering them their purple, and fine linen, and jewels; the men of wit and humour gibing at them; a pair of buxom ladies ogling them askance; while the benevolent Mr. Smooth-it-away whispered some of his wisdom at their elbows, and pointed to a newly erected temple,—but there stood these two worthy simpletons, making the scene look wild and monstrous, merely by their sturdy refusal to take any part in its business or pleasures.

One of them—his name was Stick-to-the-right—perceived, in my face, I suppose, a species of sympathy and almost admiration, which, to my own great surprise, I could not help feeling for this pragmatic couple. It prompted him to address me.

"Sir," inquired he, with a sad, yet mild and kind voice, "do you call yourself a pilgrim?"

"Yes," I replied, "my right to that appellation is indubitable. I am merely a sojourner here in Vanity Fair, being bound to the Celestial City by the new rail-road."

"Alas, friend," rejoined Mr. Stick-to-the-right, "I do assure you, and beseech you to receive the truth of my words, that that whole concern is a bubble. You may travel on it all your life-time, were you to live thousands of years, and yet never get beyond the limits of Vanity Fair. Yea, though you should deem yourself entering the gates of the Blessed City, it will be nothing but a miserable delusion."

"The Lord of the Celestial City," began the other pilgrim, whose name was Mr. Go-the-old-way, "has refused, and will for ever refuse, to grant an act of incorporation for this rail-road; and unless that be obtained, no passenger can ever hope to enter his dominions. Wherefore every man who buys a ticket must lay his account with losing the purchase money—which is the value of his own soul."

"Poh, nonsense," said Mr. Smooth-it-away, taking my arm and leading me off, "these fellows ought to be indicted for a libel. If the law stood as it once did in Vanity Fair, we should see them grinning through the iron bars of the prison window."

This incident made a considerable impression on my mind, and contributed, with other circumstances, to indispose me to a permanent residence in the city of Vanity; although, of course, I was not simple enough to give up my original plan of gliding along easily and commodiously by rail-road. Still, I grew anxious to be gone.

There was one strange thing that troubled me. Amid the occupations or amusements of the Fair, nothing was more common than for a person—whether at a feast, theatre, or church, or trafficking for wealth and honours, or whatever he might be doing, and however unseasonable the interruption—suddenly to vanish like a soap bubble, and be never more seen of his fellows; and so accustomed were the latter to such little accidents, that they went on with their business, as quietly as if nothing had happened. But it was otherwise with me.

Finally, after a pretty long residence at the Fair, I resumed my journey towards the Celestial City, still with Mr. Smooth-it-away at my side. At a short distance beyond the suburbs of Vanity we passed the ancient silver-mine of which Demas was the first discoverer, and which is now wrought to great advantage, supplying nearly all the coined currency of the world. A little farther onward was the spot where Lot's wife had stood for ages, under the semblance of a pillar of salt. Curious travellers have carried it away piecemeal. Had all regrets been punished as rigorously as this poor dame's were, my yearning for the relinquished delights of Vanity Fair might have produced a similar change in my own corporeal substance, and left me a warning to future pilgrims.

The next remarkable object was a large edifice, constructed of moss-grown stone, but in a modern and airy style of architecture. The engine came to a pause in its vicinity, with the usual tremendous shriek.

"This was formerly the castle of the redoubtable giant Despair," observed Mr. Smooth-it-away, "but, since his death, Mr. Flimsy-faith has repaired it, and now keeps an excellent house of entertainment. It is one of our stopping-places."

"It seems but slightly put together," remarked I, looking at the frail, yet ponderous walls. "I do not envy Mr. Flimsy-faith his habitation. Some day it will tumble down upon the heads of the occupants."

"We shall escape, at all events," said Mr. Smooth-it-away, "for Apollyon is putting on the steam again."

The road now plunged into a gorge of the Delectable Mountains, and traversed the field where, in former ages, the blind men wandered and stumbled among the tombs. One of these ancient tomb-stones had been thrust across the track, by some malicious person, and gave the train of cars a terrible jolt. Far up the rugged side of a mountain I perceived a rusty iron door, half overgrown with bushes and creeping plants, but with smoke issuing from its crevices.

"Is that," inquired I, "the very door in the hill-side, which the shepherds assured Christian was a by-way to hell?"

"That was a joke on the part of the shepherds," said Mr. Smooth-it-away, with a smile. "It is neither more nor less than the door of a cavern, which they use as a smoke house."

My recollections of the journey are now, for a little space, dim and confused, inasmuch as a singular drowsiness here overcame me, owing to the fact that we were passing over the enchanted ground, the air of which encouraged a disposition to sleep. I awoke, however, as soon as we crossed the borders of the pleasant land of Beulah. All the passengers were rubbing their eyes, comparing watches, and congratulating one another on the prospect of arriving so seasonably at their journey's end. The sweet breezes of this happy clime came refreshingly to our nostrils; we beheld the glimmering gush of silver fountains, overhung by trees of beautiful foliage and delicious fruit, which were propagated by grafts from the celestial gardens. Once, as we dashed onward like a hurricane, there was a flutter of wings, and the bright appearance of an angel in the air, speeding forth on some heavenly mission. The engine now announced the close vicinity of the final station-house, by one last and horrible scream, in which there seemed to be distinguishable every kind of wailing and woe, and bitter fierceness of wrath, all mixed up with the wild laughter of a devil or a madman. All through our journey, at every stopping-place, Apollyon had exercised his ingenuity in screwing the most abominable sounds out of the whistle of the steam-engine; but in this closing effort he outdid himself, and created an infernal uproar, which, besides disturbing the peaceful inhabitants of Beulah, must have sent its discord even through the celestial gates.

While the horrid clamour was still ringing in our ears, we heard an exulting strain, as if a thousand instruments of music, with height, and depth, and sweetness in their tones, at once tender and triumphant, were struck in unison to greet the approach of some illustrious hero, who had fought the good fight and won a glorious victory, and was come to lay aside his battered arms for ever. Looking to ascertain what might be the occasion of this glad harmony, I perceived on alighting from the cars, that a multitude of shining ones had assembled on the river, to welcome two poor pilgrims, who were just emerging from its depths. They were the same whom Apollyon and ourselves had persecuted with taunts and gibes, and scalding steam, at the commencement of our journey—the same whose unworldly aspect and impressive words had stirred my conscience amid the wild revellers of Vanity Fair.

“How amazingly well those men have got on,” cried I to Mr. Smooth-it-away. “I wish we were secure of so good a reception.”

“Never fear—never fear,” answered my friend. “Come—make haste; the ferry-boat will be off directly; and in three minutes you will be on the other side of the river. No doubt you will find coaches to carry you up to the city gates.”

A steam ferry-boat, the last improvement on this important route, lay at the river side, puffing, snorting, and emitting all those other disagreeable utterances which betoken the departure to be immediate. I hurried on board with the rest of the passengers, most of whom were in great perturbation; some bawling out for their baggage; some tearing their hair and exclaiming that the boat would explode or sink; some already pale with the heaving of the stream; some gazing affrighted at the ugly aspect of the steersman, and some still dizzy with the slumbering influences of the Enchanted Ground. Looking back to the shore, I was amazed to discern Mr. Smooth-it-away waving his hand in token of farewell.

“Don’t you go over to the Celestial City?” exclaimed I.

“O no,” answered he, with a queer smile, and that same disagreeable contortion of visage which I had remarked in the inhabitants of the Dark Valley.

“O no. I have come thus far only for the sake of your pleasant company. Good bye. We shall meet again.”

And then did my excellent friend, Mr. Smooth-it-away, laugh outright. In the midst of his laughter, however, a smoke wreath issued from his mouth and nostrils, while a twinkle of livid flame darted out of either eye, proving that his heart was all of a red blaze. The impudent fiend. To deny the existence of Tophet, when he felt its fiery tortures raging within his breast. I rushed to the side of the boat, intending to fling myself on shore: but the wheels, as they began their revolutions, threw a dash of spray over me, so cold—so deadly cold, with the chill that will never leave those waters, until death be drowned in his own river—that with a shiver and a heart-quake, I awoke. It was a dream.

WE DO NOT PRAY ENOUGH.—Felix Neff once made the following comparison: “When a pump is frequently used, but little pains are necessary to have water: the water pours out the first stroke, because it is high. But if the pump has not been used for a long time, the water gets low, and when you want it you must pump a long while, and the water comes only after great effort. It is so with prayer. If we are constant in prayer, every little circumstance awakens the disposition to pray, and desires and words are always ready. But if we neglect prayer, it is difficult for us to pray, for the well gets low.”

WHICH ARE THE BEST INVESTMENTS.

"I am well satisfied," thought a worldly man, "with the state of my investments. I hold a large amount in government stock at a premium. My insurance funds yield me ten per cent.; my city lots are steadily rising in value; how lucky, that I laid out so largely in rail-road shares which are bringing me a plentiful income, without my moving a finger! I have several thousands on hand, which I scarcely know what to do with. They must not be idle; I will expend them in building. 'Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease—eat, drink, and be merry.'"

"I am well pleased," thought a Christian, "with my investments. Many years ago, I placed a considerable sum at interest in the Foreign Mission Funds, and have been enabled to add to it every year. Who can tell the good it may have done? Without my moving a step, it is contributing to spread the truth on the opposite side of the globe. A very favourite investment with me is in Domestic Missions. The compound interest on that stock is incalculable. I have shares of real estate in several new churches built at the West, where hundreds will hear the gospel preached when I am sleeping in the dust. A small sum, that I came very near wasting, is aiding, at this moment, to evangelize France. How happy I am that I took shares in the Bible, Tract, and Education Companies, which are paying rich dividends of good, and promise yet larger ones! I have a few dollars in hand, which I do not need. They shall not lie idle a day. I will divide them between the seamen and the Portuguese exiles. And may He who furnishes the money, bestow his blessing with it."

I'M TOO BUSY.

A merchant sat at his office-desk; various letters were spread before him; his whole being was absorbed in the intricacies of his business. A zealous friend of mankind entered the office. "I want to interest you a little in a new effort for the temperance cause," said the good man. The merchant cut him off by replying, "Sir, you must excuse me, but really I'm too busy to attend to that subject now." "But, sir, intemperance is on the increase among us," said his friend. "It is? I'm sorry; but I'm too busy at present to do any thing." "When shall I call again, sir?" "I cannot tell. I'm very busy. I'm busy every day. Excuse me, sir, I wish you a good morning." Then bowing the intruder out of the office, he resumed the study of his papers. The merchant had frequently repulsed the friends of humanity in this manner. No matter what was the object, he was too busy to listen to their claims. He had even told his minister he was too busy for any thing but to make money. But one morning a disagreeable stranger stepped very softly to his side, laying a cold, moist hand upon his brow, and saying, "Go home with me." The merchant laid down his pen; his head grew dizzy; his stomach felt faint and sick; he left the counting-room, went home, and retired to his bed-chamber. His unwelcome visiter had followed him, and now took his place by the bed-side, whispering ever and anon, "You must go with me." A cold chill settled on the merchant's heart; dim spectres of ships, notes, houses and lands flitted before his excited mind. Still his pulse beat slower, his heart heaved heavily, thick films gathered over his eyes, his tongue refused to speak. Then the merchant knew that the name of his visiter was Death!

All other claimants on his attention, except the friends of mammon, had always found a quick dismissal in the magic phrase, "I'm too busy." Humanity, mercy, religion, had alike begged his influence, means and attention in vain. But when death came, the excuse was powerless; he was compelled to have leisure to die. Let us beware how to make ourselves too busy to secure life's great end. When the excuse rises to our lips, and we are about to say that we are too busy, to do good, let us remember we cannot be too busy to die.

THE COVENANTERS' NIGHT HYMN.

The religious persecutions of the Covenanters were not mere things of a day, but were continued through at least three entire generations. They extended from the accession of James VI. to the English throne, (testibus the rhymes of Sir David Lyndsay, and the classic prose of Buchanan,) down to the revolution of 1688—almost a century, during which many thousands tyrannically perished, without in the least degree loosening that tenacity of purpose, or subduing that perseveridum ingenium, which, according to Thuanus, have been national characteristics.

As in almost all similar cases, the cause of the Covenanters, so strenuously and unflinchingly maintained, ultimately resulted in the victory of protestantism—that victory, the fruits of which we have seemed of late years so readily inclined to throw away; and, in its rural districts more especially, of nothing are the people more justly proud than —“the tales

Of persecution and the Covenant,
Whose echo rings through Scotland to this hour.”

So says Wordsworth. Those traditions have been emblazoned by the pens of Scott, McCrie, Galt, Hogg, Wilson, Grahame, and Pollok, and by the pencils of Wilkie, Harvie, and Duncan,—each regarding them with the eye of his peculiar genius.

In reference to the following stanzas, it should be remembered that, during the holding of their conventicles—which frequently, in the more troublous times, took place amid mountain solitudes, and during the night—a sentinel was stationed on some commanding height in the neighbourhood, to give warning of the approach of danger.—[Blackwood.

I.

Ho! plaided watcher of the hill,
What of the night?—what of the night?
The winds are low, the woods are still,
The countless stars are sparkling bright;
From out this heathery moorland glen,
By the shy wild-fowl only trod,
We raise our hymn, unheard of men,
To Thee—an omnipresent God!

II.

Jehovah! though no sign appear,
Through earth our aimless path to lead,
We know, we feel Thee ever near,
A present help in time of need—
Near, as when, pointing out the way,
For ever in thy people's sight,
A pillared wreath of smoke by day,
Which turned to fiery flame at night!

III.

Whence came the summons forth to go?—
From Thee awoke the warning sound!
“Out to your tents, O Israel! Lo!
The heathen's warfare girds thee round.
Sons of the faithful! up—away!
The lamb must of the wolf beware;
The falcon seeks the dove for prey;
The fowler spreads his cunning snare!”

IV.

Day set in gold; 'twas peace around—
'Twas seeming peace by field and flood:
We woke, and on our lintels found
The cross of wrath—the mark of blood.
Lord! in thy cause we mocked at fears,
We scorned the ungodly's threatening words—
Beat out our pruning-hooks to spears,
And turned our ploughshares into swords!

V.

Degenerate Scotland! days have been Thy soil when only freemen trod—
When mountain-crag and valley green
Poured forth the loud acclaim to God!—
The fire which liberty imparts,
Refulgent in each patriot eye,
And, graven on a nation's hearts,
The Word—for which we stand or die!

VI.

Unholy change! The scorner's chair
Is now the seat of those who rule;
Tortures, and bonds, and death, the share
Of all except the tyrant's tool.
That faith in which our fathers breathed,
And had their life, for which they died—
That priceless heirloom they bequeathed
Their sons—our impious foes deride!

VII.

So we have left our homes behind,
And we have belted on the sword,
And we in solemn league have joined,
Yea! covenanted with the Lord,
Never to seek those homes again,
Never to give the sword its sheath,
Until our rights of faith remain
Unfettered as the air we breathe!

VIII.

O Thou, who rulest above the sky,
Begirt about with starry thrones,
Cast from the heaven of heavens thine eye
Down on our wives and little ones—
From hallelujahs surging round,
Oh! for a moment turn thine ear,
The widow prostrate on the ground,
The famished orphan's cries to hear!

IX.

And Thou wilt hear! it cannot be,
That Thou wilt list the raven's brood,
When from their nest they scream to Thee,
And in due season send them food;
It cannot be that Thou wilt weave
The lily such superb array,
And yet unfed, unsheltered, leave
Thy children—as if less than they!

X.

We have no hearth—the ashes lie
In blackness where they brightly shone;
We have no home—the desert sky
Our covering, earth our couch alone;
We have no heritage—deprived
Of these, we ask not such on earth;
Our hearts are sealed; we seek in heaven,
For heritage, and home, and hearth!

XI.

O Salem, city of the saints,
And holy men made perfect! We
Pant for thy gates, our spirits faint
Thy glorious golden streets to see;—
To mark the rapture that inspires
The ransomed, and redeemed by grace;
To listen to the seraph's lyres,
And meet the angels face to face!

XII.

Father in heaven! we turn not back,
Though briers and thorns choke up the path;
Rather the torture of the rack,
Than tread the wine-press of Thy wrath.
Let thunders crash, let torrents shower,
Let whirlwinds churn the howling sea,
What is the turmoil of an hour,
To an eternal calm with Thee?

The Family Circle.

THE QUAKER AND THE LITTLE THIEF.

Children, have you ever heard of Isaac T. Hopper, or "Friend Isaac," as he is familiarly called. He belongs to the Society of Friends; and if you should ever happen to meet him, you would not need to be told that he was a very good-natured man, not particularly averse to an occasional joke. Well, a few days ago, the old gentleman came into my office; and among the stories he told, was one which we must re-tell.

While residing in Philadelphia, I had in my yard a pear-tree, which bore most excellent fruit. Between my yard and that of one of my neighbours, was a very high fence, with sharp iron pickets upon it. Now I did not put these pickets there. I don't approve of such things. It was the landlord's work. Well, one year, when the pear tree bore very abundantly, there happened to be a girl belonging to my neighbour's family, who was as fond of pears as I was myself, and I saw her several times climb the high fence, and walk carefully along between the pickets, until she came opposite the pear-tree. Then she would reach over, fill her basket with fruit, and carry it away.

One day I called upon my young friend with a basket of the nicest pears I could find.

"Rebecca," said I, "here are some fine pears for thee."

She did not know what I meant. I explained: "Rebecca, I brought these pears on purpose for thee. I wish to make thee a present of them, as I see thou art fond of them." "I don't want them, sir."

"Ah, but thou dost, Rebecca; else thou wouldst not take so much pains almost every day to get them."

Still she would not take the pears, and I used a little more eloquence.

"Rebecca," I said, "thou must go and get a basket for these pears, or I shall leave them on the carpet. I am sure thou must like them, or thou wouldst not climb such a high and dangerous fence to get them. Those pickets are very sharp, Rebecca; and if thy feet should slip while thou art walking alone on the fence, and I am very much afraid they will, thou wouldst get hurt a great deal more than the pears are worth. Now thou art welcome to the fruit; but I hope I shall not see thee expose thyself so foolishly. But perhaps thou hast taken the pears so long, that they seem to belong to thee, as much as they belong to me. So I do not wish to blame thee, any more than thy conscience does. But, pray look out for those pickets. They are dangerous. I would have them removed, only I am afraid the landlord would not like it. Thou art welcome to the pears, though, and I will bring thee a basket full every day."

The little girl did not steal any more pears; and I venture to say that she was sufficiently rebuked before the end of the pear season, for I remembered my promise, and carried her a basket full every morning.

A DISOBEDIENT SCHOLAR.

Eight years ago, a scholar caused much pain to the superintendent, as well as to his teacher; complaints from the latter to the former were very frequent; he was placed in another class, and still continued disobedient. His mother being a widow, it was thought advisable to have patience and not expel him, or even request that he be kept at home. The superintendent frequently visited the mother, but she could not be persuaded that her son was as bad as represented, and permitted her affection to overcome her judgment to that degree, that she neglected to reprove or chasten him. The superintendent expostulated, and assured her that unless he was corrected, ultimately he would prove a thorn in her bosom; but she concluded that the superintendent was prejudiced and would not regard his kind and disinterested entreaties. Being left fatherless himself, at an early age, and having a pious, sensible mother who trained and corrected him properly, he felt for this widow and her son. The lad was permitted to attend the school, but was the source of annoyance frequently, and was often called up and reproved kindly and publicly. He, at length, left school, and was placed in a situation to earn a trifle. His employer had not work to keep him employed. As he had much leisure, the superintendent occasionally loaned him a book. After two years, he obtained an excellent situation, and promised to do well. This new situation he kept for perhaps twelve months when it was seen that he had formed bad associates, and frequented improper places. His integrity was justly suspected, and at last intemperance plainly exhibited itself, and he was discharged.

He may now be seen in a place where the idle and profligate assemble. Now his mother has sorrow upon sorrow—the faithful superintendent's predictions are verified. Like Eli, she was informed that her son did evil, but she restrained him not. Here is a sad lesson for parents who disregard the precept, "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it."—S. S. Adv.

PHILIP HENRY'S ELDEST DAUGHTER.--Though younger than her brother Matthew, Sarah was the eldest sister. When six or seven years of age her father taught her Hebrew, and among other good customs she early began to take notes of sermons, so that before she reached her threescore years and ten she had many fair-written volumes--the record of sweet Sabbaths and endearing solemnities. Married to Mr. Savage, a substantial farmer, and a pious man, in the abundance of a farmhouse she found ample means for indulging her charitable disposition, and whilst blessed by the poor, to whose necessities she ministered, she was beloved by grateful friends, to whom her Christian composure and tender sympathy made her a welcome visitor in seasons of anxiety and sorrow. Through life she retained the bookish habits which she acquired at Broad Oak, and found time to read a great deal, and to copy for the use of her children many of those Christian biographies which were then circulated in manuscript, and not intended for the press.--But her superior understanding and elevated tastes did not disqualify her for the more irksome duties of her station. She verified the remark that "Educated persons excel in the meanest things, and refined persons possess the most common sense." She made all the better farmer's wife for being Philip Henry's daughter; and the main difference betwixt the cultivated lady and the vulgar housewife was, that she did more things, and did them better. In the morning she visited the dairy, the kitchen, the market, and then it seemed as if she was all day alike in the parlour and the nursery. Besides clothing her household she found time to make garments for the poor; and by lying down with a book beside her she contrived to improve her mind, and read the works of such theologians as Owen, and Flavel, and Howe. Like her father, and most of the Puritans, she possessed a serene and tranquil spirit, and during the forty years of her married life was never known to lose her temper. Doubtless much of her successful industry, as well as the quiet dignity of her character, must be ascribed to this meek self-possession; for whilst her notable neighbours deemed it needful to screech commands over all the house, and follow each blundering menial in a perpetual fluster, the simplicity and forethought of Mrs. Savage's directions saved a world of trouble, and all things appeared to adjust and expedite themselves around her calm and gentle presence. Her new home was near her parents, and, besides frequent visits, she was often getting a word in season from the ready pen of her loving father. "If you would keep warm in this cold season, (January, 1692,) take these four directions:--1. Get into the Sun. Under his blessed beams there are warmth and comfort. 2. Go near the fire. 'Is not the Word like fire?' How many cheering passages are there! 3. Keep in motion and action--stirring up the grace and gift of God that is in you. 4. And seek Christian converse and communion. 'How can one be warm alone?'" Along with the piety of her father she inherited much of his observant eye and spiritual mind; and many of her remarks are not only striking in themselves, but derive a charm from the little things which first suggested them:--"Seeing other creatures clean and white in the same place where the swine were all over mire, I thought it did represent good and bad men in the same place; the one defiled by the same temptations which the other escape through the grace of God and watchfulness." "I was much affected lately when I saw our newly-sown garden, which we had secured so carefully, as we thought, from fowls, and had closely covered it, yet receive as much hurt by the unseen mole, which roots up and destroys. Lord, grant this be not the case of my poor soul! Many good seeds are sown.--Line upon line. Daily hearing or reading some good truths. And, by the grace of God, with my good education, I have been kept from many outward sins; but I have great reason to fear the unseen mole of heart-corruption, pride, covetousness. These work secretly but dangerously: Lord, do thou undertake for me." "The coals coming to the fire with ice upon them at first seemed as though they would put out the fire, but afterwards they made it burn more fiercely; I had this meditation,--It is often so with me. That which seems against me is really for me.--Have not afflictions worked for my good? Sometimes I have gone to an ordinance, as these coals to the fire, all cold and frozen, and there I have been melted. My love and desire have been inflamed. That it hath not oftener been so has been my own fault." But no extract from her journals can set in a more interesting light this admirable woman than the following lines recording the death of her only surviving son.--"1721, Feb. 15. My dear Philip was seized with a fatal distemper, the small-pox. Many fervent prayers were put up for him, both in closets and congregations; but on Monday, Feb. 27, between one and two o'clock he breathed his last;--the blessed spirit took wing, I trust, to the world of everlasting rest and joy. The desire of our eyes, concerning whom we were ready to say, 'This son shall comfort us;' once all our joy, now all our tears. Near twenty-two years of age, he was just beginning to appear in public business, sober and pious. A true lover of his friends, of whom he said on his death-bed, 'I lay them down as I do my body, in hope to meet again every way better.' . . . I do not think the worse of God, or prayer, for this dispensation; yet, sometimes I am much oppressed. I find that deceit lies in generals. How often have I in word and in tongue given up and devoted my all—yoke-fellow, children, estate—and all without mental reservation. And now, when God comes to try me in but one dear comfort, with what difficulty can I part with him! Oh this wicked heart! Lord, I am thine. Though thou shouldst strip me of all my children, and of all my comforts here, yet if thou give me thyself, and clear up to me my interest in the everlasting covenant, it is enough. That blessed covenant has enough in it to gild the most gloomy dispensation of Providence. I have condoling letters daily from my friends. Their words, indeed, do touch my case, but cannot touch my heart."

INFANT EDUCATION.—A mother once asked a clergyman when she should begin the education of her child, and she told him it was then four years old. "Madam," was his reply, "you have lost three years already. From the very first smile that gleams over an infant's face, your opportunity begins."

SINGING.—The American physician, Dr. Rush, thus speaks of the utility of singing, not only as an accomplishment, but as a corrective of the too common tendency to pulmonic complaints. "Vocal music," says this celebrated writer, "should never be neglected in the education of a young lady. Besides preparing her to join in that part of public worship which consists in psalmody, it will enable her to soothe the cares of domestic life; and the sorrows that will sometimes intrude into her own bosom, may all be relieved by a song, when sound and sentiment unite to act upon the mind. I here introduce a fact which has been suggested to me by my profession, and that is, that the exercise of the organs of the breast by singing contributes very much to defend them from those diseases to which the climate and other causes expose them. The Germans are seldom afflicted with consumptions; nor have I ever known but one instance of spitting blood among them. This, I believe, is in part occasioned by the strength which their lungs acquired by exercising them in vocal music, for this constitutes an essential branch of their education. The music master of our academy has furnished me with an observation still more in favour of this opinion. He informed me that he had known several instances of persons who were strongly disposed to consumption, who were restored to health by the exercise of their lungs in singing."—Harmonicon.

PRESERVATION OF BOOKS.—About twenty-five years ago, I was annoyed by finding the backs of several rows of books, some in a book-case having glazed doors which were kept locked, and others on adjoining open shelves, frequently mildewed. Wiping them carefully cleaned them only for a short time, for fresh crops of mildew speedily disfigured them again. Remembering to have seen my father, who always made his own ink, finish off by pouring a small glass of spirits of wine into the ink jar, in order to prevent its becoming mouldy, I lightly washed over the backs and covers of the books with spirits of wine, using as a brush the feather of the goose-quill. I frequently saw the books during the next five years, and I have occasionally seen them since, and there has not, so far as I am aware, been a single spot of mildew on them since the spirits of wine were applied. I have used spirits of wine to prevent mildew with equally good effect in other cases.—Builder.

MR. MACAULAY'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

Six weeks have scarcely elapsed since Mr. Macaulay's History appeared, and it has already reached a third edition. We do not wonder at its popularity, and we expect it to take a permanently high place in English literature. There is, in fact, no good history of England, and it has only been of late years that its sources have been in any degree accurately explored. Even now much remains to be done, and we have heard that Mr. Macaulay's own researches amongst the Dutch archives, not only supplied him largely with materials for his present work, but also convinced him that the history of Queen Elizabeth ought to be entirely re-written.

The popularity of Mr. Macaulay's work renders it more important to notice those false principles and mistakes into which he has fallen, especially in his introductory chapters. We have noticed and deplored that cold and philosophic spirit which seems ashamed to recognise the agency of God, in the conduct of those events which bear on the progress of human affairs. In particular we have noticed and exposed the skeptical doubt, "whether England owes more to the Roman catholic religion or to the reformation," and the worse than skeptical conclusion, that the suppression of the Albigenses and the Lollards was by no means a matter of regret. It is the fashion of a certain class of German philosophers, to speak as if every form of error or false doctrine, was in its season right and proper. They have risen far above the prejudices of those who receive the kingdom of God as little children. In their own imagination they are "wise and prudent," and from their lofty eminence look down with pity and contempt on those who receive the Bible in simplicity and believe the truths it contains. It is not remarkable, then, that ancient popery should be regarded by such as merely an introduction to modern protestantism. Even idolatry has had its advocates, and there are those who would consider "the elegant mythology of the Greeks," as so beneficial in its influence, that the overthrow of its altars, and the destruction of its oracles by the march of Christianity, is to be regarded rather as a loss than a gain. Percy Byshe Shelley conceived Christianity itself to be a very calamitous accident in the history of the world, and lamented that the progress of Greek culture was stopped first by Roman conquests, then by this Jewish superstition. As architects, painters, and sculptors are apt to prefer the gorgeous magnificence of the apostate Rome, to the more sober simplicity of the reformed churches, so the same class of men are sometimes prone to prefer heathenism, with its temples and its idols both, to popery and the reformation. In a work lately published by Archdeacon Hare, to the no small scandal of the Church of England, containing the life of a curate of his own who lapsed into gross infidelity, and which we intend ere long to notice, we find an anecdote of the celebrated Danish sculptor, Thorwalsden, very much to the point:—"Did you ever," writes the unhappy Mr. Sterling, "Did you ever hear the story of his being at a party at Bunsen's, whose house was on the Capitoline Hill, on the side of the temple of Olympian Jove, and where the conversation, as often under Bunsen's guidance, took a very Christian turn, till Thorwalsden remarked through the window, commanding a noble prospect of Rome, the modern city, the planet Jupiter in great glory, and filling his glass, exclaimed, 'Well, here's in honour of the ancient gods.'"

Such is the spirit in which men "without hope and without God in the world," are content to view those strongholds of Satan, whether they belong to heathen or popish times, against which the doom of heaven has gone forth, and which are numbered amongst the obstacles which impede the progress of Messiah's kingdom. They look upon heathenism, or popery, or Mohammedanism, not as each bears upon the realities of eternity, but as they seem associated with the progress of the arts and sciences, and especially with the embellishments of polished life. The sculptor, Thorwalsden, could drink to the ancient gods, just as Pugin the architect has gone over to the ancient superstition of a system rich in gorgeous architecture, painted windows, and marble images. So the men of letters, or the antiquary, when indifferent to the kingdom of the Lord of glory, can drink to the memory of the Moors who crowned the ruined heights of Alhambra with their mosques, or of the popish crusaders who desolated the Albigensian villages, and left Rome, down to the time of Luther, at leisure, unopposed by heretics, to erect such majestic temples as the church of St. Peter's, and foster the genius of Michael Angelo and Raphael.

Connected with Mr. Macaulay's skepticism concerning popery and the reformation, we must not overlook his shameful calumny on the memory of Cranmer. We are not blind to the faults and errors of the first protestant Archbishop, but we also know that Mr. Macaulay is utterly incapable of penetrating the inner chambers of the heart of such a man, and that in maligning the great reformer, he only exposes his own ignorance and incapacity. His words are as follows:—"Saintly in his professions, unscrupulous in his dealings, zealous for nothing, bold in speculations, a coward and a time-server in action, a placable enemy, and a lukewarm friend."

To refute these calumnies, uttered, as they are, with a confidence which seems to mock at the notion of fallibility, it would be necessary to go over the events of the life of Cranmer. But a very slight acquaintance with history is enough to prove that Macaulay did not understand, and could not appreciate the reformer whom he defames. It is true he was, to use bishop Burnet's words, "a man of great temper," and disliked violence. "He was," says the bishop, "gentle in his whole behaviour, and though he was a man of too great candour and simplicity to be refined in the arts of policy, yet he managed his affairs with great prudence; which did so much recommend him to the king, that no ill offices were able to hurt him." Again—"It is clear that he held not that opinion (concerning the dependence of ecclesiastical functions on the civil magistrate) to get the king's favour by it; for, as in many other things, as in the business of the Six Articles, he boldly and freely argued, both in the Convocation and the House of Peers, against that which he knew was the king's mind, and took his life in his hands, which had certainly been offered at a stake if the king's esteem of him had not been proof against all attempts." Bishop Burnet's notice of his closing scene we also quote, because it is short and pregnant in meaning, remembering, as we must, that Thuanus, or de Thou, was himself a Romanist, and an eminent French judge, the first President of the Parliament of Paris, as well as an historian. "I have nothing," says the bishop, "to add to the sad narrative I gave, both of his fall and of his repentance, and his firm constancy to the last, in that amazing instance of holding his hand in the fire till it was almost burnt away; of which Thuanus gives a very particular account, so that the truth of the fact cannot be disputed."

It has of late become a fashion to abuse Cranmer; and Mr. Macaulay, in his history, has in this, as in other instances, proved that he himself is subject to that same weakness which he says is characteristic of English historians. "As there is no country where statesmen have been so much under the influence of the past, so there is no country where historians have been so much under the influence of the present." The abuse of Cranmer may gratify the Tractarians, and will please the Romanists, whilst it is not distasteful either to infidelity or to political dissent. Mr. Hallam has, in like manner, grossly defamed Luther, and spoken of the great German reformer as if those writings, which shook the Vatican and revolutionized Europe, were beneath the notice of an historian of literature. Bossuet, on the contrary, although a papist, is extolled as "the Eagle of Meaux." Thus it is, that we discern in the boasted liberalism of worldly men the natural enmity of the human heart against the things of God.—London Record.

THE PAST AND THE PRESENT COMPARED.

In comparison with a former age, to complain of the present as degenerate, is said to be a foible of old men. Against such complainings, the Spirit of wisdom and of truth seems, Eccl. vii. 10, to put us on our guard: "Say not thou, What is the cause that the former days were better than these? for thou dost not inquire wisely concerning this." The forms of both moral good and evil change. Unaccustomed to the present forms of manifestation of the one or the other of them, and distances of times giving occasion to forgetfulness on the subject, may lead to a false judgment in the matter. It is true, too, that while, on the whole, virtue is on the advance, a particular vice, unguarded against for the time, may have a disproportionate prevalence, and hence lead to unjust conclusions, both with regard to the past and the present.

We are not of those who think our own days to be worse than those of by-gone times. Had those accusations that have, on this point, been heard in every past age, been well founded, Tophet itself, perhaps, could not have been worse than our earth. But the reproaches or complaints have not been, nor are they true. Far beyond what was known in former days, restraints are laid upon the grosser aspects of sin; and far beyond any thing known to our fathers, there is an organized efficiency in the production of physical, intellectual, social, and moral good. At no past period of time has the prospect of good to the church and the nations appeared more full of promise, than at this day. In proof of this, we have only to look to the manifestations of the influence of religious and moral principle, in the progress of the Bible, extension of religious tracts, growing regard to the sanctity of the Sabbath, to the interests of education, to the power of the press, the advance of the arts, and the opening of the doors of the nations to an unrestrained intercourse, unknown to previous times, and of which the awakened spirit of missionary enterprise is taking the advantage, to make known to those who have long been sitting in darkness, and in the shadow of death, the way of eternal life. It may, indeed, be said by those inclined to look on these movements in another, or obscure light,—that these are the fields of parade, giving occasion to ostentatious show; which, for the time, chooses to make its appearance in a sacred garb. In the whole, some allege there is little, perhaps nothing of the spirit of vital religion. Into an argument on this allegation, we do not enter. In the manifestations in favour of a moral advancement, there is an earnestness, intelligence, and uniformity, that forbid the suspicion of a prevailing, vain show of hypocrisy. But while we affirm a predominance of enlightened virtue to be in these movements, we assert not their perfection,—nor do we deny that, in their neighbourhood, great defects may be found. To ascertain those defects and their causes, in order to the finding of their remedy, is the duty of those whose circumstances and ability qualify them for the irksome task. Such is not our work.

We frequently find, in the journals of the day, a bitter complaint of the want of "deep and thorough experimental godliness," as characteristic of the present time. And we very freely admit, that the possession of the spirit of such a godliness, would secure to us, were it general, a loftier character than that which we now have. Yet, in a comparative judgment with a past age, on this subject, we may be liable to err. What do we mean by a deep, experimental godliness? Is it a full saving view of the whole system of divine truth, in its doctrines, laws, promises, and the bearing of this system, through the entire circle of sacred institutes of divine appointment and providential dispensations, upon the whole of the inner man, mind, conscience, heart, will; in the production and direction of faith, love, humility, repentance, hope, consolation, religious joy, and a full external expression of these in a life of holiness toward God, and of beneficence toward man? We are ourselves inclined to think that individual examples of such a character are comparatively fewer now than in the days of our fathers; yet that the amount of true religion, religious influence and good morals, is less, we are by no means prepared to grant. The accumulation in one locality may be less, while it being of a character more diffusive and active, is really more. Like the large estate of the man of wealth, when divided and distributed among his heirs, while the particular portion is smaller, the sum total is not less; nor is the product and sum of happiness likely to be diminished. In the case before us, it was more in the closet, now it is more in the street; but the religion of the street, that which expresses itself in action, though not so distinct or deep, may be, in its measure, as rich as that of the closet. Were it allowable to use the language, we would say, the one appears in the form of scientific demonstration, the other less profoundly in that of the application of the practical rule. These remarks, perhaps, may help to illustrate the difference between the form of the manifestation of the religion of our day, and that of a previous time.

Still, we concede to the complainer of our defects, that we are in all respects, far, very far, behind what the nature of the subject requires, and what our means, under the promised blessing of the Spirit's influence, authorize us to expect? Why, then, are we not of the highest stature of the Christian character? In replying to this, we shall not expatiate on the relative conditions of the household of faith, as at present unpropitious to high attainments in the life of godliness; nor yet on the allurements of the world, its pursuits, gains, associations, honours, and pleasures. Passing over them, and many other topics not inappropriate to the general subject, we shall offer a remark or two on some forms of the neglect of the Bible, of evil tendency in retarding the spiritual growth of the Christian. The Bible furnishes the great mean of advancement in the attainments of holiness. "Sanctify them through thy truth, thy word is truth." But to have this result in its higher forms, the Bible must not only be on our tables, and in our hands, but its contents must be in our heads and hearts. Its precious principles must be understood, and by them every faculty of the inner man must be imbued. In the light of these principles is seen their influence in the production, sustentation, and direction of every grace and virtue that enters into the constitution of the high Christian character, as well as their connexion with, and bearing on the privileges of the sound believer. Deep experience in the divine life, is a near relationship with the deep things of the whole glorious mediatorial constitution of our Redeemer, and with his extended action in the execution of his every office, in its bearing upon all to which it relates in heaven, earth, and hell. Where an acquaintance with these things is very limited, however spiritual in its nature, the subject of it cannot rank high in the life of godliness. The analogies of life abundantly illustrate this, as the nature of the subject proves its truth. Have we, then, not reason to fear the religion of our age is, while extensively genuine, remarkable for its simplicity? Why is the matter thus? Ought it to remain so?

In replying to the query, Why is the matter thus? we at present can refer to only two or three particulars, and these, perhaps, not the most prominent among the causes and evidences of the general evil. Passing over the notice of the spirit of the world in its various forms of operation, which has so extensively invaded the walks of Zion, we — First, mention the undue amount of light reading of our day, as leaving little time for a deep exercise of thought. We refer not to that which all reprobate as profane, but to the flood of gossiping papers with which the church is overwhelmed. That they are religious, but little mends the matter. Their subject is said to be religious; but still it is but gossip, and takes the place of that of higher character. Some efficient reform is called for in this department of life. A second evil is found in the sanctuary. The continuous exposition of the word of God is nearly banished from our pulpits; and, except in the pulpit, as a fruit of this, it is rare to find a Bible in the churches of the land. The continuous exposition of scripture, showing the import, the terms, the connexion of the passage, the meaning of the Spirit in the whole, and the practical bearing of the subject on Christian character, is one of the best means to make intelligent and experienced Bible believers. Alas! where is this mean enjoyed? When we add to this the absence of scripture from the little fancy sketch, not unfrequently passed off as a sermon, the evil is seen in progress. A text may be read, but it is a mere motto; as in the Spectator of Addison, or the Idler of Johnson, we find a quotation from Horace or Juvenal, but no farther referred to; and, in some quarters, it is a serious ground of complaint, that there is, in the discussions of the pulpit, so little reference to scripture, and often the distinctive characteristics and work of Christ in them will have no place. The Sabbath school and the Bible class furnish for these defects, a very inadequate substitute. A third evil of the same sort is found in not a few of our popular religious books. The discussion is too seldom illustrated and confirmed by the adducing of appropriate scripture. A frequent and abundant repetition of some very flimsy poetry, supplies the place that ought to be occupied by the express dictates of the oracles of God. And reference may be made to a fourth evil, which we may consider partly as an effect, and partly as a cause, in the form of reaction. This appears in the very frequent representations of death-bed scenes. We are not unapprized of the delicacy due to the subject of personal religion, and of the tenderness with which we should speak of what occurs at the bed of the dying. It will, however, be recollected, that we are not now referring to the reality, but to the degree of true religion. The evidence of this high degree, we desire to have in another shape than is found in many of our obituaries. Alas! in these representations of a living faith, and lively hope, how seldom do we find a reference to any distinctly expressed promise of God, or inspired delineation of the exercises of a saved sinner. The sentimentality of some silly, while popular hymn, it seems, must, on the solemn occasion, supply the place of God's own word. How often do we hear as repeated, and again repeated, as the last, or among the last words of the departing immortal, the fanciful lines—

“Jesus can make a dying bed, Feel soft as downy pillows are.”

But how seldom the language of inspiration, with its depth of thought, and sanctifying unction! Such as, “I know that my Redeemer liveth.” “Whom have I in the heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire besides thee.” “My flesh and my heart faileth: but God is the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever.” “I will behold thy face in righteousness: I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with thy likeness.” “He hath made with me an everlasting covenant, ordered in all things and sure: this is all my salvation, and all my desire.” “I know whom I have believed; and I am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed to him against that day.” Why is it, that in obituaries we find so much from the little hymn book, and so little from the Bible, as sustaining faith and hope, and giving to these graces expression in a dying hour? It is in no spirit of captiousness, nor in that which would dare to pass on the state of any before God, that we ask, Is it because that such solemn and appropriate portions of God’s word are either forgotten or unknown? We are unwilling to suppose that such would be disrelished. But whatever may be the cause, the fact is unhappy, and the influence is not good. It tends to lead away from the Bible, when the Bible is most needed, and to raise an imperfect, if not a false standard of piety. A fifth evil, and one which we suspect to have led the way to some of those mentioned, is the very extensive banishment of the songs of inspiration from their appropriate place, in the psalmody of the church. The song of inspiration is, in Zion’s psalmody, far and wide, a stranger to the hearts, the minds, and lips of her children. A mangled and unsightly imitation of it supplies the place of the book of Psalms—a book dictated by the Spirit of Christ. Hear how a respectable writer, one, we suppose, not to be suspected of prejudice in the matter, speaks on this subject, “Dr. Watts,” says Dr. Junkin, “has attempted, professedly, to improve upon the sentiment, the very matter, and the order, by various omissions and additions, to fit the Psalms for Christian worship. This is unfair. If Pope had taken the same license with the poems of Homer, all the amateurs of Greek poetry in the world would have cried, Shame. But it is a pious and zealous Christian divine who has taken this liberty with the songs of Zion, and almost the whole Church has acquiesced in it. What would we think of the French poet, who, proposing to enrich French literature with a versification of the master-piece of the English muse, should mangle and transpose the torn limbs of the Paradise lost, until Milton himself might meet his first-born on the high way and not recognise it? And must this literary butchery be tolerated, because, forsooth, the victim is the inspired Psalmist? Why should the heaven-taught bard be misrepresented thus? Let us rather have the songs of inspiration as God inspired them, and as nearly as is possible, and consistent with the laws of English versification. God’s order of thought is doubtless best for his church. If any one think he can write better spiritual songs than the sweet singer of Israel, let him do it; but let him not dress the savoury meat which God hath prepared, until all its substance and savour are gone, and then present it to us as an imitation of David's Psalms." Junkin on Prophecy, pp. 331, 332.

Among many other influences of evil bearing, this mangling, this worse than "literary butchery" of the inspired Psalmist, in its extended connexion, sends forth a blighting influence on the spiritualities of true religion. A drought is upon her waters. Counteracting influences for good are in operation, and will produce their effects. The Bible must be read and studied, its principles understood and believed, and be carried into actual life, not in scraps, but in the fulness of its import. Then a whole Christ will dwell in the heart of the Church, and instead of the superficialities, and too often what is mistaken for spirituality, the light sentimentalities not unfrequently connected with the excitements of religion, we shall have a deep, divine life, imbuing the whole, and going out in action becoming the elect of God—the expectants of heaven. As a mean, and principal mean, of these high spiritual attainments, let the church have an able, faithful, and fearless ministry, which shall be at home when among the oracles of God, and let God's people intelligently, affectionately, and efficiently sustain such a ministry. Then will the advancement of our age be no longer a matter of doubt. "Arise, shine; for thy light is come."

NOTES OF A VOYAGE TO INDIA.

The following very interesting communication from Mr. Woodside, will furnish to our readers an account of the voyage of the late re-enforcement. It will tend, we hope, to increase their interest in the mission families, and the cause to which they are devoted. Let them be remembered in our prayers, and let them not be overlooked in the disposal of our contributions to the cause of Christ.

Indian Ocean, Lat. 0° 39' north, Lon. 93° 48' east. November 8th, 1848.

Rev. and Dear Sir,

We have once more breathed the air of our native hemisphere. We have re-crossed the equator, and arrived at that point in our voyage, where we had determined to commence writing our overland letters. It will be necessary to have all these finished previously to our landing in Calcutta, as our stay there will be limited to a few days, or the shortest possible period in which our preparations for the inland journey can be made, leaving no longer time for correspondence whilst there than the mere acknowledgment, before closing, of those letters which, we trust, will be awaiting our arrival, and the immediate despatch of these. You may, perhaps, be expecting that some of us will furnish you with a "journal" of our voyage. This, I think, you need not expect, as none of us have written one sufficiently extensive and minute to be interesting; and, so far as I am concerned, I am sure that is a task for which I am altogether incompetent. I have thought, moreover, that any thing in the form of a journal is unnecessary, as it must consist of a lengthened detail of monotonous reiterations, equally tiresome and uninteresting. For the sake of private reference, I have kept a brief diary, guided by which, I shall endeavour, in the course of this letter, to furnish you with a short outline of "matters and things in general" that have passed under our observation since we left you.

I begin by a reference to the closing scenes of our residence in Philadelphia. That was a period very eventful to us. It was the dissolution of long and fondly cherished associations. It was the knell of our separation from the endearments of private friendship, and the superabounding enjoyments of enlightened Christian society. On the part of some of us, it was an entrance upon new scenes of action, for which, in all sincerity, we feel but ill qualified. Yet we humbly trust it was a feeble response to the call of duty, approved of God, and likely to be beneficial, through his blessing, to ourselves and others. However painful to the natural feelings it may have been, to leave our friends and country, we have never yet regretted it, and, I trust, we never shall. Apart from the higher aspects of the subject, were it but the tokens of Christian sympathy so liberally conferred upon us, and the warm interest manifested for our personal welfare, by our numerous friends in your city, we have more than enough to reconcile us to any condition in life; but I trust we have a higher source of comfort in that sweet promise, "I am with you." Through you, I would here return our most sincere thanks to the numerous friends to whose kindness we are so deeply indebted, and to whom it is impossible for me to write personally. Would that our gratitude were proportionate to their liberality! I should like to refer at large to those delightful meetings, public and private, which we were privileged to attend on the eve of our departure; but brevity requires that these be in a manner passed over. They were to me hallowed seasons upon which I must ever look back with pious feelings, and the contemplation of which cannot fail to excite to active diligence in carrying out the great object which was there the theme of our deliberations, songs, and prayers. As they drew to a close, I could scarcely suppress a feeling of melancholy, an involuntary sense of loneliness, to think that the bond of Christian intercourse was being gradually severed, and that soon I must contend single-handed with the corrupting influences of an evil world. How strongly I felt on the night before our departure, I need not attempt to describe. We had left a numerous circle of friends,—we surrounded the bed-side of the venerable "father of the church" to receive his parting benediction; I hung upon his accents while he commended us to "God and the word of his grace." How often, previously to this had I with greedy ear listened to his instructions; but never before did they appear so impressive. In all human probability, it was the last time I should ever behold his venerable countenance, or listen to his parental voice. Since first I knew him, he had been to me more than a friend,—a father. I was accustomed to look upon him as my natural protector, and to part with him was like severing the cord of life. I longed to express to him my gratitude for past kindness, and as I quitted his chamber, lingered long upon its threshold for that purpose, but it was impossible. I could not speak. I was obliged to desist, and hastily withdrew. It was then I felt as if the last tie that bound me to the pleasures of Christian lands had been loosed, and my only desire was to quit your shores for the territories of the heathen. But the morning of the succeeding day introduced a fresh scene of unwonted interest, which I am sorry you were not permitted to witness. At the early hour of five o'clock, A. M., on the deck of the steamer "Sun" there had collected a large assemblage of friends, from every extremity of the city, to break again the bread of friendship, to con-joy us on our way, and implore a blessing on our enterprise. The exercises on board, were of a character which, to be appreciated, must have been enjoyed. By the excellent arrangements of the superintendent and committee of the S. S. Association, every thing was so fitly disposed as to suit in the best manner the end for which we had met. How sweetly did our songs of praise rise upon the stillness of the morning! How fervent the accents of prayer, as they poured from Christian hearts on our behalf! How soothing the words of consolation, tendered by the voice of affection, to our saddening spirits! How affecting the melting tenderness of sorrowing friends, as we ascended into the cars in the street of Burlington! Of this latter scene, you were fortunately an eye-witness. These were occurrences alike gratifying and instructive. They show conclusively that genuine Christian conduct is ever the same, that the true spirit of missions is just now as it was in the apostolic age. Our friends in Philadelphia were not outdone by the friends of Paul at Miletus. Acts xx. 36, 37, 38. These events have made a lasting, and, I trust, a salutary impression upon my mind. They have hallowed in my recollection the memory of our missionary farewell.

The following Sabbath, we spent very pleasantly in New York. Mr. Campbell preached in the forenoon in Mr. Patterson's, Brooklyn, and I in Dr. McLeod's. At the close of the afternoon service in Dr. McLeod's by Mr. C., we had a farewell meeting of the congregation, when Dr. McLeod, in his usual lucid and forcible manner, made some beautiful allusions to Mr. Campbell's former departure—exhibited the true theory of missions—and commended us, and the cause which we represent, by the strongest expressions of brotherly affection to the sympathies of his people. On the evening of the day, we were privileged to address a very large assembly in Dr. McElroy's church, called by the committee of the Presbyterian Board to express to us the kind wishes of the sister church, with whom we are so intimately connected in extending the cause of Christ. The meeting was briefly addressed by the Hon. Walter Lowrie, and subsequently by Mr. Rankin, who had lately returned from the Indian mission. It was delightful to behold so many of the friends of the Redeemer gathered together to do honour to his cause. "Them that honour me, I will honour." 1 Sam. i. 30.

The following day you again became the unexpected, though not unwelcome witness of another most interesting scene, another social circle of kind friends supplicating the divine blessing upon our mission, previously to taking us by the hand and pronouncing a final adieu. Although a comparative stranger in New York, I was not treated as such. Every where I met with the utmost kindness, for which I must ever feel grateful. Their proverbial generosity was fully exemplified, and their Christian zeal amply manifested. I felt sorry that my intercourse with such a people had not been of longer standing. In their conduct I could at once recognise the features of "brethren, dearly beloved in the Lord." Of our trip to Boston, and subsequent proceeding up to the time of sailing, I need not write. You were with us, and are, of course, acquainted with all that transpired. I must, however, embrace this opportunity of apologizing to you and the other kind friends, who, at so great a sacrifice of time and expense, determined to be with us to the last, for the unceremonious manner in which we were compelled to act towards you while in Boston. The shortness of our time, and the multiplicity of little matters to which we had necessarily to attend precluded all possibility of devoting to the society of our friends as much of our time as we would gladly have done. I have also to express our warmest thanks for the kind assistance rendered us by yourself, and the others who accompanied you. Our gratitude is due to the Rev. Mr. Blaikie of the Associate Reformed Church in Boston, for his unceasing kindness both before our arrival and during our stay there. By his attention we were materially assisted in getting through our preparations in proper time. My personal acknowledgments are due to Mr. Jos. A. Rippard, of New York, who kindly gave to me a neat little medicine chest, and a considerable supply of medicines which I meant to acknowledge through you as a donation to our mission. You know the joy we experienced on the morning of our sailing, by the sudden appearance in our midst of our indefatigable friends Messrs. Stuart and Dunn, who, at no ordinary sacrifice of private comfort, and, I doubt not, detriment to their mercantile pursuits, had come to "accompany us to the ship." Amidst all our bustle, however, there were not wanting at intervals sweet seasons of brotherly intercourse in the social circle, and at a throne of grace. Our concluding exercise at the "Merchant's Exchange Hotel," (where we were joined by another estimable friend, Rev. John C. Lowrie,) and again, in the cabin of the "Dolphin," were to me deeply affecting. As was frequently expressed on those occasions, I felt that "God was there." The blessings there implored, we have since richly enjoyed. But even our dearest friends must leave us. The bell rings out the tocsin of your return,—the locks of hair are quickly exchanged and endorsed,—a parting embrace, and you are gone. We are alone, and standing out to sea. Boston harbour, and its beautiful "bay of islands," have been the theatre of many exciting scenes. Like the waters of the gulf of Venice, these waters were early "married" to the cause of liberty and unfettered commerce; and their nuptials celebrated by the "Indian tea party." In these, too, the missionary enterprise was early baptized. By the sailing of Judson and his coadjutors, Boston was made the Seleucia of American missions to the Gentile east. How frequently since that time, have those island shores re-echoed the solemn ceremonies of missionary departure, and witnessed the waving signals of separating friends, as the gospel ship unfurls her canvass, and gives her confiding bosom to the fickle waters. Long and earnestly did we look upon the last shadows of your presence, till you were lost in the distance. We had little relish for the beautiful scenery around us; we soon retired to our pretty little cabin; and even the lofty spire and granite columns of Bunker's Hill were quickly hidden to our view. For the first few days we felt excessively fatigued. Our strength was exhausted by over-exertion, and the reaction produced by the leisure which we now enjoyed, rendered us unfit for any active exercise. A week of repose, however, revived us, and being favoured with delightful weather, we were all speedily enabled to enter upon the round of duties at which we have, for the most part, been since employed.

RECENT INTELLIGENCE.

CHOCTAW MISSION: Spencer Academy.—The number of pupils on the 1st of January, was sixty-six, of whom twenty-four were scholars that have been received during the present term. One of the embarrassments of this institution is the short period which many of the scholars spend at it. The places of those who leave the school are supplied by others; but the result is, that a large proportion of the pupils are in the primary classes. The younger scholars are now under the charge of Miss Dutcher, of whose appointment as a teacher, some months ago, the notice was inadvertently omitted in the Chronicle; and their improvement, under her excellent instruction, has been very gratifying. In the general state of the Institute, we do not observe any change of material interest reported in our letters, which are of various dates to the 5th of February.

IOWA MISSION.—A letter from the Rev. Messrs. Hamilton and Irvin, of January 15th, reviews the year then lately ended, and mentions, as reasons for gratitude to God, 1st, the uninterrupted health of the mission families, and the children in the school; 2d, the more pacific feelings of the Indians towards the mission, evinced among other ways, in their not injuring its stock and property, as in former years; 3d, the improvement of the scholars, 35 being in regular attendance; 4th, the decrease of drunkenness among the Indians towards the end of the year, and their better respect of good order, under No-heart, a warm friend of the mission, now promoted to be the principal chief. They also speak with much thankfulness of the kind and efficient influence of the government agent, Col. A. J. Vaughan, who has proved himself an able and warm friend of the Indians. A copy of the Iowa grammar, prepared and printed by the missionaries, was finished during the year; and an elementary book was in press. As to the attendance of the Iowas on the preaching of the gospel, the brethren greatly regret to have nothing of special encouragement to report.

INDIA: FURRUKHABAD MISSION.—A letter has been received from the Rev. J. J. Walsh, of Lypnporie, dated December 20th,—the only letter from the Asiatic missions that has been received of later date than the letters acknowledged in our last issue. Mr. Walsh mentions that considerable interest was felt at his station in the school, and liberal subscriptions would probably be made towards the erection of a new school building.

FRANCE.—Letters have been received from gentlemen connected with the Evangelical Society of France, of dates to the 22d of February. One of the ministers employed by the Society found the door open "to preach the pure gospel in more than twenty towns or villages, where the truth had never been preached since the time of the dreadful persecution of 1551." An urgent appeal was made for pecuniary assistance, the sum of 74,800 francs, or about 15,000 dollars, being required to meet the engagements of the Society, before the end of the year on the 15th of April. This sum, however, includes the debt due by the Society at the end of the preceding financial year, of 2800 francs. One of the letters before us says, "Our position is indeed full of anguish. Never has been offered a better opportunity for evangelizing France—never were more appeals received from numerous populations—and never less money came into our exhausted treasury, in consequence of our national disturbances."—Missionary Chronicle.

THE JEWS—THEIR CIVIL CONDITION.—In Great Britain a bill was carried in the House of Commons, but lost in the House of Lords, last year, removing civil disabilities from the Jews, and conferring upon one of the Rothschilds a seat in the parliament to which he had been elected by a large London constituency. A similar bill is about to be brought forward again with every prospect of success.* In France the Jews are free in the most liberal sense. In Austria the enormous taxes that have so long oppressed them have been removed—the general distinctions between them and others in a great measure taken away—and a law is under consideration in the National Diet, at Vienna, allowing intermarriages among all religious sects, and (thus encouraging the general equality of the Jews,) making them merely civil contracts. In Rome they have been released from the Ghetto, and from all the civil disabilities of the Roman states, under which they have groaned so long. In Russia they are allowed free trade in all the large cities and throughout the country. In Turkey the government has issued an order placing the Jews under the protection of the British ambassador, and instructing the consuls throughout the empire to protect and encourage them. Even in Palestine they have a grant to rebuild the temple at Jerusalem.—Chr. Inst.

CHANGES IN THEIR SPIRITUAL PROSPECTS.—In this respect the changes have been recently sad. There have, indeed, been conversions in Germany, Hungary, and Prussia; and in Constantinople, Palestine, and some cases in this country there have been inquirers after the way of life—but the general aspect is dark. In Damascus, on account of the death of Mrs. Graham, and the sickness of Mrs. Robson, the Irish Jewish mission has been broken up, at least for the present. In Jassy, Pesth, and the various flourishing fields of Moldavia, Posen, &c., the recent revolutions have nearly scattered the people and destroyed the missions. In other countries of Europe where God is giving the people rest and opportunities to attend to the gospel, there is a widely spreading spirit of infidelity. In our own country, though missionaries have been employed in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Charleston, still but little fruit has appeared, and even that under unfavourable circumstances when thoroughly tried.

* Since the above was in type, we learn that Lord John Russell has introduced it, and the House of Commons passed it by a vote of 214 to 111.

General Intelligence.

FRANCE.—The political state and prospects of France are becoming more and more settled, but the moral and religious condition is calculated to awaken the most painful apprehensions. . . . The Fourierists are attempting to demonstrate that they are the most faithful disciples of the Saviour. The Socialists are celebrating worship in order to manifest their faith, and the manner of it is worthy of them. Dinners are provided in the suburbs of Paris, and after having eaten and drunken, amidst plates and bottles they deliver speeches on religion, declaim upon politics, sing profane songs, recite odes, and fables, propose demagogical toasts, and then declare that they have celebrated a Christian festival! This awful profanation was especially manifested last Christmas. Three banquets were held. One of them was arranged by the Socialist democratic females, as they styled themselves. Children were admitted, and also men. The tribune was occupied by ladies. The first address delivered by one of these women, was entitled, Sermon on the Mount. Another lady proposed a toast to the Virgin Mary, St. Simon, Fourier, &c. "Women," said she, in her enthusiasm, "if we desire to transform society, let us take the divine Mary as a model. Let her name be blessed among women. Glory to St. Simon! Glory to Fourier! Glory to all peoples! May they be united among themselves! Joy to all the suffering exiles! To fraternity then—it will put God on our side." Another proposed the following toast:—"To the living Christ! to the French people!" And she sought to prove that there was a complete analogy between Jesus Christ and the French people! This is poor France. How can she prosper, or be blessed in such a state!—We are happy to observe that a law has been passed by which no one can be obliged to work on the Sabbath, and that the President requires all his household to attend church on that day.

ITALY.—Since the 3d of February things have steadily advanced towards the overthrow of the Pope's temporal power, and the establishment of the people's rights. On that day a distinguished priest addressed a vast assembly upon the incompatibility of the temporal and spiritual power being united in the pope. This speech was loudly cheered. On the 5th the assembly convened, and after being present at mass in the Church of St. Mary, the members proceeded to the palace of the Chancery, and entered the ancient hall which had been prepared for them. Crowds attended and applauded. The Minister of the Interior concluded a brief address with the cry "Italy and the people for ever." On the 10th, the assembly, by an almost unanimous vote, decreed a republic. Of 144 votes, 136 voted for the formal ejection of the Pope, and only five refused to vote for the republic. At two o'clock of that day the banner of the Roman republic was flung to the breeze from the tower of the capitol, while its first waving was hailed by the roar of one hundred cannons. At the announcement of the fall of the pope's temporal power, and the rise of the republic, every hat was raised, and every where the people shouted, "The Roman republic for ever!" On the 11th, a grand Te Deum was chanted at St. Peter's in honour of the occasion. It was, however, conducted by an ecclesiastical chaplain, no regular priests being willing to officiate.

THE PAPAL STATES.—Austria has marched a body of troops upon Ferrara and seized upon the city, and levied a fine upon the citizens of 200,000 scudi, which she handed over to the Pope. Piedmont has resolved to intervene in Tuscany, to hinder civil war, and oppose the Austrian intervention. It seems probable that Naples, on the south, and Austria on the north side of the Pope, will overrun the Papal States, but still the question of constitutional government at Rome and Florence can scarcely be settled at the point of the bayonet. The relations of Sardinia and Austria add further difficulties to the general confusion, which prevails from the foot of the Alps to the Mediterranean. From Turin all is in a distracted state, while Genoa seems ripe for some republican movement, and altogether the elements of disorder were scarcely ever more ripe in Italy than at this moment. It is only the quiet attitude of France, and the peaceful efforts of England which prevent their combustible material from bursting into a flame. The Prince of Canino has been elected vice-president of the Republic of Rome. The Pope, after halting between abdication and soliciting foreign intervention, has now, it is said, made an application to Austria, and it is confidently stated that Spain is about to send a division of ten thousand men to aid in restoring his Holiness. The latest intelligence from Italy states that the Roman ministry had communicated to the Assembly that a joint intervention of Austria, Spain and Naples is announced. France had not decided what part to take.

The Bible in Italy. From a very interesting letter on this subject from the correspondent of the New York Evangelist we quote the following:

“In evidence of the progress of religious liberty in Italy, in advance of the law; we may cite the great and successful activity of the British and Foreign Bible Society. This Society is prepared to furnish every Italian with the Holy Scriptures upon terms suited to him individually; from cost price at highest, down to nothing in extreme cases. They have instructed their agents to dispose of Bibles and Testaments to booksellers at two-thirds of cost, upon condition of their advertising the books at the exact cost, and no more. The Society has put an immense supply of them into the country at different points, and stands ready to print the Bible at Rome or Florence the moment the press is free. The demand for the Scriptures increases faster and faster. Booksellers in nearly all the great cities from Genoa to Palermo take them readily. At one point we hear of a Jew purchasing eighty copies at the full cost price, upon speculation. He knew where he could sell them to advantage. At another point we learn of a provincial bookseller calling upon an agent and taking one hundred and twenty-five copies to meet a demand in his region. A few copies at a time are deposited at certain book-stalls in various cities, and it is found that they sell well. On one occasion some companies of soldiers, under marching orders, bought up a large quantity which had been put upon sale at a fair, and took them on towards Venice. Lombardy is now shut against our activity in this matter: but certain individuals who travelled through the country last spring and summer, disposed of many hundred copies along their route. The friends of the cause here make all due allowances for those inferior motives which just now aid in the circulation of the Bible; they allow for many copies thrown aside with indifference, and for many obtained and destroyed by the priests. But when all is told upon this side of the question, they are still encouraged to believe that there is an intellectual awakening in the country favourable to the examination of the Scriptures; and they are strong in the faith that full gospel measure, even the hundred fold, will yet be reaped in Italy for the seed they are sowing.”

IRISH PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH AND THE REGIUM DONUM.

In a late number of the Belfast “Northern Whig,” we find a report of a very interesting discussion in the Belfast Presbytery of the Irish Presbyterian Church, in regard to the Regium Donum. We regret that our limits do not permit us at present to do more than publish the following abstract, as found in the editorial columns of the paper mentioned:—

The old and respectable Congregation of Rosemary Street, Belfast, in connexion with the General Assembly, found itself without a Minister, on the appointment of its Pastor, the Rev. Mr. Gibson, to the chair of Ethics for the Students of the Assembly. The members of the Congregation, after having disagreed about one or two Clergymen who had appeared before them, at last concurred in anxiously desiring the services of the Rev. Mr. Macnaughten, of Paisley, a Minister of the Free Church of Scotland. That gentleman, though a friend to Establishments, is nevertheless unwilling, owing, we believe, to the circumstances in which he has stood as a member of the Free Church, to receive government endowment, or Regium Donum; and the Rosemary Street people have no desire to force him to take such endowment, and pray to have him appointed their Pastor. But, the Belfast Presbytery, by a vote of seventeen to nine, declare, that Mr. Macnaughten must pocket the money, or he shall not be Minister of the Rosemary Street Congregation.

The Rev. Dr. Cooke, who justly takes credit to himself for the boldness with which he has gone to work, in this instance, says, he knows of no man, in England or Scotland, whom he would more gladly have in Belfast as a fellow-labourer, than Mr. Macnaughten. "Then why," said the Doctor, "did he (Dr. Cooke) not wish him to come here? He would tell them:—Mr. Macnaughten had got a crotchet in his head, and he (Dr. Cooke) did not like crotchets." It may be all very well for the Doctor not to like crotchets; but it is rather too much that, therefore, the members of the Rosemary Street Congregation must be debarred the exercise of their right of choice in reference to their Minister. The Doctor's crotchet (for he has a very convenient one, at this time) is very unreasonable; and it becomes tyrannical in its operation, when it is thus backed by a majority in the Presbytery.

The Doctor boasts, that, being "a plain, blunt man, not shackled himself, he can speak the more freely on the subject of government endowments." We cannot tell, indeed, how much it would take to shackle the Doctor; but this we know, that he has more government golden fetters on his interesting person, than any other Minister in the Assembly, and more than any seven of the great body of them. He gets £320 for distributing the Regium Donum, and £250 as the government endowment of his Presbyterian Chair; but, of course, he, good man, has no personal interest in the question—he is particularly free from all considerations connected with the "government endowments." We have often had occasion to marvel at his coolness of assertion, and his boldness of pretence; but we do not recollect any instance in which he has acquitted himself with a courage equal to what he has here displayed.

We have given a list of the division, from which it will be seen, that a respectable minority of nine, headed by Dr. Edgar, supported the just and reasonable prayer of the Congregation. Some members of the Presbytery, including Dr. Morgan, were absent; and we trust that they, as well as some of the majority, will, upon due reflection, make up their minds to maintain Presbyterian rights, when the question will be submitted to them in a higher ecclesiastical court. It is said, that the leaders in the Assembly are applying to the government to get the Regium Donum placed upon the Consolidated Fund; and if so, it is a bad way of advancing that purpose, to show how such an endowment can be used coercively against the liberties of the laity. For ourselves, if we merely had regard to the voluntary cause, we would rejoice at the present proceeding, feeling as we do, with Mr. Gibson, that its tendency is decidedly favourable to voluntarism.

Obituary.

DIED, in Milton, Northumberland co., Pa., on the 10th of February last, MRS. NANCY TEAS. While it is true that the pious who have left us have, in their good name, a perpetual memorial, it seems right to call attention to the departure of the believer. Every instance of one of our fellows passing into the future, whether with that feeling of triumph or that calm confidence which Christianity inspires, is a precious legacy to the church, and is a fresh proof that there is divinity in that system to which our hope is clinging. There are many of the heirs of glory who pursue an unobtrusive pathway to heaven. Of a retiring disposition, and not pushed by circumstances to the prominence which others enjoy, we hear comparatively little of them. Thus it was with the aged one whose death we record. The name Teas, is familiar to many in our church. Though the writer had not the privilege of acquaintance with the husband of her who has gone, and who, for many years was an elder of the congregation in Milton, many of our ministers appreciated him, and found in him a faithful friend, a valued counsellor, and a ripe believer. Some ten years since, he passed away, truly in triumph, to his reward. Both husband and wife were ardently and intelligently attached to the principles of the Reformed Presbyterian Church; and of the congregation to which they belonged, they were indeed ornaments. It is, we believe, no vain panegyric to state that religion had thrown its peculiar and mellowed light around the character of Mrs. Teas—that the great principles of our holy faith were inwrought with her moral being. Hence, a godly consistency marked her entire walk, and one more example worthy of imitation is furnished to survivors. Her end was peace. There was at times an expressed anxiety to depart, yet always an acquiescence in the Lord's will. The confidence of faith was indulged, and so far as man can know, she has gained unspeakably by the change of worlds. "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his."

Historical Sketches.

AN INQUIRY AND ITS ANSWER.

MESSRS. EDITORS:—Permit me to make an inquiry through the pages of the “Banner of the Covenant,” hoping that some of the readers or correspondents of the “Banner” will give an answer to the inquiry. It will, perhaps, not only be edifying and useful to myself, but to a great many of the readers of the “Banner,” who are or may be placed in the same difficulty that I was, under similar circumstances.

The question is this. At what time, under what circumstances, where and by whom was the first Presbytery formed, by which the “Reformed Presbyterian Church” became such, separate, apart, and a distinct church from all others? We can trace the “Covenanters” to their origin, and also Presbyterians, and some places we see where they are called “Presbyterian Covenanters;” but we have not been able to find an answer to this question. The editors, or some of the readers of the “Banner,” will confer a favour by giving an answer to

AN INQUIRING FRIEND.

The best reply which we can give to this inquiry, will be found in the following extracts from the historical part of the Scottish Testimony. It will thus be seen that while the great mass of the Presbyterians of Scotland acceded to the establishment formed at the revolution settlement in 1688, there were some who maintained the original ground of the Covenanted Reformation, and thus were properly termed Covenanters. For many years this small remnant was destitute of any ministerial guide, but at length Mr. M'Millan, who had been in connexion with the established church, united with these few adherents to the attainments of the old Covenanters. Mr. M'Millan remained their only minister for 37 years, when he was joined by Mr. Nairne, and then in 1743, the Reformed Presbytery was constituted. It must be observed that this was not the original formation of our church, but only its re-organization.

[FROM THE TESTIMONY OF THE REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, SCOTLAND.]

The change produced by the revolution in 1688, deserves ever to be commemorated as a remarkable instance of the goodness of God to these lands; and the crisis at which it was accomplished, enhances the value of the deliverance. * * *

Yet it is to be lamented exceedingly, that the nations did not improve the precious opportunity again afforded to them, of restoring those excellent constitutions, in church and state, which Charles had overturned. Happy had it been for Scotland, whose obligations to steadfastness were so numerous, had she then complied with the divine injunction; “Remember whence thou art fallen, and repent, and do thy first works!”

Happy had it been for England, bound as she was in the same solemn league with Scotland, had she now strenuously applied herself to fulfil her sacred vow; "to endeavour the reformation of religion in the kingdoms of England and Ireland, according to the word of God, and the example of the best reformed churches!"* And how happy had it been for Ireland, where the progress of the truth was alternately obstructed by popish violence, and by prelatic persecution, and where the blighting influence of a covetous, inefficient, political clergy, still continues to present an insuperable obstacle to the advancement of the reformation! But the men who possessed the power of dictating to the new ruler the terms on which these nations were henceforth to be governed, were altogether averse to implement the engagements of their fathers.

There was a small minority in Scotland, with whom a portion of the Presbyterians in the north of Ireland concurred in sentiment, to whom these things were matters of deepest sorrow and disappointment. They had hailed the arrival of William, Prince of Orange, with a more fervent joy than any other class, because they had been the greatest sufferers under the late tyranny. They gave unequivocal evidence of their readiness to hazard their lives in the cause of their country's deliverance, by the effectual aid which they rendered in quelling an insurrection, raised in favour of the exiled king. But when they beheld, in the progress of the revolution settlement, that the best interests of religion were to be compromised; that many of the persons employed in erecting the new fabric, were such as had acted a prominent part in demolishing a more noble structure, and even in shedding the blood of the saints; when they perceived a deliberate design, to leave buried under the rubbish of iniquitous laws, a large share of what was most valuable in Scotland's reformation, their sanguine hopes were suddenly blighted, and the painful conviction was forced upon them, that the time of complete deliverance for the church was not yet come.

They were fully aware, from long and sad experience, that the decision to which they had come would expose them to obloquy and reproach; that must necessarily exclude them from most of the avenues to worldly honour and distinction; and that it might possibly bring upon them a new train of legal penalties. But their fathers, who had passed to their eternal reward, had committed to their custody a sacred deposit of precious truth, in the defence of which thousands of them had laid down their lives; and they could not consent to betray their trust, whatever hazard might arise from their fidelity. The banner for Christ's crown and covenant had waved over the field of Scotland, when the storm of persecution had raged most fiercely, and how could they be justified in dropping it now, when the God of Zion was pleased to command a calm?

The steadfastness of these witnesses was put to a very rigorous trial by the defection of their ministers. For some time the Rev. Messrs. Linning and Boyd had been united with Mr. Shields in dispensing the word and ordinances among them. The two former discovered an eager desire for union with the Revolution church at the earliest opportunity. Even Mr. Shields, who had been fellow-labourer with Renwick, and afterwards his biographer, of whose talents and piety the "Hind let loose" will be a lasting memorial, was carried away by the tide of conformity. He lived to repent of this rash step, when it was too late to recover what he had lost,—his character and peace of mind.* By the apostacy of their ministers, the people were once more left as sheep without a shepherd. In this emergency, their fellowship meetings and general correspondence were diligently maintained. They believed it to be inconsistent to join in partial or occasional fellowship with a church with which they could not join in full communion; and they perceived clearly, that attendance on public ordinances in the places where they respectively resided, must, in a short time, lead to the breaking up of their union, and, in so far as they were concerned, to the suppression of their testimony. Yet they would not violate the order of Christ's house to obtain ministers by any irregular course. When their faith and patience had been tried for a period of sixteen years, their prayers for a faithful minister were answered by the accession of the Rev. John M'Millan from the Established church, in the year 1706.

It was a source of fervent joy and praise to the scattered societies to have the ordinances of divine grace once more dispensed to them by a pastor, whose administration they could own without abandoning any part of their testimony, and without embracing an ecclesiastical fellowship which they justly regarded as exceedingly defective and corrupt. The toils and privations to which Mr. M'Millan cheerfully submitted, often imbittered by calumny and reproach in visiting and feeding a flock so widely scattered, proved him not unworthy to take up the mantle and the ministerial charge, which Cargill and Renwick had left behind. In a short time he was joined by Mr. John M'Neil, a licentiate of the Established church, who, while he continued in the fellowship of that church, contended for the same truths for which Mr. M'Millan had borne testimony, and had passed through the same ordeal of ecclesiastical persecution to which that excellent man was subjected. In 1708, they concurred in laying before the commission of General Assembly a joint protestation and declination, in which they presented an explicit statement of the grounds of their controversy with the Established church. Mr. M'Neil laboured as a preacher with much acceptance until his death. The high veneration which all parties entertained for the established order of Presbyterian government prevented any attempt to obtain ordination for Mr. M'Neil in an irregular way. Neither would they make the least compromise of their principles, in order to gain the co-operation of other ministers, who had been expelled from the Established church for pleading, to a certain extent, the same cause with themselves. Their ardent love to the truth, the testimony of an approving conscience, the manifest tokens of a blessing from on high resting on their labours, supported them amidst all present trials and discouragements.

After the incorporating union with England in 1707, and the restoration of patronage in 1711, had presented fresh instances of the apostacy of the nation, they adopted the resolution of renewing the Covenants, both as a means of confirming the faith of the church, and of giving a public testimony for the cause of Scotland's reformation. After much serious preparation, the solemn work was performed at Auchensach, near to Douglas, in the year 1712.

* He subsequently held the office of chaplain to a regiment which fought in league with the Pope. Having violated his covenant with God and the church, by which he was bound to oppose the power of Antichrist, we soon find him in the army employed to defend the man of sin. He subsequently embarked in the expedition to Darien, and, after having experienced the utmost distress, died unknown and neglected in Jamaica.

When the Rev. Ebenezer Erskine and his associates seceded from the judicatories of the Established church in 1733, Mr. M'Millan and the people under his care conceived strong hopes that the cause for which they had contended would be adopted by the Seceders. The testimonies emitted on both sides against the corruptions of the Established church, seemed very much to harmonize. But it soon appeared that the same harmony did not exist in the views which they entertained, respectively, in regard to the civil government of these nations. It was freely admitted by the Seceders that many grievous defects existed in those civil institutions which were erected at the revolution; that the qualifications required by the Scriptures, and by the Covenants, were not possessed by the civil rulers; and that the complex system in church and state entirely excluded, and was calculated to bury in oblivion, the covenanted reformation of the three kingdoms. Yet they believed it to be their duty to yield allegiance to the government, as the ordinance of God, to offer up stated prayer for it, and to render to it their active support. On the other hand, Mr. M'Millan and his people, being convinced that the conduct of these nations at the revolution involved a breach of their mutual engagements, and of their solemn covenant with God; and perceiving that the support of an Antichristian hierarchy, and of a usurped supremacy over the church, were made essential to the constitution; that the door of admission to the most important offices in the government was open to unprincipled and ungodly men; and that the relation subsisting between church and state gave to such men, when in power, a dangerous ascendancy over the Established churches, could not believe it to be incumbent on them to render to a government which "established iniquity by law" the allegiance which is due to institutions framed in accordance with the inspired volume. A controversy ensued, which, it must be admitted, was managed with some asperity on both sides, and which served to prove that the two parties could not be advantageously united into one communion. It was some consolation to Mr. M'Millan and his people, under this disappointment, that the accession of the Rev. Mr. Nairne to their cause enabled them to obtain a Presbytery. This minister had been a member of the Associate Presbytery; but as his sentiments on the subject of magistracy were not in unison with those of that body, he gave in his reasons of dissent, and withdrew; and having declared his adherence to the cause of the reformation as held by Mr. M'Millan and his people, he was received by them into church fellowship, and concurred with Mr. M'Millan and some ruling elders in constituting a Presbytery at Braehead, in the parish of Cornwath, on the first of August, 1743, under the appellation of the REFORMED PRESBYTERY. This designation they assumed as expressive of their attachment to the reformation cause, and of their desire, through divine aid, to contend for all those scriptural attainments, both in church and state, to which these nations were so solemnly pledged.

A door was now opened for the admission of young men to the ministry; and Alexander Marshall, having passed the usual pieces of trial before the Presbytery, was licensed to preach the gospel on the following year. To the aged father, who, for a period of nearly forty years, had stood almost alone in maintaining this cause, and whose heart must have frequently trembled for the ark of God, it was a delightful spectacle to see the church assuming a regular organization, and enjoying the visible prospect both of permanence and increase. Nor could any thing be more appropriate, as a means of confirming the faith of the church, and of fortifying the minds of the more youthful labourers, in whose hands the testimony was shortly to be left, than a renewal of the exercise in which this band of witnesses had engaged about thirty-three years before. The solemn work of Covenant-renovation was accordingly once more performed by the church at a place called Crawford-John, in Lanarkshire, in the year 1745.

As this was the last instance in which the public covenants were renewed in the Reformed Presbyterian church, we beg here to offer the following observations:—1st. That covenanting is an occasional duty, to be performed as the circumstances of the church, or of a nation may seem to demand; and that the permanent obligation of the covenants of these lands depends on their moral and scriptural character, rather than their being publicly recognised or renewed. 2d. Yet we believe that where a church or people have been brought under the bond of such engagements, it is a duty warranted by reason and Scripture occasionally to renew them, as the aspects of divine providence may require. 3d. We believe that the defection of a great majority of a church or nation from such covenants does not cancel their obligation; and that the call upon a minority, who adheres to them, to bring them up to remembrance, becomes the more urgent when the public acts of the majority have a tendency to bury them in oblivion. 4th. We approve of the zeal and faithfulness which prompted our fathers to engage in this work at seasonable times, and admit that we are placed under superadded obligations to adhere to these covenants in consequence of their deeds of renovation.

A few years after, the church was enabled to take a step of some importance for extending the knowledge of her principles in the new world. During the persecution, many Presbyterians who were driven from their native country, found an asylum in North America. These exiles, and their descendants, were accustomed, when it was practicable for them, to unite themselves into praying societies, as they were wont to do in their own land, on the footing of reformation principles. In the same year in which the Reformed Presbytery was constituted in Scotland, a number of them, residing in the State of Pennsylvania, held a meeting for the renovation of their covenants. At that time they enjoyed the labours of a minister who seemed to hold reformation principles very firmly, and to propagate them with uncommon zeal.* He proved deficient in steadfastness, however, and the United Societies there were left for many years, as their brethren had been in Scotland, without a public ministry. In the year 1752, the Scottish Presbytery was enabled to comply with their importunate entreaties for help, by sending to them the Rev. Thomas Cuthbertson, who, during a period of twenty years, was the only minister on that continent who displayed a banner for the whole of the Scottish reformation. By the assistance of some brethren who emigrated from Ireland, a Presbytery was at length constituted in the year 1774.† The same causes which retarded the progress of reformation principles in the British Isles operated also in America; yet, in the process of time, the Lord crowned the labours of his servants there with most encouraging success.

* The Rev. Mr. Craighead.

† The first Presbytery consisted of the Rev. Messrs. Cuthbertson, Linn, and Dobbin, with ruling elders.

Practical Essays.

A DANGEROUS MISTAKE.

The mistake to which we refer, is that of taking conviction for conversion, certain impressions of guilt and danger of sin made upon the conscience, for the saving operations of the Spirit. These convictions are important; it is highly desirable and necessary to have settled persuasions of the established connexion between sin and punishment, and, as a natural consequence, to feel uneasiness and alarm, in proportion as we have reason to believe our sins yet unpardoned. Until we see ourselves lost, we shall never truly come to Christ for salvation. Until we feel our malady, and dread its consequences, we shall never have recourse to the Physician, or be willing to comply with his prescription.

We adjure you, therefore, as you value your eternal interests, not to trifle with convictions, or to endeavour to wear off religious concern and uneasiness, by the vanities of life and stupefactions of pleasure. Regard and cherish them as the sacred visitations of heaven, look upon them as mercifully designed to rouse and awaken you from a fatal stupor. They are often the harbingers of mercy. Wherever the Spirit of God is, in reality, he will convince of sin; but conviction is produced in thousands who still remain destitute of saving grace.

That influence of the Spirit, by which a change of heart is effected, is essentially different from that distress and alarm which may be resolved into the exercise of mere natural conscience. For a man to be convinced that he is a sinner, and to tremble at the apprehension of wrath to come, is certainly something very distinct from becoming a new creature. Real Christians have not only perceived their danger, but have fled for refuge; have not only been less or more troubled with a sense of guilt, but, in consequence of coming to Christ, have found rest for their souls. On a review of your past life, you perceive innumerable transgressions, it may be, and are perfectly convinced that you have been "walking according to the course of this world, according to the prince of the power of the air, the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience."

So far as it is well, your apprehensions are just and well founded, and your situation more replete with danger than you have ever conceived it to be.

Do not, however, rest here. Let the views you entertain, excite you the more earnestly to press into the kingdom of God. Let them engage you to a more diligent use of the means of grace; and, above all, let them lead you to fix your hope and trust on the Redeemer, whose blood alone can cleanse you from sin, and whose intercession is able to save "to the uttermost, all that come unto God by him."—(Heb. vii. 25.) Apply to him with humble faith and ardent prayer, and though you may be tempted to cherish doubts of the extent of his power and grace, say with him of old, "Lord, I believe, help thou my unbelief."

Lay aside, as far as possible, every object, till you have reason to believe you have obtained mercy, and are renewed in the spirit of your mind. Address the throne of grace with unceasing importunity, remembering who hath said, "Ask, and ye shall receive; seek, and ye shall find. Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out." In all your addresses to God, make use of the name and intercession of Christ; plead the efficacy of his blood, and the encouragement he hath afforded sinners, in his gospel, to return to God. Keep a continual watch over your words, thoughts, and actions; keep your heart with all diligence. Guard, with the utmost care, against levity and sloth, two most dangerous snares to the souls of men.

If you ask, how you may know whether you are partakers of the special grace of God; we reply, This will be best ascertained by its fruits. When you feel a fixed hatred of sin, an intense thirst after holiness and perfection, and a delight in the word and ways of God; when you are habitually disposed to dwell on the thoughts of Christ and heaven; when the Saviour appears unspeakably precious, as "the pearl of great price," and you are habitually ready to part with every thing for his sake, you may be certain that you are born of God.

These are the fruits of the Spirit, which sufficiently demonstrate the influence and presence of that blessed Agent. Till you have experienced effects of this kind, you are in a wretched state, though surrounded with all the brightest earthly prospects, because you are estranged from God, and exposed to his eternal wrath and displeasure.—Robert Hall.

A FRIGHTENED DISCIPLE.

People do not feel very well when they are frightened. And they do not look very well, either. As for the last item, a case like the one in the caption, is one of the worst cases I know of. Now, a fright is a frightful affair, if there be an object of terror. But when the fright is occasioned by nothing adapted to such a result, there is something pitiful in the weakness of the sufferer, and ludicrous in the development made of himself.

A frightened disciple! But the very best authority has testified that "the righteous are as bold as a lion," and one was once known to say, and I thought most were like him, "I will not fear, though the earth be removed, and the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea." Then the one I saw could not have been near akin to the one just named; indeed, one must look sharp to discover any relationship at all. But, my readers will use their own judgments, when I have given them the case.

1. He was frightened by a cloud! The precious privileges of the Sabbath would commence in an hour or two. But that cloud! It did not look good-natured. There was no thunder nor lightning about it. But then there might be water, and if there was, and if it should let the dwellers below know it by an actual descent of the drops, and he should unluckily happen to be one of the number, how lamentable! He get wet! It was a terrific thought. I have read of an ancient disciple who was "a night and a day in the deep," and a good soaking he must have got by it. And he was not frightened, either. It would take more water than there was in all the ocean to frighten him. But the danger, not very pressing either, of a little sprinkling, did the work for the man I am noticing, and therefore I do not think a man could pitch a biscuit over the moral distance between him and Paul.

2. A supposition frightened him. The hour of a prayer-meeting was approaching. It was in his mind to go. But a supposition started up, like a serpent out of the grass. "I may be called on to pray. I do not feel like it. I do not think I could offer a prayer in my present state. My heart does not sympathize in such a business. I believe I will not go." The supposition stalked like a frightful spectre before him. It palsied his purpose, and his seat was vacant at the meeting for prayer. I believe many have been frightened from such meetings in the same way. I should like to see a group of them give, each in his turn, his views of the passage, "Men ought always to pray, and not to faint."

3. Hard words gave our disciple a fright. Wicked men know how to use this species of artillery against faithful saints, and the disciple in my eye had it tried upon him. And I was sad at the result. It made him droop. He was evidently alarmed, for he took some things back, both true and good, which he had said, and shrunk from doing others which the Bible and conscience both urged him to do. I wish he could have had a campaign with Paul. Hard words, like flints upon steel, did but strike out the fire in that good old soldier's soul. They roused him as nettles would a lion; not to give hard words back again, but to love and pray the more for his enemies, and to go the more zealously onward in his Master's cause. If hard words could have frightened Paul, he would have been in fright the most of his Christian life, but I will thank the man that will show me the instance in which they gave him alarm.

4. A proposed charitable collection gave our disciple something of a fright. It was thought that he bore such a relation to one who had sent him word that "it was more blessed to give than receive," and who had set the example of the blessedness of giving, in "that he gave himself for us;" it was thought that the disciple would have felt that such a relation to such a giver would have made charitable giving a very pleasant affair, and that there could have been nothing frightful about it. But it seems that any blessedness in giving, to say nothing about more, was not a matter he well understood; and the example of his Lord, it was to him but a dimly seen star, and in fact not often in his horizon at all. Hence he was uneasy if a collector or a contribution box was on a pilgrimage in his vicinity. I never heard that he made a bodily escape in terror on any such occasion, but his soul had wings and fled from the object whose claims were presented. And if his soul was as empty as the charity box would be, if all were like him, a very small pair of wings would suffice to carry so small and empty a soul from the regions of benevolence.

I have only one more thing to say about the frightened disciple, and that is, I wondered he was not frightened out of hope. Duties, one after another, went overboard in his alarm; and supposing that hope was part and parcel of the same bundle, I expected that would go overboard too.

But scared as he often was, and many a Christian grace as he dropped in his haste, he continued, somehow or other, to hang upon hope. But he might as well let it go. And I mean to tell him, if ever he gets so alarmed as to seek to relieve the ship by casting any duties of religion, he happens to have on board, into the sea, that he had better send hope after them as quickly as possible. Hope has no business out of their company. Let them sink or swim together.—N. Y. Evangelist.

BISHOP GEORGE AND THE YOUNG PREACHER.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

An aged traveller, worn and weary, was gently urging on his tired beast, just as the sun was dropping behind the range of hills that bounds the horizon of that rich and picturesque country in the vicinity of Springfield, Ohio. It was a sultry August evening, and he had journeyed a distance of thirty-five miles since morning, his pulses throbbing under the influence of a burning sun. At Fairfield he had been hospitably entertained by one who had recognised the veteran soldier of the cross, and who had ministered to him for his Master's sake of the benefits himself had received from the hand which feedeth the young lions when they lack; and he had travelled on refreshed in spirit. But many a weary mile he had journeyed over since then, and now as the evening shades darkened around, he felt the burden of age and toil heavy upon him, and he desired the pleasant retreat he had pictured to himself when that day's pilgrimage should be accomplished.

It was not long before the old man checked his tired animal at the door of the anxiously looked for haven of rest. A middle-aged woman was at hand, to whom he mildly applied for accommodations for himself and horse.

"I don't know," said she, coldly, after scrutinizing for some time the appearance of the traveller, which was not the most promising, "that we can take you in, old man. You seem tired, however, and I'll see if the minister of the circuit, who is here to-night, will let you lodge with him."

The young circuit preacher soon made his appearance, and consequentially swaggering up to the old man, examined him for some moments inquisitively, then asked a few impertinent questions, and finally, after adjusting his hair half a dozen times, feeling his smoothly shaven chin as often, consented that the stranger should share his bed for the night, and turning upon his heel entered the house.

The traveller, aged and weary as he was, dismounted, and led his faithful animal to the stable, where, with his own hands he rubbed him down, watered him, and gave him food, and then entered the inhospitable mansion, where he had expected so much kindness. A methodist family resided in the house, and as the circuit preacher was to be there that day, great preparations were made to entertain him, and a number of the methodist young ladies of the neighbourhood had been invited, so that quite a party met the eyes of the stranger as he entered, not one of whom took the slightest notice of him, and he wearily sought a vacant chair in the corner, out of direct observation, but where he could note all that was going on. And his anxious eye showed that he was no careless observer of what was transpiring around him.

The young minister played his part with all the frivolity and foolishness of a city beau, and nothing like religion escaped his lips. Now he was chattering and bandying senseless compliments with this young lady, and now engaged in trifling repartee with another, who was anxious to seem interesting in his eyes.

The stranger, after an hour, during which no refreshment had been prepared for him, asked to be shown to his room, to which he retired unnoticed—grieved and shocked at the conduct of the family and the minister. Taking from his saddle-bags a well-worn Bible, he seated himself in the chair, and was soon buried in thought, holy and elevating, and had food to eat which those who passed him by in pity and scorn dreamed not of. Hour after hour passed away, and no one came to invite the old, worn-down traveller to partake of the luxurious supper which was served below.

Toward eleven o'clock the minister came up stairs, and without pause or prayer, hastily threw off his clothes, and got into the very middle of a small bed, which was to be the resting place of the old man as well as himself. After awhile the aged stranger rose up, and after partly disrobing himself, knelt down, and remained for many minutes in fervent prayer. The earnest breathing out of his soul arrested the attention of the young preacher, who began to feel some few reproofs of conscience for his own neglect of this duty. The old man now rose from his knees, and after slowly undressing himself, got into bed, or rather upon the edge of the bed, for the young preacher had taken possession of the centre, and would not voluntarily move an inch. In this uncomfortable position the stranger lay for some time in silence. At length the younger of the two made a remark, to which the elder replied in a style and manner that arrested his attention. On this he moved over an inch or two, and made more room.

"How far have you come to-day, old gentleman?"—"Thirty-five miles."

"From where?"—"From Springfield."

"Ah, indeed! You must be tired after so long a journey, for one of your age."—"Yes, this poor old body is much worn down by long and constant travel, and I feel that the journey of to-day has exhausted me much." The young minister moved over a little.

"You do not belong to Springfield, then?"—"No. I have no abiding-place."

"How?"—"I have no continuing city. My home is beyond this vale of tears." Another move of the minister.

"How far have you travelled on your present journey?"—"From Philadelphia."

"From Philadelphia! (In evident surprise.) The Methodist General Conference was in session there a short time since. Had it broken up when you left?"—"It adjourned the day before I started."

"Ah, indeed!"—moving still farther over towards the front side of the bed, and allowing the stranger better accommodation. "Had Bishop George left when you came out?"—"Yes; he started at the same time I did; we left in company."

"Indeed?"

Here the circuit preacher relinquished a full half of the bed, and politely requested the stranger to occupy a larger space.

"How did the bishop look? He is getting quite old and feeble, is he not?"—"He carries his age tolerably well. But his labour is a hard one, and he begins to show signs of failing strength."

"He is expected this way in a week or two. How glad I shall be to shake hands with the old veteran of the cross! But you say you left in company with the old man—how far did you come together?"—"We travelled alone for a long distance."

"You travelled alone with the bishop?"—"Yes; we have been intimate for years."

"You intimate with Bishop George?"—"Yes; why not?"

"Bless me! Why did I not know that? But may I be so bold as to inquire your name?"

After a moment's hesitation, the stranger replied—"George."

"George? George? Not Bishop George?"—"They call me Bishop George," meekly replied the old man.

"Why—why—bless me! Bishop George!"—exclaimed the now abashed preacher, springing from the bed, "You have had no supper!"—I will instantly call up the family. Why did you not tell us who you were?"

“Stop—stop—my friend,” said the bishop, gravely, “I want no supper here, and should not eat any if it were got for me. If an old man toil-worn and weary, fainting with travelling through all the summer day, was not considered worthy of a meal by this family, who profess to have set up the altar of God in their house, Bishop George surely is not. He is at best but a man, and has no claims beyond those of common humanity.”

A night of severer mortification the young minister had never experienced. The bishop kindly admonished him, and warned him of the great necessity there was of his adorning the doctrines of CHRIST, by following him sincerely and humbly. Gently, but earnestly, he endeavoured to win him back from his wanderings of heart, and direct him to trust more in God and less in his own strength.

In the morning the bishop prayed with him long and fervently before he left the chamber; and was glad to see his heart melted into contrition. Soon after the bishop descended, and was met by the heads of the family with a thousand sincere apologies. He mildly silenced them, and asked to have his horse brought out. The horse was accordingly soon in readiness, and the bishop, taking up his saddle-bags, was preparing to depart.

“But surely, bishop,” urged the distressed matron, “you will not leave us. Wait a few minutes—breakfast is on the table.”

“No, Sister L——, I cannot take breakfast here. You did not consider a poor toil-worn traveller worthy of a meal, and your bishop has no claims but such as humanity urges.”

And thus he departed, leaving the family and minister in confusion and sorrow. He did not act thus from resentment, for such an emotion did not rise in his heart, but he desired to teach them a lesson such as they would not easily forget.

Six months from this time the Ohio Annual Conference met at Cincinnati, and the young minister was to present himself for ordination as a deacon; and Bishop George was to be the presiding bishop.

On the first day of the assembling of the conference our minister's heart sunk within him as he saw the venerable bishop take his seat. So great was the grief and agitation that he was soon obliged to leave the room. That evening, as the bishop was seated alone in his chamber, the Rev. Mr. —— was announced, and he requested to be shown up.

He grasped the young man by the hand with a cordiality which he did not expect, for he had made careful inquiries, and found that since they had met before a great change had been wrought in him. He was now as humble as he was before self-sufficient and worldly-minded. As a father would have received a disobedient but repentant child, so did this good man receive his erring but contrite brother. They mingled their tears together, while the young preacher wept as a child, even upon the bosom of his spiritual father. At that session he was ordained, and he is now one of the most pious and useful ministers in the Ohio Conference.

HOW TO HEAR THE GOSPEL.

Rowland Hill paid a visit to an old friend, a few years before his death, who said to him, “Mr. Hill, it is just sixty-five years since I first heard you preach, and I remember your text and a part of your sermon. You told us that some people were very squeamish about the delivery of different ministers who preached the same gospel. You said, suppose you were attending to hear a will read, where you expected a legacy to be left you, would you employ the time when it was reading, in criticising the manner in which the lawyer read it? No, you would not; you would be giving all ear to hear if any thing was left to you, and how much it was. That is the way I would advise you to hear the gospel." This was excellent advice, well worth remembering sixty-five years. Multitudes, because they have not learned the lesson taught by Rowland Hill, lose much of the benefit and enjoyment they might derive from hearing the gospel preached.

ORIGIN OF LESS CONSEQUENCE THAN DESTINY.

When Philip Henry sought the hand of the only daughter and heiress of Mr. Matthews in marriage, an objection was made by her father, who admitted that he was a gentleman, a scholar and an excellent preacher; but he was a stranger, and "they did not even know where he came from." "True," said the daughter, who had well weighed the excellent qualities and graces of the stranger, "but I know where he is going, and I should like to go with him;" and they walked life's pilgrimage together. How different would be the world's estimate of men if they were judged less by their origin, and more by their destiny.

A LESSON FROM CAFFRELAND.

There is in Caffreland a little society of about thirty or forty Christians, who are very poor—very poor indeed. A great part of them are widows, who are obliged to work hard to get bread to eat. The way in which they earn their food, is by picking up fire-wood and carrying it a long, long way to sell it in a town, and for this they do not get much. When the time came of the missionary society's jubilee, the minister in this place looked round on his poor people, and said to himself, "I will not talk to them about the jubilee, they are too poor to give any thing." But it happened that he went soon after to preach at Graham's town, on purpose to make a collection for the jubilee there. It came to the ears of his people, and one of them said, "Why don't you speak to us, and ask us to do something?" "It is," he said, "because I really don't think you can raise more money than you do already. I wish you would feel more and pray more, but I cannot ask you to give money." The man replied, "Perhaps the Lord will put it into our hearts to give money too." The minister was so much struck with the man's zeal, that he called the little band of Christians together, and told them about the jubilee, still scarcely expecting any money, for he could not tell where it should come from. But when the heart is moved, the hand will not be still. They brought him no less a sum than fourteen pounds. One of the poor widows came, with how much do you think in her hand? Fifteen shillings! The missionary was unwilling to take it from her. She said, "You must take it, the Lord hath done much for me." By and by she brought another five shillings. "My heart will not be still," she said, "till I have made up the pound." To one of the native teachers the minister said,

‘You cannot do more than you do now.’ He answered, “I must try to do more. Two words overcome me; one is, ‘Ye are redeemed, not with corruptible things as silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ!’ What blood is so precious as the blood of Christ? and this is what God hath redeemed us with. I must, therefore, try to do more. The other word is, ‘What is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?’ I see that the soul is indeed precious, therefore I must try to do more.”

Oh! for the heart of these poor Caffres! My children, if your hearts were as full of feeling as theirs—as full of love to Christ and of love to souls,—not one of your little hands would be standing still.

NEGRO IMPROVABILITY.

An article on the subject of Ethnography, the science of races of men, which appears in the ‘Edinburgh Review’ for October, will be perused with no small satisfaction by persons taking an interest in the progress of human intelligence, and the present condition of the coloured races. The doctrines which the reviewer establishes from a variety of evidence, are to this effect—that notwithstanding the extraordinary diversity of cranial formation, and colour of skin among mankind, all are of one species or family; and that the diversities which strike us as so remarkable, are a result of circumstances. Taking the Caucasian, or white races, as the most perfect type, physically and mentally, it is made out satisfactorily that tribes may be gradually cultivated up to this standard, or depressed below it. It seems, however, from the evidence adduced, that races may be much more rapidly degraded than elevated. Misusage of all kinds, bad food, inclemency of climate, severe bodily labour, will soon brutify, so to speak, the human being; and this fact is indeed obvious from common observation. The raising of the species from a lower to a higher standard, is a work comparatively tardy; yet the elevation is certain, provided the influences are employed. In this latter department of the subject one reads with pleasure of the improbability of the negro races; and we see, as in a vista, not only the gradual change of their features, but the actual abatement of colour in their skins. Negroism appears to be a result of centuries of exposure to a tropical clime, along with degradation of habits. Alter these habits for the better, submit the negro through several generations, to the usual modifying influences of civilization, and there seems no reason to doubt that at least comparative whiteness of skin would be the consequence. Referring the reader to the article in question for a luminous treatment of this curious subject, we may extract the following passages, bearing on negro transformation:—

“The negro type is one which is not unfrequently cited as an example of the permanence of the physical characters of races. The existing Ethiopian physiognomy is said to agree precisely with the representations transmitted to us from the remotest periods, in those marvellous pictures, whose preservation in the tombs and temples of Egypt, has revealed to us so much of the inner life of one of the most anciently-civilized nations of the world; and this physiognomy, it is further maintained, continues at present identically the same from parent to child, even where the transportation of a negro population to temperate climates and civilized associates (as in the United States) has entirely changed the external conditions of their existence. Now, it is perfectly true that the negro races which have made no advance in civilization, retain the prognathous [projecting jaw] character, even in temperate regions; and this is precisely what we should expect. But it is not true, when they have made any progress in civilization, that they remain equally unaltered. The most elevated forms of skull among the African nations are found in those which have emerged, in a greater or less degree, from their original barbarism. This has chiefly taken place through the influence of the Mahommedan religion, which prevails extensively among the people of the central and eastern part of Africa.

“In regard to the transplanted negroes, it is obvious that the time which has elapsed since their removal is as yet too short to expect any considerable alteration of cranial configuration. Many of the negroes now living in the West Indian islands are natives of Africa, and a large proportion of the negro population both there and in the United States, are removed by no more than one or two descents from their African ancestors. But according to the concurrent testimony of disinterested observers, both in the West Indies and in the United States, an approximation in the negro physiognomy to the European model is progressively taking place, in instances in which, although there has been no intermixture of European blood, the influence of a higher civilization has been powerfully exercised for a very lengthened period. The case of negroes employed as domestic servants is particularly noticed. Dr. Hancock, of Guiana, even asserts that it is frequently not at all difficult to distinguish a negro of pure blood belonging to the Dutch portion of the colony, from another belonging to the English settlements, by the correspondence between the features and the expressions of each, and those which are characteristic of their respective masters. This alteration, too, is not confined to a change of form in the skull, or to the diminution of the projection of the upper jaw; but it is seen also in the general figure, and in the form of the soft parts, as the lips and nose. And Mr. Lyell was assured, during his recent tour in America, by numerous medical men residing in the slave states, that a gradual approximation was taking place, in the configuration of the head and body of the negroes, to the European model, each successive generation exhibiting an improvement in these respects. The change was most apparent in such as are brought into closest and most habitual relation with the whites (as by domestic servitude,) without any actual intermixture of races—a fact which the difference of complexion in the offspring would at once betray.”

With respect to the black colour, “we are accustomed,” continues the reviewer, “to say that colour is only skin-deep;” but, in point of fact, it is not even skin-deep; for it does not reach the true skin, being entirely confined to the epidermis or scarf-skin. It was formerly supposed that between the true skin and scarf-skin there lay a proper colouring layer, to which the term rete mucosum was given: and it was imagined that this layer was greatly developed in the dark-skinned races, but nearly wanting in those of fair complexion. This account of it, however, when submitted to the test of microscopic inquiry, has been found to be totally incorrect. The rete mucosum has been discovered to be nothing but the latest layer of epidermis, the inner surface of which is continually being renewed as the exterior is worn away, just like the bark of a tree. There is no distinct colouring layer, it appears, either in the fair or the dark-skinned races; the peculiar hue of the latter depending upon the presence of colouring matter in the cells of the epidermis itself. Now that this colouring matter may be generated, even in the fairest skins, under the influence of light and warmth, we have a familiar proof in the summer freckle, which is nothing else than a local production of that which in some races is general. Persons who have been much exposed to the direct rays of the sun become "tanned" or "sunburnt" in like manner, owing to the formation of colouring particles in the cells of the epidermis, which are usually almost colourless.'

To have established, by rigorous microscopic inquiry, that the colour in the negro races is not inherently natural in the system, but casual, as if a result of sun-burning in consecutive generations, is a fact of great importance. We hope that investigations on the increase and abatement of colour in the human subject will continue to engage the attention of the learned. Meanwhile, it is gratifying to know that what has been ascertained is vindicatory of negro improvability as regards either mental or physical qualities.

A NEGRO IN CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY.—Several years ago, a coloured man named Alexander Crummel, was refused admission to the Episcopal Theological Seminary in New York, except on conditions which he considered degrading, and would not accept. We are happy to learn, from an Episcopal paper, that he is capped and gowned in the University at Cambridge. He went to England to get funds in aid of his church, and some benevolent person or persons have put him in his present position, to enable him to better qualify himself for the work of the ministry.

EFFECTS OF SLAVERY.—We find the following paragraph going the rounds:—

The New York Journal of Commerce says that the sale of the 500,000 acres in the State of Mississippi, donated to the State for the purposes of internal improvements, which was to have taken place on January 1st, at Jacksonville, has turned out a complete failure. Only a little over two hundred acres were bid in at a minimum price of $6 per acre.

This is a case in point to show the effect of slavery upon a State. These were choice lands, and in a free State would have gone off like hot cakes; but slavery paralyzes every thing like progress. Arkansas, a year or two since, offered some fine lands for nothing to any one who would settle upon them, but the offer has not been accepted to any extent. Even gratuities will not induce men to settle in a slave State.—Washington Patriot.

GIVING THE BIBLE TO SLAVES.

Rev. J. G. Fee has sent the second monthly report of the colporteur who is engaged in the effort to supply slaves of Kentucky with the Bible. Our estimation of the importance of this work is continually increasing. From the eagerness of such as can read, to obtain the Bible, and the revelation of the difficulties under which they learned, we are led to believe that the number of readers among them will be, at least, doubled every year for many years to come. But the supplying the slaves with the Bible is by no means the whole of Mr. Gillaspie's work. We are assured that he does not pass by any family unvisited, or fail to supply any slave belonging to them, that can read, with the Bible. After conversing with them about their personal piety, the next question to the whites is, what are you doing for the oppressed? Upon Christians he urges the duty of bearing a consistent and uniform testimony against slave-holding, even to the extent of withdrawing from church fellowship with them. The extract given below, confined mostly to his anti-slavery labours, will show with what effect this is done. The rebuff, mentioned under date of Jan. 25, is the only considerable one of which he makes mention.

We have little doubt that if men of the right stamp could be found, a colporteur could be placed in almost every county in Kentucky, who could, besides the ordinary duties assigned to colporteurs in other societies, give the Bible to every slave able to read it, and apply the gospel in almost every slave-holding family, to the overthrow of the whole system of slavery.

"Jan. 4.—Visited a large family, the parents in which were pious. One child was pious, the only one out of fourteen who could read. Education aids religion. In another family found a brother and sister at home. The sister was very pious, truly devoted to God. She said her prayer to God was that the oppressed might go free. * * *

"Jan. 7.—A slave from a neighbouring plantation came to get a Bible. He was one of fifteen or twenty on the same farm, was a preacher in the Methodist church, and had been preaching five years, yet had never had a Bible. He could read, and had learned to read in a very singular way, singular at least to persons where schools and teachers are abundant. A slave woman on the plantation had been taught the letters of the alphabet by a little white child. This slave woman taught Bush, the black man—the preacher—his letters. He then got a piece of a hymn book, and having committed some of the hymns to memory by hearing others sing, he applied the letters and saw what ones composed certain words, and in this way learned to read. When the Bible was presented, he was one of the most grateful souls you ever saw. It was to him, apparently, more valuable than the wealth of the world. I asked him to come in and pray with my family; he did so, making one of the best of prayers. * * * I have found three other slaves in this county who have learned to read in the same manner. Almost all coloured people, at least those here, are fond of singing; consequently they make efforts to learn hymns; and having learned some, they apply themselves diligently to obtain more.

"Jan. 24.—At night, after visiting several families during the day, I went to a prayer meeting. I found there one slave, a Christian, who could read, but had no Bible. I gave him one, for which he was very thankful.

"Jan. 29.—We (Mr. Fee and Mr. Gillaspie,) started for home, and visited some families by the way. One of these was composed of two old coloured people who had been slaves. When tottering upon the brink of the grave, they were freed. They had cleared for themselves a few small patches of ground, and had a comfortable and neat cabin. They were Christians, but had no Bible. I gave them one."

The improbability of the slaves being supplied with the Bible, except by a special effort directed to this particular object, may be inferred from some of the facts mentioned in Mr. Gillaspie's report. Some of those whom he supplied had long been able to read, and hearing of his work, came considerable distances to obtain a Bible. One of these had by some means become the possessor of a hymn book, which he kept twenty years, but could get no Bible until one was given him by Mr. G.

The county in which Mr. G. is now labouring, has been very destitute of religious instruction. There are about four Sabbath schools in the county; three of these have little more than a nominal existence, and have no library connected with them.

The Sabbath.

We presume it is generally known, and by every Christian must be deeply regretted, that the journey of General Taylor, to Washington, was marked by repeated violations of the sanctity of the Sabbath. We are glad to find that a faithful reproof has been addressed to him, which we trust may reach the heart, and tend to prevent similar violations of the divine law and infractions on the good order of the community.

GENERAL TAYLOR AND THE SABBATH.

REV. DR. SIMPSON—DEAR BROTHER,—Having, after much solicitation, concluded to place the following letter in your hands for publication, I deem it due myself, and the subject of the communication, to preface it by a few brief observations.

It is generally known that I am engaged, under the direction of the "Western Sabbath Union," in the work of promoting the better observance of the Lord's day. To this work I have brought an honest and deep conviction of its importance, as well as a determination to meet with respectful but decided rebuke every species and every form of Sabbath profanation, no matter by whom it is perpetrated, or upon what occasion it might be manifested. While thus employed, the instances animadverted upon in the following letter rose up before me. The President elect was on his way to the capitol of our country to take upon himself, in legal form, the highest and most solemn responsibilities which man can assign his fellow man. In his course, he made no distinction between the Sabbath of the Lord, and the days which may be legitimately employed for travel and public festivity. He permitted himself to be borne to cities on the holy Sabbath, when he well knew that his coming on that day would be utterly subversive of all the ends and purposes to which it had been consecrated; thus giving all the moral effect of his high example to the strengthening and perpetuation of an evil, against which all the vital Christianity of this nation is firmly arrayed.

Under these circumstances, the question was, shall this example go unrebuked! Shall we permit in General Taylor that which a thousand voices would solemnly rebuke, if perpetrated by one in a less elevated station! With me the path of duty was plain. The elevation of Gen. Taylor to the highest office in the gift of the people has not released him from a common responsibility. And knowing, as I did, with all the force of a painful and humiliating conviction, that those who surrounded his person, and conducted the pageants by which his passage through the country was distinguished, would be much more likely to flatter than reprove, I could not, I dared not, leave a solemn duty to the chance of being performed by men who would be vastly more zealous to show our President in the crowded ball-room or theatre, than to fortify his tottering morality by the faithfulness of respectful Christian admonition.

Impressed with these convictions, I penned the following letter, which I have good reason to know reached its destination, and performed its mission; with what effect eternity only will reveal.

That the communication will meet with but little favour with many, I am prepared to admit; but that it will commend itself to all who rightly estimate the invaluable advantages of a pure national morality, I am fully confident. With their approbation added to the testimony of a good conscience, I seek no other reward. I would, on all occasions, treat with respectful deference our nation's Chief Magistrate, not only because I honour him as a brave and worthy man, but especially because I acknowledge the higher obligation arising from the precept, "Thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of thy people." I need scarcely add, that the communication was not written for publication; and I submit it only in deference to the respected opinions of others.

Yours, truly,

W. KENNY,

Agent of the West. Sab. Union.

Cincinnati, Feb. 22d, 1849.

TO MAJOR GENERAL Z. TAYLOR, PRESIDENT ELECT OF THE UNITED STATES.

DEAR SIR,—While receiving the proffered congratulations of your fellow-citizens who unitedly tender you their expressions of high regard, I regret deeply the existence of a great moral necessity by which I am impelled to address you.

The class of people, whom I represent, is composed of those who sincerely rejoiced in your elevation to the position you now occupy, and who have contributed, by the exercise of the rights of free citizens, to the placing of you in that position.

They are a class, too, who would greatly delight to join their fellow-citizens in every proper expression of their gratification at the result of a political struggle, which has made you the Chief Magistrate of this great nation.

They are a class, moreover, that are not found among those who beset and annoy your path with applications for Executive favour, or the honours and emoluments of office. We wish to see you the free President of a free people, seeking the common welfare, by the exercise of a wise but free discretion in all the appointments within your gift.

But we must, as Christian men, as Christian ministers—believing that national morality is the only security to national honour and prosperity—we must be permitted respectfully, but most decidedly, to enter our solemn protest against such desecration of the Christian Sabbath, as was involved in your reception by the citizens of New Albany and Louisville..

Your progress thus far toward the seat of government has been marked by a very great disregard of those high moral sentiments which we had hoped would govern your personal and official conduct, as the President of a Christian nation. You are making your way to the chair of state over the prostrate Sabbath, leaving behind you as the inevitable result, a public sentiment more determinedly and recklessly corrupt by the influence of your example. Thousands have crowded your path, to seek, in the light of your smile, the means of sustenance for mercenary hopes; thousands more have gathered about you to indulge the outpourings of a pure patriotism; while all seem to have forgotten, in the joy of your coming, that there is ONE higher than kings or presidents, who will not give his glory to another, and whose laws may not be trampled upon by any with impunity. In the midst of these rejoicings, and while you were receiving these testimonies of general respect, surrounded by the imposing array of military and civic pageantry, remember, dear sir, that this incense has been offered to you, and has been accepted by you, on that day which the God of nations has set apart for his own honour, and appropriated to the uses and ends of that Christianity, without which a nation's glory must fade into dishonour, and a nation's strength languish into imbecility.

And think not for one moment, respected sir, that they are less your friends who have the honesty to remind you of these things. Your present position is much more likely to attract flattery than respectful admonition. But, be assured, there are those who cherish for you too profound a regard to permit them to be wanting in even the most delicate and difficult offices of true friendship, and who still cling to the hope that they may be permitted to follow the President elect to the chair of state, with all their fond and long-cherished anticipations, that he would be the worthy ruler of a nation claiming to be Christian.

What now are we to hope for? May we expect that hereafter our Chief Magistrate will repair the injury and outrage inflicted upon thousands of Christian citizens? Or, must we conclude that he has leagued himself with the workings of iniquity, and pledged the whole force of his high example to a Sabbathless irreligion, more fatal to our country's interests than invading armies, or the devouring pestilence? An answer to these questions will be sought in your future conduct.

We seek from you no countenance to sect or party in religion, as such; we invoke from you no official interference. We seek only the pure example of the man. Elevated to the responsible position you are about to occupy, we wish to see you come to the work of administering our government, giving evidence of a felt and acknowledged responsibility to the ALMIGHTY RULER OF THE UNIVERSE; thus giving to the people over whom the government is administered, an example of ready submission to legitimate authority.

You have been called, by the suffrages of a free people, from the toil and peril of a field bravely won; and we had the right to suppose that the man whose heroism had never faltered in former peril—in the day when national prowess was staked in the contest—we had the right to suppose that he still would be the hero, when our country's morals was the prize of victory. But we have been doomed to a bitter humiliating disappointment. General Taylor HAS SURRENDERED. We have seen the man whose voice had waked the tempest of battle, and the lifting up of whose arm had stilled its raging—we have seen this man turning away from the proffered security, the impregnable fortress of high moral principle, smiling his approval and speaking his thanks to the conductors of a pageant, subversive alike of public order and Christian morality. We have seen, what it gives us pain to record, a hitherto invincible general, now President elect of these United States, when the day of moral conflict came, surrender at discretion, and march in the triumphal procession of his captors over a prostrate Sabbath.

And now, dear sir, if your ear has become too familiar with flattery to heed the unstudied language of honest and respectful admonition; if the artificial perfume of popular incense has so deadened your moral sense as that you can perceive no evil arising from such an example; then remember, I pray you, that you go to but a brief triumph at our nation's capitol, where you are soon to assume the responsibilities of an administration, which separated by your own acts from the sympathies and support of a Christian people, is destined to be a curse to the nation, and, therefore, a disgrace to the nation's Chief Magistrate.

You have apparently taken ground against Christianity and good morals, and in so doing, you have given strength and confidence to every form of error and irreligion which antagonizes with a nation's highest interest. It is for this reason that I obtrude myself upon your attention. Humble as I am, I claim to vindicate the cause and honour of ONE, to whom even Presidents are responsible. Thousands of your fellow citizens throughout the country are united in a common effort to rescue our Sabbath from desecration; and we have been met in our course by your conduct and your example. We may not silently submit. We acknowledge the full force of our obligations to honour the ruler of our nation; but we must meet and discharge these obligations in a way consistent with the claims which a higher Ruler imposes.

In the name, then, of every Christian in this nation—in the name of our common Christianity—in the name of an outraged Sabbath—in the name and in the behalf of every friend of a pure national morality—and in the name of Him, without whose blessing your administration can be neither honourable to yourself nor a blessing to the nation, I invoke from you such a future example as will restore the faltering confidence of your best friends, and leave to the future historian the pleasing task of recording the unsullied virtues of our President, and the uninterrupted prosperity of his administration.

In conclusion, I throw myself, without apology, upon your known candour and magnanimity, for the liberty I have taken in this communication. Take it to your retirement, and, after reading, cast it not hastily from you. It suggests nothing in principle or practice, which, if adopted by you, can stain your honour or tarnish your name. On the contrary, it may be suggestive of such principles of future conduct as will be to you of incalculable value.

Praying that the blessings of Heaven may be richly vouchsafed to you in all the arduous and solemn responsibilities of your administration, I subscribe myself, honoured sir, most truly and respectfully, yours, Cincinnati, Feb. 16, 1849.

The Family Circle.

SCOLDING.

A great deal of injury is done to children by their parents scolding. Many children have been nearly or quite ruined by it, and often driven from home, to become vagabonds and wanderers, by scolding. It sours your temper, provided it is sweet, which is a question; if you scold, the more you will have to scold, and because you have become crosser and your children likewise. Scolding alienates the hearts of your children. Depend upon it, they cannot love you as well after berating them, as they did before. You may approach them with firmness and decision, you may punish them with severity adequate to the nature of their offences, and they will feel the justice of your conduct and love you notwithstanding all. But they hate scolding. It stirs up bad blood, while it discloses your weakness and lowers you in their estimation. Especially at night, when they are about to retire, their hearts should be melted and moulded with voices of kindness that they may go to their slumbers with thoughts of love stealing around their souls, and whispering peace.—N. Y. Evangelist.

THE WIFE.

It is astonishing to see how well a man may live on a small income, who has a handy and industrious wife. Some men live and make a far better appearance on six or eight dollars a week than others do on fifteen or eighteen dollars. The man does his part well; but the wife is good for nothing. She will even upbraid her husband for not living in as good style as her neighbour, while the fault is entirely her own. His neighbour has a neat, capable and industrious wife, and that makes the difference. His wife, on the other hand, is a whirlpool into which a great many silver cups might be thrown, and the appearance of the waters would remain unchanged. No Nicholas, the diver, is there to restore the wasted treasure. It is only an insult for such a woman to talk to her husband about her love and devotion.

PARENTS.

Keep your children beside you, in the same slip or pew. Boys left to themselves, play in church, we perceive—behave disorderly, whisper, laugh, move about, disturb the quiet of others. This is wrong, very wrong; God's house is profaned.

A few Sabbaths ago, we saw some two or three quite large girls, big enough to be ladies, whispering, and laughing, in time of worship. O what a burning shame and disgrace! It is bad enough in all truth, for boys to disgrace themselves in the house of God: but, for females to do it, is shocking in the extreme! Parent, is this daughter yours? Keep her at home, till she is taught better manners.

The Sabbath School.

INDIFFERENCE TO SABBATH SCHOOLS.

"I PRAY thee have me excused," is the language of too many of the professed followers of Christ, forgetting the solemn covenant they have entered into, to consecrate themselves to the service of God, they form the habit of saying, at the call of every duty, however easy to be performed, "I pray thee have me excused." My heart has been pained at the thought that so many are verily guilty in the sight of God, for indulging in such awful apathy in the cause of the Sabbath school. It is one of the most delightful employments that a Christian can be engaged in, and nothing but uncontrollable providences should ever hinder a child of God from this blessed work.

There are many, very many, who stay away and refuse to lend their aid, as teachers or scholars; they will allow any thing for an excuse. One young lady has left a class of interesting little girls, with whom she had met, with their smiling faces. They had listened, in breathless silence, as she told the story of Jesus, and pointed them to Calvary; the Spirit had begun to make impressions upon their tender hearts, and, as it began to germinate, a withering blast came over it—their teacher left. The class came a few Sabbaths, and found not their teacher; as soon as the morning service was ended, she hastened home; they look sorrowfully at each other, and ask, Can she love us? At length, justified by her absence, they leave. The class is broken up, and the interest goes with it. Is the teacher not responsible for all this? Who will say, if she had been found faithful, that all these dear youth would not have been gathered into the fold? Teacher, God has a controversy with you!

Another don't like the confinement, and has no time to study, and has prayed to be excused. He had a regular class, that he had instructed for a long time; they were very constant and attentive, but soon, those young men that had respected the Sabbath school, become careless and inconstant, and their minds less susceptible. They finally leave the school and religious restraints—become hardened and impenitent, and die unconverted!

It is impossible for a Sabbath school to flourish, without a deep-felt interest, a willingness to spend and be spent for its advancement. We should be devoted to our work, ever feeling our great responsibility, and never absent ourselves without such reasons as would avail with God. We shall never regret any labour or sacrifice we make, when we take a retrospective view of our lives in the light of eternity. For we are rapidly hastening to the judgment, where we must give an account of our stewardship to God.

Religious Intelligence.

MEXICO.—An exchange paper says, that some of the soundest statesmen in the republic are taking sides in behalf of religious freedom. Among them is Pena y Pena, the late acting President, and, beyond all question, the ablest statesman in Mexico. Otero, also a prominent member of Herrera's cabinet, is pressing the subject on the people with signal ability. Rosa, the Mexican Minister at Washington, arrays himself among the advocates of religious reform. The leading press in the Capital, the Monitor, has declared itself strongly in favour of toleration. Its influence is very great, and its arguments cannot pass unheeded. Even Herrera, who has long sustained the clergy, and been a favourite of theirs, is exerting his power in behalf of the religious emancipation of his countrymen.

HUNGARY.—The portion of the population which is protestant, is about three millions, nearly one million of which are Lutherans, and the remainder Reformed. They were for a long time, and most violently, persecuted by the Austrian dynasty. They even attempted openly to expel them from the country. The consummation of this iniquity was prevented, by the kind providence of God. But the perseverance of the persecutors, and the cruelty of the means which they employed, were such that these churches, which included nearly the entire population of the country, were reduced to but one-third of their number, or even less. After this long baptism of blood, they were exposed to a danger, which, in a still more serious manner, threatened their existence, through the influences of indifference, rationalism, and semi-infidelity. But lately, a decisive change has become manifest among them, and a reaction in the direction of the truth has commenced.

In this state of things, a public salary to be paid by the State, was, about six months ago, offered to the Protestant Churches of Hungary. The two General Synods of those churches met, some months since, to deliberate on the proposal of government. This proposal was unrestricted by any condition on the part of the government. The Synods were requested to examine it, and inform government on what terms they would receive the aid which was offered them. Many feared that the Synods would hasten to gripe this money, come what would. The greatest portion of the clergy, who are to the number of three thousand pastors in the Reformed Church alone, live in great poverty. Unanimously, and without needing to go formally into a vote, it was resolved to refuse, whatever the consequence might be, union of any sort whatsoever with a Popish government. "Christ," said these faithful confessors, "furnished us with what was temporally needful for us during long centuries of persecution: he will not forsake us now. As to the government, kind, no doubt, but Popish, which at present offers us gold, instead of steel; Timeo Danaos, et dona ferentes, ('I dread the Greeks, e'en when they bring us gifts.')" Sooner or later, as the price of the favour which it offers us, it will be sure to intermeddle with the internal government of our Church. We cannot, like Esau, "sell our birthright for a mess of pottage."

The Synods of the two Churches at first assembled separately, that each, apart, might prepare its answer to government. But they thought it would be advantageous to have a general meeting afterward, that, if possible, the two answers might be made to correspond. Met for the first time for centuries past, with what astonishment and joy they discovered, that their views coincided to such a degree, even in the minutest details, that the plan drawn up by one Synod, might have served as the organ of the other! The answer of the Reformed Church being better written and more complete than the other, was adopted in behalf of both churches, on the motion of a Lutheran pastor, and was presented to government as a common answer.

A governmental measure, which had reference to schools, met with the same fate. Government proposed to establish national schools, in which the secular instruction would be separated from the religious, the latter being left in the hands of the clergy of the two denominations. It was resolved that the churches would have nothing to do with these schools, and that they would maintain the superintendence which they have heretofore exercised over the youth, until the period of their entrance into the University.

It was, moreover, resolved, that in case government should establish Chairs of Protestant Theology in the University, the Churches would in no shape recognise them, unless the appointment of the Professors should be assigned to them unconditionally.

This is a fine example of spiritual independence, which ought to admonish us, the members of a Church salaried by the State, not to maintain that union, except so far as this independence is respected. Such also is my opinion.—French Cor. N. Y. Obs.

THE GOSPEL IN AUSTRIA.—This country, which a few months ago was utterly impervious to the gospel in any shape, is now, in the providence of God, wide open for the admission of the truth. The word of God has now free course, and is glorified; and Christian missionaries are permitted unmolested to proclaim the unsearchable riches of Christ in the very streets of Vienna, the capital. The friends of the gospel are in danger of committing a serious mistake in present circumstances. They seem to take it very much for granted that these wide and effectual doors are to continue open for an indefinite period, and that they may enter at their leisure. A more thoughtful view of the still unsettled state of the nations generally would suggest a different and wiser policy. We have lately seen a letter from a Protestant minister in France, in which he says: "I should be very happy if the liberty that I mentioned our having obtained was likely to be permanent. Unhappily, things are beginning to change already, so that we do well to redeem the time, for the days are truly evil. As yet I have only heard of indications in some remote localities, but that has always been the way in the beginning; and in this country every thing is on so precarious a footing that we never know what is likely to take place to-morrow." Perhaps there is even less, certainly no greater, security for the continuance of the present favourable posture of affairs in Germany than in France; and we trust the earnest appeal of the Edinburgh Bible Society will be promptly, as well as liberally, responded to.

A new constitution has been lately granted by the emperor—the following is a summary of its provisions:

Individual liberty is secured; the press is not allowed to be put under censorship; the right of petitioning, and the right of assembling and forming associations belongs to every body; the private domicile is inviolable, and the police are bound to liberate or produce before a judge, in forty-eight hours, persons whom they have apprehended.

The complete equality and toleration of all religions, the independence of every church and sect in the management of its own property and affairs, the extension of education to all languages, and its prosecution as a government work, are specially secured. The Imperial Diet is to consist of two houses, whose constitution approaches nearer to that of the American Senate and House of Representatives than the legislative assembly of any other State. The members of the Lower House are to be chosen by direct suffrage, among the population at large, the qualifications for a vote being the payment of annual taxes, from one to two pounds. The Diet must be convoked every year; and, in case of its dissolution, only three months must elapse before the convocation of another.

The Jews.

JEWS IN THE UNITED STATES.—The recent revolutions in Europe are already largely swelling the number of Jewish emigrants to this country. And a new spirit of interest and effort in behalf of Judaism is manifesting itself in various quarters. Schools for the education of Jewish youth are multiplying and taking an elevated stand. Synagogues are being founded in all the large towns. One was dedicated to the "God of Israel" in Philadelphia, on the 29th of March, and another, in Louisville, Kentucky, on the 30th. In Cincinnati, a few years since, one hundred pounds of passover cakes supplied all the Jews of that city during the passover season; now upwards of 20,000 pounds are necessary. On the 11th of June next, a general convention of delegates from all the Jewish congregations in the United States, is to meet in New York, to deliberate upon the best methods of promoting the cause and interests of Judaism in this land.—Chr. Inst.

"In the City of Berlin, Prussia, out of a population of 8,000 Israelites, 1,000 have embraced the gospel of Jesus. During the year 1825, 100 conversions took place in this city.

Independently of these, we find from the year 1827 to the year 1842, 1,888 Russian Jews have received the gospel.*

It is still more remarkable, that during the year 1847, 2,147 of the same country received Christian baptism. There is no considerable town in Germany, in which some baptized Jews may not be found; and in Poland, during fifteen years, fifteen at an average have been baptized annually."

According to the London Quarterly Review, the Jews have played a distinguished part in all the revolutions of the German states. At least one-third, if not the half of the public journals in Germany have been for a long time conducted by Jewish editors. In Austria the most forward amongst the extreme democrats have been Jews. Dr. Jellinek, for instance, who was executed with Dr. Bekker on the 23d of November, at Vienna, and whose journal had been an organ of the Red party since the month of March last, appears to have been a Jew, born on the frontiers of Moravia and Hungary. The names of Börne and Heine,† both of whom died refugees at Paris, and both occupied a prominent position in the most advanced section of revolutionary writers, are doubtless familiar to many of our readers. Both of these daring adventurers were Jews. In Austria, the Jews have of late played so prominent a part in revolutionary politics, that out of ten leading men, six or eight will be found to belong to that nation. In Prussia, likewise, the most violent journals are in the hands of the Jews, whose leader in the chamber at Berlin is Jacobi, a member of the extreme left.

NOTES OF A VOYAGE TO INDIA.

I must here introduce you to our captain, officers and crew. Captain Chapman is an excellent practical navigator, skilful in working his ship, remarkably accurate in his calculations, and prudent in determining his course of conduct. In his intercourse with his officers and men, he is kind and conciliating. He is much respected by them all. To our party his manner has been unobtrusive and rather reserved. His conduct most respectful, and his desire to accommodate us and contribute to our comfort has caused him to forfeit many personal indulgences which, under other circumstances, he would have enjoyed. His books, charts, &c., were always at our service, if we wished to consult them, and any information we desired freely given. We must ever retain a grateful remembrance of his kindness, and have only to regret that we are unable to make an adequate return for such favours. Our first officer, Mr. Cross, is also a man of enlarged experience, extensive knowledge and steady habits. He understands the duties of his station, and is unremitting in his attention to their performance. To his kindness we are likewise deeply indebted. The second officer is a young man, but very competent to fill his station, and likely to rise in his profession. His conduct towards us deserves like commendation. The whole of our ship's company consists of fourteen men, exclusive of the Captain and officers, cook and steward. Of these eight are American, two English, three German, and one Norwegian (the carpenter.) The cook and steward are both coloured. I can safely say of all, that, as seamen, they are unsurpassed for activity, promptitude and diligence in their respective departments. Some are the sons of wealthy parents, who choose to submit to the toils of the sailor that they may attain that knowledge which will qualify them for subsequent command. From all we have received most unlooked-for respect; and we trust our intercourse with them will yet be felt, in their after lives, to have been for good and not evil. Such are our companions on this voyage.

* Jewish Intelligencer of 1842.

You may likewise wish to know something of the ship in which our lot has been cast. To describe her properly, I ought to call to my assistance the first officer, whose inexhaustible vocabulary of panegyric on her perfections would scarcely do more than realize my opinion of her merits. That she is a "crack vessel," "proper tight" in every part, "chock-full of copper bolts," with a "neat trim," and a fast sailer, would not be enough. She has nearly every thing that could be desired to make her a "first-rate" merchantman. She holds a high rank, indeed, among the class of vessels just mentioned. She is Mr. Mackie's favourite vessel, built under his own superintendence. She is a beautiful model, constructed with a view to fast sailing, yet of sufficient capacity to contain a large cargo. Her register is five hundred tons. Our cabin, as you know, is a neat little place, a perfect square, ten feet six inches in extent. Our state-rooms are, it is true, sufficiently limited, six feet in length, by five feet six inches in breadth. Our accommodations are, however, in every way satisfactory; few missionaries have been so highly favoured in leaving your shores for India. We recognise the hand of God as signally displayed in the manner in which we have been provided for. I can bear my testimony thus far to the truth, that "Those who are in the habit of observing the particular dispensations of Divine Providence will always have a providence to observe." "Make me to understand the way of thy precepts; so shall I talk of thy wondrous works."—Psalm cxix. 27.

Thus manned and equipped, we commenced our voyage. For the first twenty days, our "course" was south-easterly, with light winds and, with little exception, delightful weather. During this time we had little variety, save the sight of a few vessels, one of which, on the 17th of August, came so near that we were in hope of sending some letters by her; but in vain: she kept on her course, and our letters were consigned to our desks. I amused myself sometimes by taking up and examining the gulf weed which floats here in large quantities. It is found as far east as 50° long. I suppose it is detached from the shores of some of the West India Islands. It marks the course of the Gulf stream, and is not without its interest in the history of the world. It was owing to the sight of it that Columbus was enabled to persuade his mutinous crews to continue their voyage to the Western world. On the 13th in lat. $35^{\circ} 20'$ and long. $44^{\circ} 50'$, we had an opportunity of beholding a beautiful exhibition of that curious phenomenon the water-spout. Before this we had seen some small specimens, but on this afternoon they were numerous and larger. One in particular, on the "lee quarter," appeared not over a mile distant, and much the largest that I ever saw. It appeared to encircle a space of many rods in diameter, and, from the agitated appearance of the adjacent water, must have attracted with incredible velocity all that came within its influence. It gradually tapered towards the point where the cloud appeared to meet the waters, drawn by it into a conical shape, till at last in the centre it seemed no thicker than a two inch-rope; it then separated, the waters assuming their wonted appearance, and the cloud, like a ravenous monster surcharged by its own rapacity, retired to its more kindred region. It did not, in my estimation, long retain its booty,—as a heavy shower from the adjoining cloud fully indicated. Whatever may be the cause of this interesting freak of nature, it is certain there appeared the agitation as of a strong wind, though all around was comparatively calm. This might, it is true, have been caused by very rapid evaporation, produced by an undue excess of electrical action. We may mark results, but it is difficult to fathom their causes. What we do know are merely "parts of God's ways, but how little a portion is heard of him!"

The first breach of the weather, and consequent sea-sickness, we experienced in lat. $24^{\circ} 10'$ and long. $36^{\circ} 45'$, on the 20th August. It continued during the 21st, and laid us all up, with the exception of Mr. C. and the children. Our sickness was not of long duration, and amounted, at the worst, to little more than would be experienced after a dose of tartar emetic. From the 20th to the 23d the winds continued baffling, and the weather rather unpleasant, when we took the N. East trade in lat. $20^{\circ} 45'$. This was rather remarkable, as the regular trades are said to reach as far as 30° on each side of the equator. In the summer season, however, the N. East trade is little to be depended on. We passed about three hundred miles from the Cape de Verd Islands, and losing the trade in lat. 12° , met with westerly winds, which carried us as far east as long. $18^{\circ} 50'$ in the lat. of $5^{\circ} 40'$ north, within two hundred miles of the Grain Coast of Africa. We entered the south-east trade on September 4th in about lat. 4° north. Although at this point it blew a stiff gale from S. S. W., it gradually became more favourable as we proceeded south, till standing south-west. We crossed the equator on the night of the 6th in long. 27° . This is a point in the progress of voyagers to which they look forward with great interest, especially those who, for the first time, approach it. This arises from the expected visit of old Neptune, who claims all as his children who approach his dominions, and requires all new-comers to undergo the ceremony of initiation into the brotherhood. I know not how the practice originated or by whom, whether it was instituted by Bartholomew Diaz or by some of his more fortunate successors, it is certain that it is still observed in most English ships to some extent, and even in some American. Some of our sailors had undergone the process. Our officers and men, however, had either too little veneration for an ancient foolish custom, or too much wisdom to commemorate it, for we were allowed to pass without a sight of the princely monarch. In nine days from the time of taking the S. E. trade we had reached its termination in lat. 20° south and long. 31° west. We passed about seventy miles westward of the islands of Trinidad, and were but a short distance from the coast of Brazil. The chief variety during this period was the large shoals of flying fish, winging their short-lived flight from the vessel's path. It was very exhilarating, too, to experience such an agreeable change in the rapidity of our progress. We now commenced an easterly course with variable south-westerly winds, and on the first of October arrived in long. 16° east and lat. $35^{\circ} 24'$ south. Here we met with a dead calm which marred our progress for several days.

SOUTH AFRICAN FRENCH MISSION.—The Evangelical Christians of France have been for some years prosecuting the missionary work in south Africa. Under date of May 10th, 1848, one of the missionaries writes from Beersheba:—

I should like to tell you something of what I have seen on my journey hither. The first of the French missionary stations we reached, was Bethuli. The people are of the Batlape tribe—I was struck with the neat and tidy appearance of the village. There is a neat chapel in it capable of containing from six hundred to seven hundred people. There are no benches in it yet, but each one brings his stool or chair, and, taking their seats in the most orderly manner, they listen to the words of life. With few exceptions, they wear the European dress. The next place was Carmel, which is a new station, and is intended as a seminary for training native youths as schoolmasters and teachers, or catechists. We next came to Beersheba. It is under the care of Mr. Rolland, and is situated near the Caledon river with the mission house at the base of a high mountain, and the people living in houses grouped in small hamlets on the top and sides. About twelve years ago, Mr. Rolland took up his abode here with fifteen people, and now their number is about two thousand. They are making great progress both in temporal and spiritual affairs. Many of them possess large herds of cattle, and cultivate a considerable portion of the ground. About two weeks ago, I was present at the baptism of thirty adults, ten men and twenty women—and on Sabbath afternoon, I had the privilege of commemorating the dying love of our Saviour, with nearly five hundred of my sable brethren and sisters in the Lord. A great many of these had only a few years ago been cannibals, more ferocious than the lion which roams the forest, disdaining the flesh of an ox or sheep, and choosing starvation, almost, rather than eat any thing else than human flesh. These are now numbered among the meekest of Christ's followers, sitting at the feet of Jesus, feeding by faith on the broken body and shed blood of our divine Redeemer.

The missionary spirit is also strikingly displayed. One old woman, the first convert in this place, has prayer meetings in her house, and on Sabbath night assembles the women who live near her and questions them on what they have heard during the day, and explains what they do not understand. One young lad who assisted Mr. Rolland in the school, was asked if he was willing to go and help in the printing office. He at once replied with energy, "Yes, in the work of the Lord, I am ready to do any thing."

RECENT INTELLIGENCE FROM INDIA.

The last steamer brought numerous communications from the missionary brethren. We are glad to be able to state that they have advanced rapidly on their journey into the interior, and that they have had good health. Mr. Woodside's family has been increased by the birth of a daughter. The same steamer has brought us information of the safe arrival in Liverpool of our beloved and esteemed Treasurer, Mr. George H. Stuart.

Patna, January 27, 1849.

Rev. and very Dear Brother,—In a few hours after I had despatched my letter to you, on the 7th December, I had the pleasure of receiving your very interesting communication of the 26th September. With what feelings of delight did we open those welcome messengers of friendship that had followed us “overland,” and which brought the first intelligence, after our arrival in India, of beloved ones from whom we had parted, probably to meet no more on earth. Every sentence they contained was full of interest. Every allusion to the past, called up afresh the scenes through which we had passed, and which can never be forgotten. No, dear brother, we can never forget the pleasures of the hour in which we met with you and other dear friends, and of the sacred seasons we spent in your company, in social meetings and public ordinances; and, above all, we never can forget the solemnities of the parting scenes in Philadelphia, New York, Boston, and on board the Dolphin. If the overflowings of Christian friendship and affection can yield such pleasant fruit on earth, what must be its sweetness in heaven, where it will be refined and heightened beyond our present conceptions? If the little heaven upon earth, which we are permitted to enjoy during so brief a season, is capable of diffusing so much joy in hearts knit together in Christian love, what will that fulness of joy be in hearts fully sanctified and expanded, in the place where happiness will be “as large as our wishes, and as lasting as eternity?” I thank the Lord that I was permitted to see once more in the face of such dear friends, with whom I had formerly taken counsel, and to form an intimate personal acquaintance with many more in different parts of Christendom. For the many tokens of Christian friendship that were shown me by all, and, above all, for the deep interest so generally manifested in the great cause that it was my privilege to present before them, I wish to return my warmest thanks. Personally I feel myself unworthy of all the respect that was shown me, and I feel humbled in being able so inadequately to express my sense of such favours as have been heaped upon me. To all the teachers and pupils in your interesting sabbath-schools, as well as to the members of the missionary society and of the congregation under your care, I must ever feel myself to be laid under the greatest obligations, and to be most ardently attached. O that I could come up fully to the point of Christian devotedness and missionary usefulness that they may all reasonably expect from me. While in view of the arduous and important work of a missionary to the heathen, and of the responsibilities under which I have been laid, I might well exclaim, “Who is sufficient for these things?”—yet I feel that I am in the path of duty, and that as it is not by might, nor by power, but by the Spirit of the Lord, that the work is to be effected, he can, for his own glory, and that all human boasting may be excluded, employ a weak, despised, worthless, and what the world may call a foolish instrumentality, to effect his purposes of grace among the blind idolaters of this land. I have never regretted what I have done, and, I hope, I will never grow weary in the work of missions. Let our dear Christian friends continue, as I know they have done heretofore, to remember us in their prayers, and then I feel confident that our labours and their benevolence and prayers "will not be in vain in the Lord." And as the time is very limited in which all that we can ever do in this cause must be done, let us do what we can with all our might. What would "the great cloud of witnesses" who surround us, and who have, through grace, obtained the prize of their high calling, give for the opportunities which we now enjoy of advancing the kingdom of Christ, through whose blood they have been redeemed, and sanctified, and glorified in heaven? Angels who have never experienced such expressions of redeeming love, delight to execute Heaven's high behests, and to look into the scheme of grace as it is revealed in the gospel. How much more should men, who have been redeemed from wrath and sin, and made heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ, and who hope to enjoy eternal happiness in heaven, be willing to consecrate themselves to the service of God among the heathen, when it hath pleased him to appoint them as his ambassadors to reconcile sinners to himself, and to preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ. O that the Christian world were all sensible of the important trust committed to them for the heathen, and the exalted honour and unspeakable privilege it is to be co-workers with Christ in advancing the kingdom of grace throughout the world. Surely it is time to work now, when such immense portions of the heathen world—so long under the dominion of the prince of darkness—so long barred against the gospel—are now wide open and inviting the heralds of the cross to go in and possess the land. Surely it is time to sow the seed, when the ground has been prepared by the pioneers who have been labouring, and when the materials are all ready, and every prospect of an abundant harvest. Surely it is time for Christians to listen, when the Macedonian cry is heard on every breeze, and from all quarters of the world,—a cry for help, which is only an echo of the wail of hundreds of millions sinking down to death without God and without hope. We do trust that many are now awake to these subjects, that many of the young people in the sabbath-schools are learning their duty, and that very soon many will be found to run to and fro in the earth with the messages of the gospel, and that the world will soon be converted to God. The signs of the times are very ominous. It is astonishing what events have taken place during 1848. The potsherds of the earth have been dashing themselves against each other; and the Pope, with all his pretended infallibility, in the habiliments of a postillion, has been compelled to fly from Rome. Will the wounds of the beast be healed? Will the kings and potentates of the earth give their power to the beast, and place him again on the seven hills? Time will reveal. But we fear this will be the case, and that the witnesses must yet be slain. It will be well for protestants of the right stamp to buckle on their armour, and try their principles so that they may be ready for the struggle. Surely we live at an important period in the history of the world.

My letter to our mutual and dear friend, Mr. Stuart, posted nearly a month ago at Berhanpore, would tell of some of our difficulties in making arrangements at Calcutta, getting our boats started, &c. We have been going on comfortably and speedily since, and all our party are enjoying excellent health. The weather is delightful, and as cool at this season as we could wish. We hope to reach Allahabad about the middle of February. Then we shall have made more than half the river voyage. We trust that we shall arrive at our homes about the middle of April. We see much in the idolatry of the people as we pass along from day to day, to excite sympathy in our hearts for their miserable condition. We sometimes find opportunities of addressing them and placing tracts in their hands, but it is painful to pass them by with no one to instruct them more fully in the way of life. When will there be missionaries in sufficient numbers for the wants of this land?

We have been glad to hear of the pleasant meeting of Synod, and hope that much good will result to our branch of Zion. We doubt not but Jacob will arise, though he be small. You will please let us know when your next meeting is to take place, that we may send a report from the Saharanpur presbytery. We have been delighted to hear that Dr. W.'s health has been restored. May he be spared many years yet to go in and out before his people. Please present our unabated and most affectionate regards to all Christian friends. Amongst other Christian friends I wish to be particularly remembered to the Rev. Messrs. Cooper, Dales and Bower. As ever, very dear brother, yours in the bonds of Christian love,

J. R. CAMPBELL.

UNION CONVENTION.

According to adjournment, in October last, the Convention of delegates from several branches of the Presbyterian church in the United States, held its second meeting on the 10th ult., in the city of New York. Delegates appeared from the Associate, the Reformed Presbyterian, the Associate Reformed Synods of New York, the West, and the South, the General Assembly Presbyterian, and the Reformed Dutch, churches. Rev. Dr. Pressly, of Allegheny, Pa., presided, and, after a very free interchange of sentiment and feeling, on the first day, the Rev. Drs. Pressly, of the Associate Reformed Church, Phillips, of the General Assembly Presbyterian, Strong, of the Reformed Dutch, McLeod, of the Reformed Presbyterian, and Rev. J. P. Miller, of the Associate, were appointed a committee to report matter for the action of the Convention. The committee gave attention to their work, and presented a report, which was freely discussed in all its points, and, at length, adopted. Appended to it were the following resolutions:

Whereas the church of Jesus Christ constitutes one body, of which He is the Divine Head, and, consequently, should be so organized as to exhibit to the view of the world the appearance, as well as the reality of unity, and, whereas, the present divided condition of the church is, in appearance, at least, inconsistent, therefore,

Resolved, 1. That it is the imperative duty of the followers of Christ to aim at bringing about a union of all the different portions of the household of faith, upon a scriptural basis.

Resolved, 2. That, in the judgment of this Convention, it is not only desirable but practicable to effect a closer union than that which now exists between the bodies which are here represented, whereby they might more successfully accomplish the great design for which the church was established.

And, whereas, the views of the great system of evangelical truth, as exhibited in the standards of these different churches, namely, in the Westminster Confession of Faith and Catechisms, the Articles of the Synod of Dordrecht, and in the Heidelberg Catechism, are substantially the same, therefore,

Resolved, 3. That it is the duty of these churches to cultivate towards each other the spirit of fraternal affection, to exercise Christian forbearance, and to co-operate in all scriptural efforts to promote the common Christianity.

Resolved, 4. That, in the judgment of this Convention, while the singing of God's praise is an interesting part of religious worship, and while, for the present, it is left to the different churches to employ whichever of the authorized versions now in use may be most acceptable to them, the sacred songs contained in the book of Psalms are every way suitable and proper for that purpose, and any intimation that they breathe a spirit inconsistent with the gospel is to be regarded as a reflection upon their Divine Author.

Resolved, 5. That, where it is practicable, without any surrender of principle, an interchange of ministerial services be recommended, and that the different churches pay respect to each others' acts of discipline and sustain each other in all scriptural efforts to promote the good order, and to preserve the purity of the church.

Resolved, 6. That, in the prosecution of the work of Missions, it is desirable that these different churches should act in concert, the missionaries being accountable in the exercise of their ministry to the particular body with which they are ecclesiastically connected.

Resolved, 7. That for the promotion of a better understanding and more intimate intercourse between these different churches, it is desirable that a Correspondence be maintained, either by letter or by delegation, as may be judged most expedient.

Resolved, 8. That these resolutions be recommended to the consideration of the different churches represented in this Convention, that they may report their judgment in the premises, and appoint delegates to a future Convention, to be held in the city of Albany, N. Y., on the first day of November next, at 11 o'clock, A. M.

All which is respectfully submitted.

THE SEMINARY.

The sessions of the Theological Seminary have closed for the season, with the usual exercises. According to the requirements of the constitution the board of Superintendents met on the 4th of April, and occupied nearly three days in the required examinations. Eight public discourses were delivered in the Eleventh street Church, and made the subject of full and free criticism by the Superintendents. The exercises were all of a very superior character, and evinced great labour.

and skill on the part of the Professors in directing the course of study, and of mind, scholarship, and perseverance on the part of the pupils. That there is talent of high order in the classes, and that there is good evidence of its being sanctified, was most manifest to all taking an interest in the exhibition. It certainly is a ground of great encouragement to the church that there are so many young men devoting themselves to the service of God in the gospel of his Son; and the school of the prophets, as the source of their instruction and discipline, should receive, as it so fully deserves, the confidence and support of the whole Reformed Presbyterian Church. While we were attending with delight on the examinations in Hebrew, Chaldee, Greek, General Theology, Church History and Government, and collateral subjects, we felt as though we could wish that the whole church, and especially its ministry, were enjoying the same privilege. It is a matter of gratitude to God that he is still sparing the senior Professor in his usual vigour of mind, to open annually before the students his stores of profound and varied learning, and to discipline their minds by the exhibition of his great experience. May this blessing be long continued to the church! We presume the ministers and people of the church generally are hardly aware of the labour and time expended by both the Professors in preparing for and attending to the classes. Lectures carefully elaborated are read several times in each week. These the students are required to make their own, by the memory, aided by the pen, and subsequently to sustain examinations from them. At the appropriate time, also, the students practise public speaking, on a theme previously given, before the Professors and fellow-students. They also read elaborate essays, and recite from the scriptures in the original languages of both testaments. The Professors are discharging their duty. Let the church do hers also. Let the younger part of the ministry, who have themselves drank at the same fountain, feel it to be their privilege to sustain the Seminary by speech and action. And let it not be forgotten at the throne of mercy.

After extended advices from the President and other members of the board of Superintendents, the students were dismissed for the season. They were all advanced to the next higher class, and Mr. James Pearson was recommended for licensure. Mr. Gillespie had already received license a few weeks before from the Philadelphia Presbytery.

A SUPERINTENDENT.

LICENSURE OF MR. DAVID GILLESPIE.—We neglected to mention in our last No. that a meeting of the Philadelphia Presbytery was held in March, at which Mr. David Gillespie, having delivered with approbation the usual pieces of trial, and sustained the customary examination, was licensed to preach the gospel. Mr. Gillespie has since been preaching, with much acceptance, in Kensington congregation, now vacant, from the sickness of its pastor. He has recently returned to Pittsburgh.

Man Saved by the Foolishness of Preaching. An Ordination Sermon. By John Niel McLeod D. D., Pastor of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, N. Y. New York: R. Craighead.

This able and interesting discourse was delivered at the ordination and installation of Rev. R. A. Hill, as pastor of the congregation in Ryegate, Vermont. Taking as his text 1 Cor. i. 21, last clause, the author proceeds to examine "What is that preaching which it is God's pleasure shall be the means of man's salvation," which leads to a very valuable exhibition of the facts, the principles, and the authoritative offer of salvation, as presented in the gospel system. The whole discussion abounds in thoughts of the most important character, expressed in the clear, comprehensive and earnest style which marks all Dr. McLeod's productions. We hope the discourse may have a wide circulation, as it will richly repay perusal.

Romanism.

[From the Protestant Quarterly Review.]

POPERY IN THE UNITED STATES.

BY REV. JOHN N. McLEOD, D. D., NEW YORK.

This article was prepared at the earnest solicitation of the publisher of "Edgar's Variations of Popery," and was intended to appear as an appendix to that work. It was in readiness at the date below, August 1st, 1848, and for adequate reasons was withdrawn from the publisher's hands. It now appears precisely as it was first prepared.

The picture of Romanism which Dr. Edgar presents to the world in his "Variations of Popery," is, in many of its aspects, rough and forbidding. It is, however, a good daguerreotype. If, therefore, there be much in it that is offensive, it is the fault of the original of the picture, and not of the artist, or of the light which he employs as the instrument to engrave it. If the worth of a portrait consists mainly in its resemblance to the original, then does the author of the "Variations" deserve the thanks of the community, for he has shown us in the light of its own revelations, what popery was, and is, and will continue to be, until the predestined period of its downfall shall arrive.

"Bossuet's Exposition," and also his "History of the Variations of the Protestant churches," to which there is immediate reference in the preceding work, were written towards the close of the seventeenth century. And they constitute together one of the most adroit apologies for the papal superstition which are to be found on record. Appearing immediately after the chief triumphs of the reformation, their great design is to smooth down the asperities, and conceal the more forbidding features of the Romish system, and by persuading men that it has been misrepresented by Protestants, win them back to the bosom of mother church. The learned bishop, however, does not confine himself to a defensive armour. He very skilfully, though covertly, attacks the citadel of Protestantism, and endeavours to undermine its foundations.

His assumption is that the existing variety in the forms and statements of Protestantism necessarily involves disagreement and uncertainty as to its fundamental principles, and hence he concludes that the whole is a deception—an undefinable phantom, leading men astray to their ruin. But the assumption is false. Circumstantial variety is perfectly consistent with essential unity, and the universe is full of illustrations of the fact. How varied are the form, size, character, colour, and pursuits of men, of different ages, times, and places, and yet all of every generation possess the essentials of humanity. Humanity deteriorated in perdition, and improved to its heavenly sublimation, is humanity still. And so it is with truth and error. In Protestantism, which is divine truth deduced immediately from the oracles of God, there is an essential unity which remains unaffected by the various forms in which it is expressed and applied, and even by the errors and disorders by which it may sometimes be surrounded. Error, serious and terrible, forms the basis of popery, and amidst all its mutations of form and circumstance, its essence is one. "Semper et ubique eadem," always and every where the same, is its own claim, and we are not disposed to deny it. It is perfectly proper, however, that the man of sin should be combated with his own weapons; and turning the tables upon his antagonist, Dr. Edgar has shown, with distinguished ability, that the variations of Romanism are indeed endless, while its fundamental dogmas, proper spirit, and ultimate aims, remain unaffected. If the variety of its creeds divests Protestantism of its claim to be the true religion, as the bishop of Meaux affirms, then "do the variations of popery," on the same principle, demonstrate its anti-christianism. But the whole argument is sophistical, confusing, and deceptive, and the author of the volume before us does not use it to approve it, but simply to show that the boasted unity of popery is after all but a unity in its essentials—that it can vary its forms indefinitely, to suit the existing condition of society, and retain its power, and that its modern adaptations are but new articles of dress, and a new mask assumed to flatter and deceive. Strip them off, and the Antichrist is there.

In these United States we have popery in the garb of free republicans. Still, we remember when it had less of its own proper dress than it has now, that its increased numbers give it more boldness and influence. Under this dress, however, we are persuaded, the old enemy of the true religion and human liberty is to be found, and therefore we rejoice with others in the appearance of the work before us. It is not a mere collection of antiquities, but emphatically a series of "tracts for the times."

The service required from the author of the appendix is a brief exposition of popery as it is in these United States; and the information sought is mainly statistical. It being taken for granted that the Roman Catholic system is truly displayed in the foregoing treatise, in its theological, ecclesiastical, moral, and political aspects; and also that it is the same essentially now and here, as it has always and every where been, the present question is, what is the number and character of its adherents, lay and clerical, and how are these combined and disciplined to act in this community for the maintenance and perpetuation of their faith?

To collect and methodize the statistics of Romanism in the United States, is a work of considerable difficulty. These States are imbedded in a confederation of thirty great political communities, extending over a large surface, and presenting a vast variety of character, manners, language, and condition. The population is constantly changing by movements from one State to another, and by immigration from foreign countries. And neither the state nor federal governments make any provision for the numbering and classification of the people according to their religious profession. In this state of things, each religious denomination is left to collect and publish its own statistics. Each is its own witness, and its testimony is to be received mainly on the ground of its own credibility. The amount of faith to which anti-christianism is entitled, is well known to the protestant world. Its statements are undoubtedly to be received with enlightened caution.

The statistics we are now about to give are those published by Roman Catholics themselves, submitted to such corrections as can evidently be made from other sources.

We quote from the "Metropolitan Catholic Almanac and Laity's Directory for 1848." It is published annually in the city of Baltimore and is understood to be under the eye of the archbishop himself. In the introductory notice, the editor uses the following language: "This importance (of the almanac,) must increase with the rapid growth of catholicity. This almanac is referred to, not only in America, but throughout Europe, as the exponent of the Catholic church in the United States; and at a future day it will form the most reliable source of information on the same subject."

On page 273 of the almanac it is added, "From the preceding statements, we find that within the territory of the United States there are 3 archbishops, 24 bishops, 890 priests, and 907 churches; 20 priests have died, whence it follows that during the past year there has been an accession of 76 to the number of priests, and 95 additional churches have been erected or dedicated." And again, on the same page, the whole catholic population is estimated at 1,190,700.

On page 259 we have the following statement: "Grand total of clergymen in the United States 919."

With regard to the foregoing statistics it may be observed, that under an appearance of great precision, there is really much indefiniteness with respect to several of the more important items. Thus, for example, the number of the population in the great dioceses of New York and St. Louis is not given. The same is true of the dioceses of Richmond and Hartford, and of the number in others but a general estimate is presented. The difficulty in arriving at numerical accuracy in regard to a population so scattered and fluctuating, has been already admitted. Still we are convinced that the estimate made by the compilers of the almanac is entirely too low; and we come to this conclusion, first, from the disagreement of the Roman Catholic authorities themselves. In an article in the "History of all the religious denominations in the United States," headed "Roman Catholic Church," and written by Professor W. Jos. Walters of Philadelphia, the Roman Catholic population is estimated at, the highest calculation, 1,300,000. This was written in 1843 or 1844. In 1848, four years after, the almanac gives the number 1,190,700. A difference of 109,300 less, and yet undoubtedly the amount of immigration and addition was much larger during these years than ever before existed. In 1842, Bishop Rosati, of St. Louis, estimated the number at 1,500,000; and as far back as 1838, Bishop England published the number at 1,200,000. According to the almanac, it is less now than it was ten years ago, and yet the vast increase of "catholicity" is the continual boast of its adherents. It is evident from their own authorities that the number doubles itself in, say, seven years. If we then take the estimates either of the prelates of St. Louis or Charleston as our guide, the number arrived at will be some three millions in 1848-9. This is the number of the Roman Catholic population as now usually received by intelligent Protestants. But again, "During the year ending September 30, 1847," says the N. Y. Sun, "239,480 emigrants landed on the shores of the United States. We have conversed with intelligent individuals engaged in the emigration business, and the uniform opinion has been that of all the persons arriving from foreign countries, especially Germany and Ireland, two-thirds are in connexion with the Roman Catholic church." Say but one-half are Romanists, and this would give the number arriving in that year at 119,740. The calamities of Ireland, and the revolutions of the continent of Europe, have greatly swelled the tide of foreign immigration during the current year; and the facts taken in their proper connexions will show that the number above assigned to the papal population here is not an over estimate.

Remarking upon the proceedings of the great provincial council held by order of the Roman Pontiff, in the city of Baltimore, May, 1846, the editor of the American Protestant says: "This council has taught us that we have not over-estimated the Roman Catholic population in the United States. The council considered the importance of introducing immediately into this country 2,300 more priests than there are at present, that there may be one priest to every thousand souls. They publish for 1846, 762 priests in the United States. Add to these 2,300, and you will have 3,062. Now, according to this, giving to each priest 1000 souls, the Roman Catholic population is three millions and sixty-two thousand."

Recapitulation.—About fifty-eight years since, the first papal see was created by the Pope in these United States, and there are now, in August, 1848—Archdiocesses and diocesses, 30. Churches, 907. Other stations, 562. Ecclesiastical institutions, 22. Male religious institutions, 19. Literary institutions for males, 25. Female religious institutions, 53. Female academies, 74. Charitable institutions, 95. Clerical students, 217. Clergy of various grades, 1000. Whole population, (corrected estimate,) three millions.

The "Report of the Commissioner of Patents," an official document published in Washington, gives the whole population of the United States, in 1847, at twenty millions, seven hundred and forty-six thousand. Thus it appears, that Roman Catholics compose about one-seventh of the entire population. In the above calculations, no reference is had to the vast territories which have recently become the property of the Union, by the ratification of the treaty with conquered Mexico. A large part of the population is known to be Roman Catholic, and, to an extreme, ignorant, superstitious, priest-ridden, and unmanageable. It is indeed true, that the proposed article in the treaty, guarantying special toleration to the papal religion, was stricken from it by the government of the United States before the ratification: but the population is there; and it will add essentially to the burdens of the State, and to the home heathenism, which the church must labour to bring to the truth as it is in Jesus Christ. Whatever prospective advantages may result from the opening up of this vast country to the labour and enterprise of the world, and from the bringing of its population under a better influence as regards knowledge, morality, and religion, the immediate effect of its annexation to our Federal Union will certainly be to increase the power and confidence of Romanism, and the consequent danger to our free institutions. We have not, as yet, before us the means of reliable information on the subject, but there is evidence enough to show that the thousand, which we have given as the number of the clergy, will be increased by hundreds, and the three millions of people, by many thousands. The New York Observer, of July 22d, 1848, presents to us the following picture, drawn by the pencil of General Houston, at present a Senator in Congress from the State of Texas, and undoubtedly an unprejudiced witness. At the celebration, in Lancaster, of the fourth, General Houston held the following language, as reported by the Lancaster Union:

"He said that one great evil under which they suffered in Texas, before the revolution, was the Catholic priesthood, who were bigoted, intolerant, and cruel; that the circulation of the Bible was prohibited; that there were no newspapers printed in Texas, except one little one called a "thumb paper;" that whenever any one attempted to print or publish one, the priests would catch him and send him over the Rio Grande in irons, to be tried by their fellow-priests, and perhaps to be burned as a heretic. So intolerant and oppressive was the priest-ridden government of Mexico, that a man was not allowed to plant half a dozen hills of potatoes, unless he obtained the consent of the Alcalde, who was generally a priest."

The power of popery in the United States.—In the mighty establishment which we have thus been presenting, there is power—a power of numbers, of organization, of mind, of money, and of mischief incalculable.

Number is power.—This is true, especially in a republican country, where the right of suffrage is almost universal, and the existing administration of the government made at once through the ballot-box. Differing in this, as in many other things, from the other classes of the population, Roman Catholic citizens act in masses, they support their own men, or those whom they think will best subserve their interests. They make the religious control the secular, and are governed by the great principle that a man's religion should direct him in all things. It is said of the Roman Catholic prelate of New York, when a few years since he deemed it proper to speak out on the subject of politics, that he gave to his people, on the eve of a contested election, the following advice: "Your religion is more to you than any thing else, vote for the men that will support your church." Whether the gentleman referred to, used the precise words above quoted, we presume not to say; but we know that his conduct at the period alluded to, spoke this language, and that it expresses a principle of the great community of which he is so prominent an officer. Romanism is as much a perversion of the right and the true, as a compound of the false and the wrong; and relieving the sentiment, above expressed, from its papal perversions, we would commend it to all protestants as a scriptural rule of action. A man's religion (and let him take care that it is the true religion,) should direct him in all things—in the choice of civil rulers, as well as in matters more properly spiritual. The Bible is designed by its author as the universal rule of human conduct. Let protestant Christians withhold all power from the enemies of their religion, and give civil and political power to those only who will use it for the promotion of a divinely prescribed morality, and the continuance and encouragement of the religion of the Son of God. If the Protestant church, in her various departments, will act upon this principle, and in unison, instead of treating political concerns in the spirit of an infidel indifference, she will best promote the interests of the State, and hold in check the growing power of the papal population, without infringing on any of their civil rights and immunities.

But to return from the digression. By acting upon the principle of supporting those who will support their church, and by moving as much as possible together, in their different localities, Roman Catholics have made the most of their numerical power. They have frequently been able to dictate to the political parties, between whom, in particular places, they may have held the balance of power; they have secured the introduction of many of their own men to official stations, and they have obtained large grants of money for the support of their sectarian institutions.

The present year has witnessed the scene of a Romish Prelate officiating in the hall of the House of Representatives at the seat of government. Jesuits and Jesuitism have been publicly commended on the same floor, and the government of the country has, for the first time, appointed a minister to the court of his holiness at Rome. May be it is expected by our sagacious civilians that the Pope is about to turn republican. He will do so, at least for a time, if he finds there is no other way to save his triple crown. While he lives, however, the crown will be there, "though the liberty cap may cover it." Our main purpose here is to show the power that its numbers give to Popery in our country. To the influence which their numbers give to Romanists on the education and religion of the people, we shall advert in other connexions.

The Roman Catholic Church has also the power of efficient organization. The elements of power depend much for their efficiency on arrangement and combination. An army without arrangement, without discipline, and without adequate leaders, would be comparatively powerless, whatever might be its numbers. The three millions of Roman Catholics, under the direction of their thousand priests, form a mighty army in our country, and their organization is thorough and complete. The Government is a despotism. The union of the whole under one visible head, and the interlinking of all together in one chain of responsibility, the first link of which is fastened to the foot of St. Peter's chair, forms an element of power such as appertains to no other organization. The inferior clergy move the people, and the bishops move the inferior clergy, and the bishops are themselves moved by the Pope at Rome, to whom they are bound to render, periodically and in person, an account of their stewardship. The papal establishment is undoubtedly an admirable piece of machinery, well calculated to answer its end, and moving on with comparatively little friction. One will moves the whole. It behooves the community to understand what this imperium in imperio, this government within the government of our country is, and what are its aims and inevitable tendencies.

The papal organization in the midst of us is eminently a foreign establishment. The great majority of its clergy are foreigners, with a foreign education and foreign sympathies. It is sustained chiefly by foreign immigration. Its institutions are called by foreign names, and to a very great degree supported from foreign treasuries. And a foreign prince, the Roman Pontiff, is its acknowledged irresponsible head. Thus, for example, North America is one of the provinces of the See of Rome. We republican Americans live in one of the "ultra-marine" provinces of Pope Pius the ninth. Convents, and nunneries, and monastic orders, like those of ancient times, and bearing the old designations, are every where established among us. We have the "Dominican Convent" in Wisconsin, and the "Convent of the Sacred Heart" in St. Louis, and the "Noviciate of the Society of Jesus" in the same locality. "Sisters Pretiosissimi Sanguinis," are found in Ohio, and to the names of many of the clergy the significant initials S. J. (denoting the Jesuit) are appended. All this indicates that Popery is the same organized system here that it is in the despotic governments of the old world, and that it has been in former ages. A retrospect of the pages of its history in the United States will show that it appears under less concealment now than formerly. Far more of its proper nomenclature is in use now than in past years, and its writings, and public appearances, present it in its own proper dress, to a far greater degree than in past periods of its history. It feels its power. And that power it will exercise. The power of popery is an organized power. It keeps all their parts in their places, and its whole agency in active operation to effect its definite, high, and dangerous aims.

But, again, the power of popery involves mind in peculiar manifestation. The intellectual history of popery and protestantism in contrast is before the world. And the main difference between them is, that in popery we see mind in chains,—in protestantism, mind at liberty. The products of both are visible, and in startling comparison. The operation of popery upon the intellect of the masses of men has been to enfeeble it, to keep it in ignorance, to induce it to receive the manufactured opinions of others, instead of the elaborations of its own faculties. To take even its religion from the hands of man, instead of receiving it for itself from God, through the medium of his own blessed revelation. The operation of protestantism, on the other hand, has been to set mind free from the shackles of a false religion, to teach it its personal responsibilities, to educate it for self-management, and to persuade it to choose the true religion for its own present and eternal welfare. The history of intellect under the development of the protestant principle is the history of human improvement. Its grand and crowning triumphs are, however, yet to come, when Christianity shall fill the world, and when every thing in personal character and social institutions shall be regulated by the gospel of the blessed God.

Protestantism laid the foundations of the American republic, and to it we are indebted for any peculiar excellencies of mental development which our country exhibits.

We do not deny that there is mental power in the Roman Catholic church in the United States. But it is evident that very much of that power is wasted in the effort to manage and aggrandize its own sect. Looking upon all protestant denominations as enemies, and having no common Christianity to promote in unison with them, it wraps itself up in the mantle of its own selfishness, and directs all its exertions to the maintenance of its hold upon its own adherents, and the proselytism of others to the faith. Having so much to conceal, like a large share of the diplomacy of the nations, its influence is squandered upon plans of party management, and mere sectarian extension. And thus mind is cramped, belittled and enfeebled. The great effort of the papal hierarchy is, to cast all in the mould of its own exclusiveness.

We presume that, as a general rule, the Roman Catholic population in the United States are more intelligent than that of the foreign countries from which the major part of them have come. But this is to be attributed to the influence of our enlightened institutions. The light is shining around them, and the eye will open to its revelations. We are persuaded, however, that the intelligence of the papal population is far below that of the protestant churches in the same localities. And the reason is evident. The Bible is the text-book of protestant education.

The Almanac for 1848 furnishes a list of sixteen Catholic periodicals. Of these, twelve are weeklies, one a monthly, one a quarterly, and two are annuals. This is certainly a very small number for a population of three millions with a thousand clergymen. The weeklies are little more than newspapers, and the quarterly is edited by a convert from Unitarianism, whose main effort seems to be to bring others to the bosom of mother church, where, after years of wandering, he is now reposing. Of the annuals, one is the Almanac we have so frequently quoted, and the character of the other may be learned from the title which we recite as it stands. "Ordo Divini Officii Recitandi, Missæque Celebrandæ, Juxta Rubricas Breviarii ac Missalis Romani." The Order of reciting the Divine Office, and of celebrating Mass according to the Rubrics of the Breviary and Roman Missal. Published, about the first of September, by F. Lucas, Jun., Baltimore.

In the United States the press is free, and in its periodical publications we have an index of the mind which is in operation. Here much of its intellectual and moral character appears. The Roman Catholic periodical press may be seen and examined without difficulty. Let an impartial investigation of its character be made, and we think the enlightened verdict will be, that there is no evidence of a higher order of mind in it; and that such mind as it presents is all employed in the effort to maintain and extend the papal religion. And so we may say of the literature of Romanism generally in the United States. There is, no doubt, learning in the papal seminaries, but it is mainly the learning of convents and nunneries; the learning which educates to superstitious submission, and which excludes the immediate direction of the word of God. A large part of the management of the Roman Catholic institutions is undoubtedly in the hands of Jesuit priests, and the enlightened world knows that the great subject of their study is human nature as they find it, that having discovered its peculiarities in the individual case, they may make it, if possible, a bond-servant to Rome.

Protestant education in the United States is either immediately based on the common Christianity, or indirectly and yet powerfully influenced by it. A free Bible directs it. And it may be known by its fruits. Take, for example, the educated mind of the country as it appears in the periodical press of all the anti-papal communions. It is mind free, enlightened and powerful. It is indeed often in error. But it gives reasons for its errors. These reasons may be subjected to investigation, and thus exposed and neutralized, and, ultimately, truth discovered comes out triumphant from the conflict. The Christian press is continually giving to the world profound and practical expositions of the word of God, learned and earnest discussions of Christian doctrine, strong and well applied appeals in favour of individual and social morality, and reasonings upon the condition of the world as illustrating the providence of God, and affecting the freedom and happiness of our own country, and mankind generally. In all this the Protestant clergy have a large share of the labour.

But what, we may ask, are the thousand Roman Catholic priests doing through the press to enlighten the country? Where are the contributions of the papal hierarchy to its religious literature? Where can they be seen treading the higher walks of sanctified learning for the benefit, temporal and eternal, of our vast and rapidly increasing population? We are aware that, of late years, the papal priesthood are more frequently than formerly taking the pulpit and giving their productions in defence of their system to the world, through the newspaper reporters. An occasional religious romance, presenting something of the poetry of Romanism, and a smart tract like "Kirwan unmasked," are now and then appearing, but these are demanded by the necessities of the case, and are evidently mainly intended to prevent the sheep from wandering from the fold. They do not affect our position, which is, that Romanism, as such, has very little literary characer in the United States, and that what it has, is not contributed to the common stock, but is thoroughly subservient to its own sectarianism. If ignorance be the mother of devotion, it is better for men that they remain uninformed. If the United States are an intellectual, educated and religious community, they are so irrespectively of Roman Catholic mission.

DR. WATTS' PREFACE.

We have been requested, by a venerable and much esteemed elder, to republish Dr. Watts' Preface to his Book of Psalms. Many of our readers may have seen it before, but it will probably be new to most of them. It cannot fail to excite surprise and severe reprobation, to find such language as Dr. Watts employs used in regard to the writings of men who spoke as they were moved by the Holy Ghost, and certainly it is passing strange that a work composed on such principles should receive the approbation of so many Christians. We have reason to hope that this subject will soon command more attention than heretofore, and we trust that the time will soon come, when the followers of the Redeemer will no longer forsake the living waters of an inspired psalmody, for the broken cisterns of human inventions.

While we sing the praises of our God in his church, we are employed in that part of worship which, above all others, is the nearest akin to heaven; and it is a pity that this, of all others, should be performed the worst upon earth. The Gospel brings us nearer to the heavenly state than all the former dispensations of God amongst men: and in these last days of the gospel, we are brought almost within sight of the kingdom of our Lord; yet we are very much unacquainted with the songs of the NEW JERUSALEM and unpractised in the work of praise. To see the dull indifference, the negligent and thoughtless air that sits upon the faces of a whole assembly, while the Psalm is on their lips, might tempt even a charitable observer to suspect the fervency of inward religion, and it is much to be feared, that the minds of most of the worshippers are absent or unconcerned. Perhaps the modes of preaching in the best churches still want some degree of reformation; or are the methods of prayer so perfect as to stand in need of no correction or improvement; but, of all our religious solemnities, PSALMODY is the most unhappily managed; that very action, which should elevate us to the most delightful and divine sensation, doth not only flat our devotion, but too often awakens our regret, and touches all the springs of uneasiness within us.
